Herod having now succeeded in his designs in general, supposed himself totally free from future commotions and tumults. He kept his people in due subjection, partly by awe and fear, and partly through through attachment and interest; for he was prince of most inflexible severity in the punishment of delinquents, as he was of most unbounded liberality in promoting the public good. He maintained such a guard upon himself, and kept every thing in such a posture of defence, as to render it apparent that the prince and people must stand or fall together. He deputed himself with affability to all around him, and, upon occasions, exhibited instances of munificence worthy of an emperor. By these means he acquired a general esteem, that greatly facilitated the accomplishment of his designs.

But the ambitious affectation of conciliating the favour of Augustus, and the most powerful men of Rome, induced him to swerve, by degrees, from the customs and discipline of our forefathers, in the erecting of cities and temples to the honour of his patrons. This was not done in Judæa itself; for the Jews would not have suffered it; as we are forbidden to pay any honour to images after the manner of the Greeks: so that he built these cities only upon the borders of the province, and not within the jurisdiction of it; offering, as an apology, that he was not incited to these acts by his own inclination, but purely from a motive of obedience to the higher powers, and particular Cæsar and the Roman state. Whatever desire he might have of securing the favour and protection of those potentates of the earth, his main view seems to have been directed to the promotion of his own interest, and the gratification of his ambition, in perpetuating his name by these memorials of his magnificence and liberality.

C H A P. XIII.

Herod erects divers spacious and elegant edifices. Sends his sons Aristobulus and Alexander to Rome, where they are honoured by Augustus Cæsar, who, in divers instances, displays his bounty to Herod.

Herod builds Cæsarea.

HEROD, observing a certain place near the sea-side, formerly called Straton's Tower, which he considered as a very commodious spot to raise a city upon, drew his model, employed artificers, and compleated his design. The buildings were, in general, of marble; but the master-piece was the harbour, equal in size to the Pyræum at Athens, replete with all conveniencies, and a secure station for shipping against all winds and weathers. The work was the more remarkable, because all the materials were conveyed from a great distance at an enormous expence.

Model of mole.

This city is situate in Phœnicia, in the passage, by sea, into Egypt, between Joppa and Dora, two miserable sea-ports, where vessels cannot ride at anchor with the wind at south-west, as it beats so furiously upon the shore, that merchant-men are frequently obliged to keep out at sea, lest they should be run aground. To rectify this inconvenience, Herod ordered a mole to be made in the form of an half moon, and large enough for ships of war to ride in. He directed also vast stones to be let down there in twenty fathom of water. These stones were fifty feet in length, not less than eighteen in breadth, and nine in depth; some greater, and some less, than those dimensions.

The Tower of Drusus.

This mole was two hundred feet in extent; the half of which was opposed to the current of the waves; the other half served for the foundation of a stone wall, fortified with turrets, the largest of which was called Drusus, from Drusus, the son-in-law of Augustus Cæsar, who died in infancy. There were several arched vaults, in which the mariners dwelt occasionally. There was likewise a quay or landing place, with a large walk upon it round the harbour, accommodated to the purpose of healthful exercise and recreation. The port opens to the northward, which is the clearest quarter of the wind. On the left side of the entrance there was a turret erected upon a large platform, with a sloping bank to shoot off the washing of the sea; and on the right hand were two stone pillars opposite to the tower, both of an height. The edifices about the harbour were erected upon an uniform plan, and composed of the most excellent kind of marble. Upon an elevation in the middle stood a temple dedicated to Cæsar, which was of great use to mariners as a land-mark. There were in the temple two statues or images, one of which was that of Cæsar, and hence the city took the name of Cæsarea, which was no less celebrated for the materials than the workmanship. Nay, the subterranean vaults and cellars were finished specimens of architecture, as well as the buildings above ground. They were laid at equal distances one from the other, and so discharged themselves into the sea. Herod built also a stone theatre; and, upon the south side of the harbour, an amphitheatre, with a commanding prospect of the sea. This work was brought to perfection, at immense labour and expence, in the space of twelve years.

A temple dedicated to Cæsar, called Cæsarea.

When Herod had finished his design with respect to the cities of Sebaste and Cæsarea, he dispatched his two sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, to Rome, to pay their respects to Cæsar. Pallio, who was Herod's particular friend, provided them with accommodation; though Augustus had given positive orders for their being entertained in his own palace. He received them with the greatest cordiality; and, after the additional bounty of conferring upon Herod the three provinces of Trachon, Batanea, and Auranitis, gave him his choice which of his sons he would appoint to succeed him in the kingdom of Judæa. This particular favour arose from the following cause.

Herod sends his two sons to Rome.

One Zenodorus had taken upon him to farm the lands of Lysanias, and not contenting himself with the lawful advantage of the agreement, became partner with the free-booters in Trachon, a set of men who live upon the spoil they take from the people of Damascus. Those of the country who were great sufferers, applied themselves to Varro, who was at that time governor of the province, for a letter to Cæsar, complaining against Zenodorus. Cæsar was so averse to their mal-practices, that, in his answer, he recommended them to destroy those nests of robbers, and commit the command of the province to Herod, to keep the Trachonites in order for the future. It was very difficult to restrain them, they had been long accustomed to this mode of pillaging; nor had they towns, houses, or possessions, but lived, like brutes, in dens and caves. The entrance into their hiding places was so narrow, that no more than one person could pass at a time; but the receptacle was large beyond imagination, and the roof plain and flat. They are, in fine, a people of so rapacious a disposition, that, when they have not opportunity of preying upon their neighbours, they prey upon one another; inasmuch, that they are guided by no principle of justice, or common humanity. When Herod had received this grant from Cæsar, and was come into the country, he procured skilful guides, put a stop to their lawless depredations, and set the neighbours at rest. Zenodorus was so irritated at this proceeding, from the loss of his commission, on the one hand, and the envy he bore Herod on the other, for having supplanted him, that he hastened to Rome to prefer an accusation against him, but returned without effecting his design.

During these transactions Augustus sent Agrippa into Asia, to take upon him the command of the provinces beyond the Ionian Sea. Agrippa being a particular friend of Herod, he met him on his way at Mitylene, and then returned to Judæa. However, some of the Gadarenes came to Agrippa to accuse Herod, when they were not only dismissed without a hearing, but sent back to the king in chains.

Zenodorus and the Gadarenes accuse Herod.

Notwithstanding the prevailing interest of Herod, the Arabians, from an ancient grudge, attempted to raise a sedition in his dominions, and upon an occasion speciously justifiable. Zenodorus, finding his affairs grown desperate, agreed to consign over to the Arabians a certain proportion of his principality, on consideration of an annual payment of fifty talents.

talents. But as this was included in Cæsar's grant to Herod, the Arabians contested the point, sometimes by law, and sometimes by force; and, to render the latter means more coercive, they engaged a party of soldiers, of desperate fortunes, who were willing to exert themselves in any cause that might retrieve them. Herod was well apprized of the design, but deemed it expedient to counteract it rather by mild than rigorous measures, in order to prevent fresh commotions.

The Gadarenes

Herod.

In the seventeenth year of Herod's reign Cæsar came into Syria, where he was immediately applied to by the greater part of the inhabitants of Gadara, with clamorous accusations against Herod, as a most insupportable tyrant and oppressor. They were intigated to prefer these complaints by Zenodorus, who had bound himself by oath never to quit the prosecution of Herod, till he was dispossessed of his dominions, and they reverted to Cæsar. Thus intigated by Zenodorus, they became more and more vehement in their exclamations, and especially because those prisoners, that were delivered up to Herod by Agrippa, continued unpunished. Indeed, lenity towards the injuries of strangers was a striking trait in Herod's character, however inexorable he might have been towards the delinquents of his own subjects. The misdemeanours with which he was charged were, rapine, oppression, the violation and demolition of temples, with others of a similar nature.

Their conduct is

Herod boldly presented himself in justification, and was treated with every token of respect and honour by Cæsar, notwithstanding the clamours of the multitude; insomuch that the Gadarenes, finding his powerful interest with the emperor, and thence expecting that they would fall into his hands, had recourse to suicide, by various means, to prevent the infliction of severer torments; and Cæsar thence inferring they had condemned themselves, acquitted Herod of every part of the accusation.

Zenodorus.

Cæsar's further bounty
to Herod.

A combination of events, at this time, seemed to favour Herod, and particularly the death of his implacable enemy Zenodorus, by a violent dysentery, at Antioch, in consequence of which he obtained, from Cæsar, a considerable part of his domains between Galilee and Trachon, comprising Ulatha, Panuim, and the adjacent country. He was also vested with a sovereign command over the governors of Syria, who were accordingly under his sole rule and direction.

Herod was now advanced to such a pitch of good fortune, that whereas there were but two men that governed the vast Roman empire, first Cæsar, and then Agrippa, who was his principal confidant. Cæsar preferred no man to Herod besides Agrippa, nor did Agrippa any one to Herod besides Cæsar. By virtue of this interest, Herod obtained a tetrarch's commission, in Judæa, from Augustus, for his brother Pheroras, upon whom he bestowed an annual income of an hundred talents out of his own proper revenue, to obviate the consequences of any contingencies that might reduce him to a dependence on his children. After this, Herod waited upon Cæsar, till he saw him embarked; and, on his return, erected, to his honour, a most beautiful temple, of white marble, upon the domains of Zenodorus, near the cave they call Panias, which is at the bottom of a mountain famous for being the source of the river Jordan. The cavern is very steep, and the springs of water in it perpetually bubbling. The mountain is famous for a delightful prospect, but more especially so for the magnificent temple of Augustus Cæsar.

The king took an opportunity, at this time, of ingratiating himself with his people, by remitting a third part of their taxes, under pretence of compassionating the distresses they had undergone during the time of the late famine, but, in reality, to conciliate their good will. The innovations he had introduced, in violation of their laws and religion, gave universal disgust, and were loudly complained of; so that, to preserve order and decorum, he enjoined every man diligently to attend to his own concerns, prohibiting select assemblies, and fixing spies in all places of resort, to take into custody all who should disobey these orders, and cause them to be punished with the utmost rigour. The very roads, streets, and avenues, were beset: nay, so anxious was he for the detection of any that might violate his injunctions in this particular, that, in the night, he would mix himself, in disguise, with the rabble, in order to learn how they stood affected. Those who could by no means be brought to acquiesce with his scheme of government, were prosecuted with the greatest severity; while such as were more moderate, were put to an oath of allegiance, and dismissed. By this means he brought the majority, out of fear, to a compliance with him; but those who had the resolution to contend the point, and stigmatize his conduct, were taken off by some device or other. He endeavoured to impose this oath upon Pallio, the Pharisee, and Sameas, together with their disciples; but though they peremptorily refused it, he declined urging it by any harsh means, out of the regard he bore to Pallio. The Essenes were also exempted from this oath. These Essenes were a sect in some respects resembling the Pythagoreans among the Greeks; and though we have already described the peculiar tenets they hold, it will be necessary, on this occasion, to point out the causes for which they were paid so distinguished a regard by Herod.

There was one amongst these Essenes whose name was Manahem, a man of singular piety and virtue, who was endowed with the gift of prophecy. This person meeting Herod in his puerile days, going to school, greeted him with the salutation of "Hail! king of the Jews." Herod, either not knowing him, or thinking him in jest, told him he was not descended from a family to attain such a dignity. Manahem, smiling, and laying his hand gently on his shoulder, replied, "You are to be king, and you shall rule happily; for it is the Divine will that it shall be so. Retain these words of Manahem in your memory, as they give you to understand the change of your fortune. It will be your duty to govern with justice and equity; but, by a secret impulse, I learn that your conduct will not be regulated by those excellent maxims; as, in divers instances, you will swerve from them; though, in other respects, you will be fortunate, and worthy of much commendation. Remember your crimes cannot be concealed from the pervading eye of the Almighty, who will most severely punish you for them."

Prediction of Manahem, an Essene.

Herod, at that time, was totally regardless of what Manahem predicted, having no reasonable view of such advancement. But when he afterwards came to the throne, and attained to the summit of his glory, he sent for Manahem, and asked him how long he thought he should reign? Manahem returning an indefinite answer, Herod put the question whether he thought he should reign ten years? He replied, yes, and twenty, and thirty, but did not assign the determinate limits of his reign. Herod, resting satisfied with what he had heard, dismissed him in a friendly manner; and, from that time forwards, paid great honour to the sect of Essenes. We have related this circumstance, strange as it may appear, as another proof of the many instances in which the secret purposes and counsels of the Divine Being have been revealed to men of simple piety and virtue.

CHAP. XIV.

Herod rebuilds the temple, raises it higher, and renders it more magnificent than it was before.

AFTER so many signal transactions, and the finishing of so many sumptuous edifices, Herod, in the eighteenth year of his reign, turned his attention towards the erecting of a temple in honour of the true God, in every respect larger and more stately than the former. This work he was persuaded would perpetuate his memory beyond all

he had accomplished heretofore. But as he knew many of the people might be reluctant to assist him in so vast a design, he thought proper to call them together, and address them, upon the occasion, to the following purport:

"It would be time lost, my friends and countrymen, to give you the history of my transactions since I came to the crown: therefore let it suffice, that I have more attended to your benefit and security, than to my own particular interest. You know what care I have taken for you in your greatest extremities, and without any regard to my own profit. You know, likewise, that you yourselves have had the greatest share in the advantage of all the mighty works which, by God's blessing and assistance, I have brought to perfection; insomuch, that Judæa is in a better state at this day than ever; wherefore, there will be no need of citing the particulars of the cities, castles, palaces, &c. that I have either built, fortified, or repaired, in Judæa, and the tributary provinces. But the sum of my present business is religion, and what concerns the reputation of your country. You will do well to observe that this temple, that was erected by our forefathers at their return from Babylon, wants sixty cubits of the height of Solomon's: though this was no fault of our ancestors; for it was not owing to them that it came not up to the proportion of the first, being raised according to the express model of Cyrus, and Darius, the son of Hystaspes, under whose dominion they then lived, as afterwards under the Macedonians; so that they had it not in their power to advance that monument of their piety and zeal up to the measures of the original. But since God hath now pleased, in his gracious providence, to put the government into my hands, and, at the same time, to furnish me with all necessary means for the accomplishing of my end, as peace, leisure, a large competency of revenue, and, which is more than all the rest, we are friends with the whole world, (that is to say, the Romans,) it shall be my care and business to supply those defects which it was not possible for our predecessors, under their circumstances, to prevent; and to do that right, in fine, to the glory of God, in which we have hitherto failed, with all due reverence to his holy name, and with a gratitude suitable to the mercies we have received."

This speech raised much anxiety, and many doubts, in the minds of the people, particularly with respect to the demolition of the old temple, till they were assured of another being erected in its place, which, in fact, they despaired of as an enterprize almost impracticable. In this state of perplexity the king encouraged them with the assurance, "that he would not pull down the old temple till all the materials were fully prepared for building the intended new one."

Makes the necessary preparations

Pursuant to his word, he ordered a thousand carriages to be in readiness to bring stones, chose ten thousand of the most skilful artificers, purchased a thousand sacerdotal garments for that number of priests, and caused them to be instructed in the different branches of workmanship, in order to superintend the general concern.

Description of the temple as rebuilt by Herod.

Having made all necessary preparations, both as to artificers and materials, Herod caused the old foundations to be removed, and others to be laid, upon which basis they raised the superstructure of a temple an hundred cubits in length, and an hundred and twenty in height; but the twenty cubits sinking afterwards, it fell so much short of the original design, which our ancestors had in contemplation to raise again in the days of Nero. The whole fabric was composed of stones, white and durable, in length twenty-five cubits, in height eight, and in breadth twelve.

The front of this magnificent structure bore the resemblance of a palace, the middle being much higher than the sides, and exhibiting such a view over the fields, as was very agreeable to those who either resided directly opposite to it, or were travelling towards it. This view extended several furlongs into the country. The porch, in elegance, was proportionate to the rest of the building; the upper part being adorned with variety of rich tapestry and delicate purple flowers, with pillars interwoven, and a golden vine creeping and twining about them, the branches of it laden with clusters of grapes pendant from the cornices.

The golden vine.

Round about the temple were large cloisters, not inferior to the rest of the building in magnificence, but much exceeding all that went before them for symmetry and elegance. Two of these cloisters were supported by strong walls, a work as singularly curious as had ever been executed.

The cloisters.

The hill was a rocky ascent, that declined by degrees towards the eastern parts of the city, till it came to an elevated level. This is the hill which Solomon a long time before, by Divine direction, encompassed with a wall, that was of excellent workmanship, upwards and round the top of it. He also built a wall below, beginning at the bottom, which was encompassed by a deep valley. This wall was compacted of large stones, cramped together with iron, including the whole, and reaching down to the bottom of the hill. The form of the work was square; and, considering the magnitude and depth, it was an incomparable performance. The immensity of the stones in the front was plainly visible on the outside, yet so that the inner parts were preserved by joints immovable.

Temple walls.

When the foundation was finished in the manner described, Herod caused it all to be wrought into one outward surface, filled up the hollow places which were about the wall, and made it level. There was also within the square another stone wall, carried round the top of the hill, with a double porch to the eastward, facing the portal of the temple that stands in the middle. This portal was magnificently adorned by the munificence of many princes in former times; and round about the temple itself, were spoils and trophies taken from barbarous nations, all of which had been dedicated by Herod, with the addition of others of later date he himself had taken from the Arabians.

On the north-side was built a citadel, the work of some of the Asmonean race, who, for a considerable time before Herod, had executed the authority of prince and high-priest. They called it Baris, or the Tower; and there were deposited the vestments of the high-priest, which were never taken out but at the time he was to offer sacrifice. Herod applied it to the same use; but, after his death, it came to be lodged in the hands of the Romans, till the time of Tiberius Cæsar, in whose reign Vitellius, being appointed governor of Syria, and going to take upon him the command, was so magnificently received at Jerusalem, that, in acknowledgment of the honour done him by the Jews, he prevailed with Cæsar, at their earnest request, that they might have those sacred vestments under their own immediate deposit. They continued in the custody of the Jews till the death of king Agrippa, when Cassius Longinus, governor of Syria, and Caspius Fadus, procurator of Judæa, enjoined to deposit those vestments in the town of Antonia, insisting that they ought still to be in the power of the Romans as they were formerly. Hereupon the Jews sent deputies to Claudius Cæsar, to intercede for their continuance with them. The young king Agrippa, happening to be at Rome upon the arrival of the deputies, obtained the grant of the request from the emperor, who accordingly sent orders to Vitellius to deliver them up. Before that time they were kept under the seal of the high-priest, and treasurer of the temple, who, upon the eve of a solemn festival, applied to the commanding officer of the Romans, shewed him their seal, and took out the vestments, which, when the festival was over, they brought to the same place, and there deposited in the presence of the officer. I have been thus minute in this particular point, because its various changes have essentially affected the concerns of our nation. As to the Tower itself, when Herod had fortified it more firmly, in order to secure the temple, he gave it the

the name of the Tower of Antonia, in honour of his great friend Anthony, who once prevailed over the Romans.

In the western quarter of the enclosure of the temple were four gates. The first led to the king's palace; two more to the suburbs of the city; and the last to the city itself; with a descent of many steps down to the valley; and an ascent, on the other side, of as many steps, up to the top. The city stood over against the temple, in the manner of a theatre, encompassed, towards the south, with a deep valley. In the middle of the square was another gate, equi-distant from the two angles, with stately royal cloisters, with three walls, that reached, in length, from the east valley to the west; for they could not possibly reach any further. This afforded a most extraordinary spectacle; for the valley was so very deep, and the height of the building over it so stupendous, that it caused a giddiness in the brain to look down from the top of the battlements. This cloister had pillars that stood in four rows, equi-distant, with a stone wall wrought up betwixt those of the fourth rank. The pillars were as much as three men could fathom; being seven and twenty feet in length, and upon a double base. The number of them was one hundred and sixty-two. The chapiters were exquisite beyond description, and the sculpture of Corinthian workmanship. These four rows of pillars included three intervals for walking in the middle of this cloister, two of which walks were made parallel to each other, and were contrived after the same manner, the breadth of each being thirty feet, the height fifty feet, and the length a furlong. The roof was adorned with curious sculpture, representing a variety of figures.

This was the first enclosure, in the midst of which, and not far from it, was the second, upon an ascent of a few steps, with a partition of stone, and an inscription upon it, prohibiting any strangers from entrance, upon pain of death. It had, on its southern and northern quarters, three gates, equi-distant; and on the eastern quarter one large gate; where men, who were purified, had admittance with their wives, but the women were not permitted to pass any farther.

There was a third enclosure, into which it was lawful only for the priests to enter. This was the temple itself, before which stood the altar, where the sacrifices were offered up. Into neither of these three did king Herod presume to enter, because, not being a priest, he was prohibited by the law, so that he committed the care of the holy work to the priests themselves, which they finished in eighteen months, when he himself was eight years in finishing the rest.

The temple finished.

The people were transported with joy at the completion of so glorious a work, returning thanks to the Almighty for his blessing upon the undertaking, and extolling the king for the alacrity he had shewn in the execution of it. The event was celebrated with festivity. The king sacrificed three hundred oxen, and the people according to their respective abilities; so that the number of oblations could hardly be computed. This memorable dedication of the temple fell upon the day of the king's inauguration, which added greatly to the solemnity.

Dedication.

There was an occult passage built for the king, leading from fort Antonia to the eastern gate of the inner temple, over which he erected a tower; this passage being designed as a private and safe retreat, either for himself or his successors, in case of any sedition against the government. It is reported, that, during the building of the temple, it never rained but in the night, so that the work was not hindered. This tradition has been handed down to posterity, and is, by many, deemed a peculiar interposition of Providence in favour of the work.

Herod enacts a law against theft, goes to Rome, and is graciously received by Cæsar, who restores him his two sons. They are calumniated on their return to Jerusalem, but without effect.

Herod makes a law against house-breakers.

The people murmur at it.

AS Herod was very zealous, in the administration of government, to promote the impartial execution of justice, throughout, both in town and country, in public and in private, he made a new law for the punishing of housebreakers, to this effect: "That all offenders of that kind should be sold for slaves to any that would purchase them, without exception even to strangers." This law was by no means approved by the people in general, who did not animadvert upon it as it immediately respected the malefactor, but as it manifestly encroached on the laws and customs of the nation, by subjecting the Jews to the impositions of those who lived according to different rules and measures, which they therefore considered as a violation of the institutions of their forefathers, rather than a punishment to those who were found to have offended. Such punishment was avoided in our original laws, which ordains that the felon should make a fourfold restitution; or, if insolvent, shall be sold; but not to strangers, nor into perpetual slavery; and at the end of seven years discharged. This new law was construed as a deliberate contempt, in Herod, against an established practice and discipline not becoming a king, but an unjust and oppressive tyrant, a character to which he again exposed himself by carrying the penalty into execution.

Herod's journey to Rome.

He is graciously received by Cæsar.

Herod about this time made a voyage to Italy, to pay his court to the emperor, and enquire into the circumstances and situation of his sons, who had been sent to Rome to finish their education, where he had the happiness to find them accomplished in the different branches of polite literature. He was received with singular honour by Cæsar, who delivered to him the young princes in a much more improved state than he received them. They were tall and graceful in figure, affable and winning in conversation and deportment; so that it might be said, the endowments of their minds were not inferior to their personal accomplishments.

Having paid his respects to the emperor, and had leave to depart, Herod returned to Jerusalem with his sons, where they no sooner arrived, than they attracted the admiration of the multitude, as youths possessed of every quality that could adorn their elevated rank and station. But they were objects of envy to Salome, the king's sister, and the whole party, who had raised calumniating reports to effect the destruction of Mariamne. Indeed, they beheld them with awful dread, as instruments whom Providence had raised up to revenge the death of their mother, and made this apprehension a motive to scandalous reports against them. They gave it out, that they would never endure the conversation of their father, after imbruing his hands in the murder of their innocent mother. They supposed that slanderous insinuation was the most effectual means of prejudicing the father against the sons, and accordingly practised it with all the art and subtlety that envy and malice could possibly suggest; hoping, in the result, so to work upon the mind of Herod, as to destroy that natural affection which is the basis of all the ties of consanguinity, as well as of reciprocal duty and regard.

C H A P. II.

Herod marries his sons. Pays a visit to Agrippa.

THE artful design of Salome, and her party, had not yet prevailed on Herod, so as to withdraw his paternal affection and confidence from his sons, to whom he continued to behave with his usual openness and cordiality, without any reserve or suspicion. His first concern was to form princely alliances for them, by marrying Aristobulus to Berenice, the daughter of Salome; and Alexander to Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia. When

When Herod had dispatched these affairs, he received intelligence that Marcus Agrippa had left Italy, and was gone into Asia, where he therefore immediately repaired, with a generous tender of all respect and service, and earnestly intreated of him the honour of a visit. Agrippa complying with his request, Herod, on his part, omitted nothing that could contribute to the entertainment of his noble guest. He shewed him all the stately edifices that he had lately erected or repaired, carrying him to Sebaste, the port of Cesarea, and the forts of Alexandria, Herodion, Hyrcania, &c. where he treated him and his retinue with the utmost splendour and magnificence. After this tour he conducted him to the city of Jerusalem, where he was received, by the whole multitude, with all the acclamations and pomp of a solemn festival. Agrippa, upon this occasion, made an oblation of an hecatomb, and feasted the people in the most sumptuous manner. His journey and entertainment afforded him to much pleasure and satisfaction, that he was desirous of protracting the visit; but the winter approaching, and those seas being dangerous, he was under a necessity of returning to Ionia, for which he took his departure, laden with presents and honours.

CHAP. III.

Herod revisits Agrippa, and many offices of friendship pass between them.

HAVING passed the winter at Jerusalem, Herod made another voyage, on the opening of the spring, to visit Agrippa, who, according to intelligence received, was gone upon a campaign towards the Bosphorus. He embarked for Lesbos, with expectation of meeting him there; but, after he passed Rhodes and Coos, he was driven, by contrary winds, upon the isle of Chios, where he was detained for some days. During the course of this voyage, he had many visits made him, which he returned in a suitable manner; and observing, on his short stay upon this island, that several public buildings lay yet in ruins ever since the Mithridatic war, for want of money to repair them, he gave them credit for a sum sufficient to accomplish the work, with an express charge to put it hand, and finish it as soon as possible.

Upon the change of wind, Herod sailed to Mytilene, and then to Byzantium; and hearing that Agrippa had already passed the Cyanean rocks, he followed him with the utmost speed, and joined him at Sinope, a city of Pontus, at a juncture that Agrippa had no expectation of such assistance. This interview was equally agreeable to both parties, and reciprocal tokens of friendship passed between them. In fine, they seemed to be actuated by the same views, with respect both to enterprize and pastime. When Agrippa had dispatched his affairs in Pontus, he took his way upon the return over land; so that they passed through Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and the Greater Phrygia to Ephesus, and thence, by sea, to Samos. Herod displayed many instances of generosity during the passage, as well of the great power and influence he had with Agrippa, whose favour he had conciliated in the highest degree. All became intercession with him in behalf of the people of Ilium, against whom he had been highly incensed; and paid arrears, which were due from the people of Chios, to the emperor, provided them many privileges, and rendered them, in divers particulars, the most essential services.

CHAP. IV.

Agrippa, at the instance of Herod, and through the prevailing arguments of Nicolaus against the natives of Ionia, in favour of the Jews, confirms their laws, and assures them of his protection.

WHEN Agrippa and Herod arrived in Ionia, a great multitude of Jews, of that province, embraced the opportunity of laying before them the injuries they had sustained from the natives, in the infringement on their laws and worship, their depriving them of the money they used to lend to Jerusalem, forcing them to bear arms, and pay public duties out of their subsistence money, and all this contrary to common faith, and the liberties and exemptions granted them by the Romans. Herod, desirous of using his influence in behalf of the Jews upon this interesting occasion, prevailed with Agrippa to grant them a hearing; and procured them one Nicolaus, an advocate of most distinguished abilities, and his most intimate friend, for their counsel. At a court called upon the occasion, Agrippa himself being present, together with a bench of Romans of great rank, Nicolaus thus opened and enlarged upon the cause of the Jews:

“Whither, most illustrious Agrippa, should the miserable and oppressed fly for sanctuary and relief, but to those princes that are able to protect and relieve them? This is the case of your humble supplicants; and we must presume to appeal from your authority to your justice, in a full confidence of your royal goodness: for we have nothing more to desire at present, than the possession and enjoyment of what you yourselves have granted us already, and which our fellow-subjects are now endeavouring to take from us. If the favours we enjoy be great, we doubt not but you will now think us as worthy to retain them, as you found us before to receive them. If the benefit be small, it reflects upon your honour to imagine that you are not able to make it good. Neither is this a greater injury to us, than it is an indignity to yourselves, in the contempt of your judgment, and in the disappointment of your pious intentions. If it were put to these very people, whether they would rather part with their lives, or with their laws, customs, discipline, sacrifices, festivals, &c. in honour of their God, I think, with submission, that we may safely answer for them, they would chuse the former. It is a common thing to take up arms for religion: and what is the great blessing of the peace and freedom the world enjoys under the Roman empire, but that every man may live and worship after his own way? What pretence is there for people to impose that upon others, which they will not submit to themselves? As if it were not all one whether we hinder another man from doing his duty, or neglect our own. It is a thing farther to be considered, that there is no city, people, or nation, extant, that does not depend on the administration, and the power of Rome; for all the happiness they can pretend to? Will any thinking man deem it his interest to frustrate your bounties, when every man living, some way or other, will be a loser by it? Our enemies are not aware, that while they labour to invalidate our rights, they destroy their own: for why should the same concessions be good to them, and void to us; and that inestimable privilege among the rest, of living at ease and liberty, under the protection of the Roman emperors, while several other nations lie groaning in a state of servitude, at the mercy of rigorous kings? Neither ours, at the best, a condition to be envied: for, as to other matters, we desire nothing more than a common share of advantage with the rest of our fellow subjects, provided we may but be allowed to worship God after the manner of our forefathers, which, as it is innocent in itself, on the one hand, so it is for the service of those that permit it on the other: for God not only loves those that worship him themselves, but those also who encourage the worship of him in others. What is there in our way of holy offices that any moderate man can take offence at? or, in truth, that is not, in all respects, agreeable to piety and justice? We make no difficulty of owning the rules of our lives and profession. The Seventh Day is a day of rest from all our labours, and a day that we set apart for the study of the law, as a discipline that much conduces to the rectifying of our manners. Now these customs are "not only blameless in themselves, even upon the "strictest examination of them, but venerable

 "even for their antiquity, (all cavils to the con"trary notwithstanding); so that there can be no
 "cause for controverting the authority of laws "that have stood the test of so many ages. The "injuries we complain of are these: they sacrile"giously make seizures of monies dedicated to "holy uses. They impose taxes upon people that "ought, in right, to pay none. They hurry them "up and down to courts of justice, and other com"mon attendancies, upon our days of solemnity
 "and religious worship; and for no other end but "to turn our piety and devotion to scorn; and
 "these practices they know to be unwarrantable
 "and causeless. Your wisdom consults indiffe"rently the common welfare of all your people, in "the promoting of peace, and the preventing of "feuds. It is against these injuries, most excellent "Agrippa, that we crave to be relieved; and that "we may be allowed the same liberty hereafter,
 "that we have enjoyed heretofore; and that our "adversaries may have no more advantage over us, "than we pretend to over them. We take this to "be justice, not only in the reason of the thing, but "in the right which your goodness has given us to
 "it, by declaring in our favour; to which purpose
 "there are, at this day, to be seen in the capitol,
 "several decrees of the senate, in tables of brass,
 "for its perpetual memory. These monumental "records were undoubtedly grounded upon the "experiment of our faith and loyalty to the state.
 "Beside, that the obligation would be yet sacred "and inviolable, even without any antecedent me"rit on our part; for your generosity hath been "ever so far from lessening or revoking the boun"ties you have once bestowed (and that not only "to us, but to all) that it hath been your practice
 "rather to amplify and enlarge them, even beyond
 "every thought and expectation, as I could give "instances abundantly, if time would permit.
 "But not to value ourselves too much upon our own "services, let our royal master's friendly offices
 "speak for us. Where did he ever fail, to the ut"termost of his power, to oblige your nation?
 "Has not his faith and zeal for your interest been "tried over and over? Has he not made the ad"vancing of your honour his business and his "study? Were your affairs ever in any difficulty;
 "and he not espouse them as his own? So that if it "were but for our king's sake, we might pretend "to some sort of consideration. We must not for"get the services of his father Antipater, nor the "reinforcement of two thousand auxiliaries, that "he brought to Cæsar in Egypt, where his beha"viour was so signally brave, and so much to the "advantage of the empire, that he had the repu"tation of being not inferior to any commander,
 "either at sea or land, for conduct and courage.
 "We might appeal to the glorious presents that "Cæsar made him, or rather to the letters recom-
 "mendatory that he wrote to the senate, in his fa"vour, upon this occasion, by which he obtained
 "for him the privilege of a citizen of Rome, with "other additional honours. This single argu"ment, great prince, might be sufficient, even of "itself, to evince that those favours were at first
 "well bestowed, which we are now imploring may "be confirmed. Beside that, considering the pre"sent league of friendship betwixt yourself and
 "our royal sovereign, we rather hope for an aug-
 "mentation of your bounty, than fear any abate"ment of it. I might enlarge upon your holy
 "vows and sacrifices at Jerusalem, the splendor
 "of your entertainments, and the satisfaction you "were pleased to own in the reciprocal exchange
 "of offices of hospitality and respect, which were "all evident proofs of an affectionate regard, and "an amicable understanding betwixt the Jews
 "and the Romans, confirmed and ratified under "the very roof of the king himself. Now our "final request to the majesty of Agrippa, and in "the presence of the king of the Jews, is only this;
 "that we may reap the fruits of your own boun"ty, without being made a prey to others."

When Nicolaus had finished his speech, in vindication of the rights of the Jews, there was no reply on the part of the Greeks; for it was not a matter of enquiry, as in a court of justice, but a petitionary complaint, to prevent violence from being offered to the Jews. They did not attempt to dispute the fact. Their pretence was, that the Jews were strangers, and would be a burthen to them; while the Jews, on the contrary, averred, that they were not strangers, but a people who lived according to their own laws and customs, without giving offence to any man. Agrippa, thus convinced that they were oppressed, declared in their favour, as well from the justice of their cause, as from the respect he bore to Herod. He said, he thought their request so reasonable, that if it had been more extensive, he would have granted it, so far, at least, as was consistent with his duty to the senate and state of Rome. He then made this formal declaration: "I do here"by pronounce a confirmation of the claim the "Jews make of their privileges, as specified in the "representation of their counsel; and pledge my"self, that so long as they keep themselves within
 "the bounds of their profession and discipline, they "shall not be molested for the future." With these words Agrippa dismissed the assembly; when Herod stood up and made acknowledgment of the favour, in the name of the whole Jewish nation; which done, he and Agrippa, after mutual salutations, took their departure from Lesbos.

Herod, upon his arrival at Jerusalem, calls an assembly of the people, and gives them a relation of his late transactions in Asia.

HEROD, having taken his leave of Agrippa, embarked for Cæsarea, where, through means of favourable winds, he landed in a few days, and from thence immediately proceeded to Jerusalem. As soon as convenient, after his arrival, he summoned a general assembly, strangers as well as citizens, and laid before them a particular account of his voyage, and the very important grant he had obtained for the Jews in Asia, by which they were exempted from the impositions of the Ionians, and fully confirmed in their ancient national privileges. He represented to them the several and great advantages they had derived from his government, and pointed out that the welfare of his subjects was the grand spring of his actions. As a peculiar gratification, he remitted them a fourth part of their taxes for the last year; a circumstance which, added to his most agreeable representation of affairs in general, conciliated the universal esteem of the people, who, with loudest acclamations, testified their loyalty, and most fervently prayed for the prosperity of their king.

CHAP. VI.

Great disturbances prevail in Herod's family, through the contrivance of Salome and Pheroras, who irritate him against his sons Aristobulus and Alexander, and induce Antipater to endeavour to supplant them in the government. Herod treats the two princes with great severity, and discovers a partiality for Antipater, who attends Agrippa to Rome.

DURING these transactions abroad, great domestic animosities prevailed at home, through the artful practices of Salome, against the two young princes, Aristobulus and Alexander, to whom she had a mortal aversion. As she had succeeded to her utmost wishes in her calumnies upon the mother, she proceeded with greater confidence in her design upon the sons, determined that none of her posterity should be left alive, who might have it in their power to revenge her death. The design was carried on with some prospect of success; for the young princes gave instances of a refractory behaviour towards their father, and let fall rash words, expressive of their resentment at their mother's cruel treatment, with threats of revenge upon those who had been the authors of it. Two factions now prevailed; that of the two princes, and that of Salome and Pheroras, the sister and brother of Herod. They cast the bitterest reproaches on each other, and had recourse to all the means of calumny and traduction. But though their hatred was equal on both sides, their manner of gratifying it was different. The young princes were explicit in their profession of aversion, and the real cause of it; while the others had recourse to the arts of insinuation, and oblique suggestion. The princes, in the heat of blood, and simplicity of their hearts, did not hesitate to execrate the authors of their mother's death; but Salome and Pheroras gratified their malice by provoking them to extravagant exclamations, in order to entangle them. They said they deemed it the highest honour to be the sons of such a mother, insisting on it that she was basely murdered. This expression was a sufficient ground for calumny, as it would bear a construction of deliberating a revenge with their own hands. These animosities now became the topic of conversation throughout the city; and, as is usual upon such contests, the inexperience of the youths was admitted as a palliation of the warmth of their expressions, which Salome artfully improved to her own purposes. They were so deeply affected with the death of their mother, that they would frequently exclaim, "That, next to the deplorable fate of that unhappy princess, they looked upon their own circumstances to be most miserable of all others, in the necessity of associating with murderers, and, in some measure, becoming partakers of the crime, by communicating with the company."

These disorders increased greatly; and the king's absence had afforded opportunities for fomenting the animosities that prevailed between the parties. When the king returned, and addressed the multitude upon the occasion, Pheroras and Salome dropped words, insinuating that his life might be in danger, as the young princes openly vowed vengeance on the authors and abettors of the death of their mother. They added another circumstance, which was, that their hopes were fixed on Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, by whose means they might be admitted to an audience of Cæsar, and to prefer their accusations against their father. This information alarmed Herod, and the more so, because it was confirmed by the assurance of many others. Upon this occasion, he could not but reflect on the calamities that had heretofore been the result of faction in his family, and deprived him of his dearest friends, and most beloved wife. These considerations almost reduced him to a state of despair. He had been fortunate abroad beyond expectation; but he had been no less miserable at home; so that, upon a balance of the extremes, it became to him a matter of doubt, whether or not he might have been happier in a private station, which could not have subjected him to either.

In this state of anxious perplexity it appeared to him expedient to introduce a son, whom he had educated privately, into the gay circle of the court, in order to deprecate his haughty and insolent brothers. His name was Antipater. He had no intention, at that time, of advancing him to the first dignity; but had recourse to those means, as a check upon the conduct of the sons of Mariamne, and to bring them to sober reason, as they would thereby be convinced, that, at all events, the government would not want a successor. With this view Herod gave Antipater the countenance of trust and authority, and paid him such honours as if he had been actually appointed to the succession, not doubting but, by these means, to bring his sons to an acknowledgment of their duty. The event, however, proved otherwise; for they resented it as the highest indignity; and, instead of a check, it became a provocation. Antipater was both shrewd and ambitious; so that when he had once attained to this degree of elevation, and began to form towering prospects, he was determined to pursue the path into which his father had conducted him. To that end he exerted every effort of calumny to supplant his brothers in the affection of their father, who was so credulous and open to his artifices, that he gained his point to his utmost wish, and wrought in him an aversion, that daily grew more and more implacable. His whole aim was to keep up this alienation in the breast of his father, and, at the same time, evade suspicion with respect to himself; so that he employed such instruments as he knew would work upon the credulity of the king, as well as obviate a discovery of the chief agent.

Antipater now had such an ascendancy, that many of the first rank paid court to him, as the road to preferment; while the whole design was covered under pretext of zeal for the service of Herod. The plot being revealed to a junto of confidants, they took advantage of the heat of passion which the young princes could not suppress, and which transported them, beyond all bounds of reason and moderation, into bursts of tears, inordinate exclamations, and the severest remonstrances, on the insufferable injuries they had sustained; as well as positive accusations of their father with palpable injustice to them. Such sallies of passion, with their outrageous effects, were all minutely observed by these incendiaries, who, to widen the breach, represented them in so exaggerated a light, as to exasperate the king so highly, that, in order to avenge himself on Alexander and Aristobulus, he heaped more honours on Antipater, who, at length, prevailed with him to admit his mother to court, and give him recommendatory letters to Cæsar, highly conducive to his credit and advantage. Upon Agrippa's return to Rome, after ten years administration in Asia, Herod sailed from Judæa, accompanied by Antipater only, to compliment and present him with many valuable presents. When they parted, he obtained of Agrippa permission for his son to attend him to Rome, and a promise of introducing him to Cæsar. This partiality was shewn to Antipater, to point out to his brothers their father's resolution of cutting them off from the succession.

They prevail with Herod.

CHAPTER VII.

Herod exhibits an accusation against his sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, before Cæsar.

ANTIPATER's voyage to Rome, with the sanction of recommendatory letters from the king to his father, greatly tended to his honour and interest. His only source of disquiet arose from his being deprived, by a remote situation, of the opportunities he had of perpetually circulating his calumniating reports to the prejudice of his brothers. His chief fear was, lest his father should be wrought upon to change his mind, and thereby induced to act with more moderation towards the children of Mariamne. To prevent this as much as possible, he maintained an epistolary correspondence with his father, and thereby took opportunities of insinuating the anxiety under which he laboured for his safety; though his real motive was to preserve in his mind, the antipathy he had caused him to conceive against his brothers. But notwithstanding he was incensed in the highest degree against Alexander and Aristobulus, by the artful practices of their brother Antipater, Herod thought it most prudent, before he proceeded too rashly, to go to Rome, and there openly exhibit an accusation against his sons before Cæsar. In his way he happened to meet with the emperor at the city of Aquileia, and having obtained audience in form, preferred an accusation against them in terms to the following effect, stating to Cæsar, "That he had not only made him master of his sons' destiny, but that the very laws of the Jews declared, that, if a son was accused by his parents, and they put their hands upon his head, all who were present should stone him, and put him to death; and therefore, though he might treat his sons in this manner, after the crimes of which they stood convicted, yet he chose rather to have their opinions upon the matter, not doubting but that they would join with him in giving an example to future ages, of that just severity,

Herod appears to Cæsar in the case of his sons.

“ severity, which ought to be ever used upon unnatural children.”

The princes are much affected by their father's accusation.

This was the main point of accusation brought by Herod against his sons, who, during the time of his speaking, were so affected, as to burst involuntarily into tears. Though they were conscious of their innocence, yet, being accused by their father, they were sensible of the necessity of exculpating themselves from the crime alledged against them, or remaining under the censure that had been brought upon them by means equally fallacious and wicked. Cæsar, observing their confusion, and that the reluctance with which they proceeded on their defence, did not arise from conscious guilt, but the prevalence of modest diffidence, was disposed to judge with candour of their cause, as was, indeed, the whole assembly present.

C H A P. VIII.

Alexander's defence. The princes are acquitted by Cæsar. Herod calls a council at Jerusalem, and declares his successor.

IT being by this time evident that they had excited the commiseration both of Cæsar and their father, and that all present expressed concern for the unfortunate situation of the young princes, they were emboldened to hope for the prosperous issue of an event, which, at first, appeared to them replete with the greatest disaster. Alexander, the elder, therefore, thus addressed his father upon the subject of the charge:

Alexander's address and defence.

“ We cannot, Sire, but take it for a clear evidence of your good intentions towards us, that you have brought us to this place, before so great and just a judge, and so gracious a prince, for the decision of our cause, without employing either your regal, or your paternal, power, over your own children and people. But, in referring us to Rome, by way of appeal to Cæsar, it is given us manifestly to understand, that you have a desire and purpose to preserve us; for men do not use to carry those to temples and altars that they intend to destroy. Yet, after all this, as an aggravation of our misfortune, we are conscious to ourselves, that we are not worthy to live, if we had but done any thing that looks like disloyalty or ingratitude towards so good a father; and we had much rather die innocent, than survive the scandal of such a suspicion. If Providence should enable us to defend the truth, the proof of our innocence will be a much greater comfort to us, than the deliverance of our persons; but if calumny should prevail, a life, under those infamous circumstances, would be worse than a thousand deaths. The pretext of an ambitious design upon the government, is well accommodated to the inordinate passions of young men; and the instance of our unfortunate mother furnishes more colour for it. But whose case, I beseech you, Sire, may not this be as well as ours; and why may not the children of all other princes, under our circumstances, be charged with the same design, if suspicion shall pass for a proof? For here is only an invidious accusation, without the least shadow of evidence, or so much as a probability to support it. Why is not the poison itself, or the accomplices and instruments of the practice, produced? Where are the conspirators, the conspiracy, the bribery, or the defamatory letters? But the whole story, in fine, is founded on invention and slander, without any countenance to give it credit. A divided court, it is true, is a great misfortune; but the hope of preferment, which you are pleased to call the reward of virtue, proves often an incentive to all sorts of wickedness. Nay, we insist so far upon our integrity, that we defy the whole earth to disprove it. As for scandals, there is no refusing them, where the ear is open to the calumny, and deaf to the defence. If we have “ talked at large, it was not meant against yourself, but against your tale-bearers. If we have passionately lamented the loss of our dear mother, it was not purely for the death itself, but out of a zeal to the honour of her memory, which we found blasted where she least deserved it. And to what end again should we aspire to the government in the life-time of our father? For, if we already enjoy the honours belonging to the royal family, (as effectually we do,) what have we farther to struggle for? Or, if we are at present barred of our right, may we not presume to wish and hope for it? Can it be imagined that the murderers, in such an instance, should ever set up for successors, when sea and land, after so flagitious a villainy, would conspire against them? How would it consist with the piety of the subject, or with the religion of the country, to set up paricides for kings, and to see the holy temple, that you yourself erected to the great God, profaned by the basest of assassins? Or, all other considerations apart, how can any man think to destroy Herod, the emperor yet living, and not fall under the power and justice of Cæsar? Now, if there appears nothing against us, upon any colourable pretence, where is the ground of the accusation that exposes us for such impious wretches? As to the death of our mother, it is a consideration to make us rather cautious than outrageous. We might multiply words; but there is no need of excusing a thing that never was done; wherefore, we have only to beg of the mighty Cæsar, and at present our sovereign judge, that, if you can, in your conscience, discharge us of any farther suspicion for the future, we may be allowed to live, how miserable soever: for what can be more grievous than to lie under the imputation, even though falsely, of the most horrid of crimes? But if you go on suspecting us, the torments of our own thoughts will put a period to our existence without your help: for we are not so fond of life, as to think of preserving it to the torture of him from whom we received it.”

Cæsar who before could scarcely give credit to so gross a calumny, was greatly moved by this spirited address of the young prince, which, added to the visible effect it had upon the countenance of Herod, during the time of delivery, confirmed him in the opinion of an iniquitous design. The whole court, indeed, commiserated the case of the princes, and could not avoid censuring the conduct of the king, in commencing so rigorous a prosecution against them. In fine, from the improbability of the charge, and their concern for the lives of two most promising youths, they determined to interpose most strenuously in their behalf. The princes continued in a state of dejection, anxiously waiting the decision of the case, while the king discovered the utmost confusion, both in visage and gesture; till, at length, Cæsar, having duly attended to what had passed, delivered it as his opinion, “ That, although the sons were entirely innocent of the charge alledged against them, yet they were censurable in having given their father any suspicion of the probability of the calumniating reports that had been spread concerning them. Upon the whole, he acquitted them; and exhorted the father to banish all groundless suspicion, and admit them to former favour and confidence, as the only means of establishing his and their present and future prosperity. After this declaration and admonition, a signal was given to the brothers to approach the imperial seat, near which stood Herod. They advanced with such becoming grace and modesty, and were about to cast themselves at their father's feet, with most dutiful submission, when, with all paternal affection, he embraced them alternately, and gave every proof of the most perfect reconciliation. The surprize of this unexpected encounter drew tears of joy from the whole assembly, when, after mutual salutation, and the most dutiful acknowledgment to Augustus, Herod and the princes took their departure, together with Antipater, who hypocritically pretended to rejoice at this reconciliation.

Cæsar and the whole court affected by the address of Alexander.

The princes are acquitted by Cæsar.

Recessed to their own quarters.

During

Mutual presents between Herod and Cæsar.

During the four last days they abode at Rome, Herod presented Cæsar with three hundred talents, as he was then exhibiting public spectacles; and Cæsar, in requital, bestowed upon him half the revenue of the copper-mines in Cyprus, and the charge of the other half, together with other honourable bounties and commissions. With respect to his government, he left it in his own power to appoint which of his sons he pleased for his successor, or so to distribute that each of them might partake of the dignity: but declared he would by no means permit him to deprive himself, during life, of the power over his kingdom, or over his sons.

The rebellious Tetrarchites are subdued.

Having adjusted these affairs, Herod returned, accompanied by his three sons, to Judæa. During his absence, great part of his dominions about Trachon had revolted; but were reduced to submission, by the vigilance and activity of his several governors and officers, civil and military. Herod, and his sons, touching, upon their return, at Eleusa, a city in the district of Cilicia, they met with Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, who received them kindly, and discovered the utmost pleasure in finding a reconciliation was happily effected, and that Alexander, who had married his daughter, was acquitted of the accusation brought against him. After a reciprocal exchange of salutations and presents, the two kings parted, and Herod set out for Judæa, whither, upon his arrival, he called an assembly of the people in the temple, where he related the transactions which had passed during his journey, enumerated the particular honours conferred upon him by Cæsar, and, at length, directed his speech to the admonition of his sons, exhorting them, and the people in general, from the highest to the lowest degree, to live in concord. He then informed the multitude, that he appointed his sons to be his successors, Antipater first, and then Alexander and Aristobulus, the sons of Mariamne, in their order. During his life, he claimed all duty and esteem, as sovereign, from his own family, his officers, civil and military, and all ranks and degrees of subjects. These he enforced, and recommended as the only effectual means to promote good government on the part of the prince, and consequently the general happiness and prosperity of prince and people. Having spoken to this purport, he dismissed the assembly. The sentiments he communicated coincided with the opinion of some, but differed much with that of others, who looked upon the late contention amongst his sons, and the subsequent transactions, as introductory of mischievous innovations.

Herod, on his return to Judæa, addresses the people.

CHAPTER IX.

Upon the finishing of the building of Cesarea, Herod institutes games in honour of Augustus. Builds and adorns many places, and performs divers actions to perpetuate his memory.

On the finishing of the building of Cesarea.

THE city of Cesarea was now finished in the tenth year from laying the foundation of it, the twenty-eighth of Herod's reign, and the 192d Olympiad. The most sumptuous preparations were made for its dedication; the most expert masters in the different entertainments were engaged from all parts, such as musicians, swordsmen, wrestlers, racers, and the like, who were to exhibit, with the utmost dexterity, in their several professions. In short, he collected entertainments in all their variety, whether exhibited at Rome, or in other places.

Herod's magnificence.

This festival was instituted to the honour of Augustus Cæsar, and, because it was to be repeated every fifth year, it was called, in the Roman language, cortæmen quinquennale. It was attended with immense expence to the king, in contributing magnificent curiosities to its pomp, collected, at any price, from all quarters: to add to which, Julia, the wife of Cæsar, sent great part of her most valuable furniture from Rome, with the choicest rarities of Italy, estimated at the value of five hundred talents; so that nothing was wanted to compleat its splendor. This grand spectacle was attended by an innumerable concourse of people from all quarters; and ambassadors, from divers potentates, resorted to it out of compliment to Herod, who were all entertained at the king's charge, with the curious spectacles by day, and sumptuous feasts at night; so that he acquired the reputation of a most magnanimous and generous friend. In every instance of this extraordinary exhibition, his ambition was to eclipse the glory of all those that had gone before; and it is related that Cæsar and Agrippa had been heard to say, "The dominions of Herod were too little for the greatness of his soul."

After the ceremony of this festival, Herod applied himself to the building of another city, upon a plain called Capharlaba, a spot of ground agreeably situated for the convenience of wood and water, and a plantation of most curious trees. This town he called Antipatris, from his father Antipater. He built, upon another spot of ground beyond Jericho, a delightful seat, which he called Cypron, from the name of his mother. He also dedicated several monumental structures to the honour of his beloved brother Phasael; as first a tower in the city itself, not inferior, in strength and magnitude, to that of Pharos, in Alexandria, to which he gave the name of Phasael. After this he erected a town upon the north-side of the valley of Jericho, which he called by the same name, whereby he rendered the country more fruitful through the cultivation of the inhabitants he introduced, who were called Phasaelites. It would be endless to enumerate the benefits he conferred on cities both in Syria and Greece, and all the places through which he passed in the course of his tour. He amply supplied whatever could contribute to the relief of their necessities, and the advancement of their public works; nor did they want money to support them on the failure of their revenues.

Herod builds several cities.

Herod's liberality to foreigners.

But, as the most magnificent and illustrious of all his undertakings, he rebuilt, at his own particular charge, the temple of Apollo, at Rhodes, and bestowed upon the inhabitants a great number of talents of silver for the repairs of their fleet. He expended a vast sum in the repair and finishing of several public edifices for the inhabitants of Nicopolis, near Actium. He also built two cloisters at Antioch, (the largest city of Syria,) that ran across the town, with a wall betwixt them. They were magnificently adorned; and the streets were paved with polished stone, which was of very great advantage to the inhabitants. He recovered the reputation of the Olympic games, which were in a low state, through want of money to support them, appointed revenues for their maintenance, and rendered them more venerable as to sacrifices and pompous expences; so that, on account of his great liberality, he was declared, in their inscriptions, to be a perpetual director of the games.

Particular instances of his munificence.

For what has been already related concerning the transactions of Herod, his character must appear extremely diversified. If we have respect to his magnificence and liberality, it will be impossible to deny that he was of a beneficent disposition. But if, on the other hand, we advert to the punishment he inflicted, and the injuries he offered, not only to his subjects, but his nearest relations, we must confess that he was dead to the feelings of humanity. Upon this view of things, his very nature may seem to many, a contradiction in itself; but I must differ from that opinion, and conclude, that the actions above-mentioned, sprang from one and the same principle. Being a man ambitious of honour, he was induced to be magnificent, wherever there appeared any hopes of present reputation, or future memorial. As his profusion exceeded his income, he became burthensome to his subjects; for his enormous expences could not be supported by justifiable measures. He was conscious of the hatred he had incurred through his oppression, as well as of the difficulty of appeasing those seditious tumults that must ensue there-upon, without either retrenching his disbursements, or shortening his revenue. Thus circumstanced, he endeavoured to render the ill-will of his subjects conducive to his emolument. If, therefore, any of his court was not obsequious to him in behaviour, or dropped the most distant hint of any innovation in his government, they became the objects of his vengeance, and, though his very kindred and friends, were persecuted with relentless cruelty. This arose from a boundless ambition of being honoured; as did the monuments he erected to Cæsar, Agrippa, and other illustrious friends; intimating thereby, his desire of being honoured himself in like manner, so that the one might be exemplary of the other. These dedications and materials are repugnant to the Jewish laws, which prefer rectitude to glory; so that the disposition of our nation was not agreeable to that of the king, whose ambition it was to be flattered with statues, temples, and other monumental honours; and, in a word, whose ambition was the source and spring of his liberality to strangers, and his oppression of his subjects.

THE Jews who dwelt in Asia, and in Cyrene, in Africa, sustained, at this time, the highest injuries from the Greeks, who committed depredations on them, under pretence that they carried their money out of the country; and, in many instances, deprived them of those privileges and immunities they held, by grant of former kings, in common with the rest of the natives. As, upon remonstrance, they found no redress of grievances, they sent deputies to Cæsar, with an appeal against the Greeks, which so effectually prevailed with the emperor, that he sent letters to the governors of the provinces, enjoining them to confirm to the Jews the full enjoyment of all their privileges and immunities as heretofore. Copies of these letters are hereunto subjoined, as testimonials of the favorable disposition of the Roman emperors towards our nation.

An embassy of the Jews to Cæsar.

The decree of Augustus Cæsar.

1. "Cæsar Augustus, high-priest, and tribune of the people, ordains thus: Since the nation of the Jews hath been found grateful to the Roman people, not only at this time, but in time past also, and chiefly Hyrcanus, the high-priest, under my father Cæsar, the emperor; it seemed good to me, and my counsellors, according to the sentence and oath of the people of Rome, that the Jews have liberty to make use of their own customs, according to the law of their fathers, as they made use of them under Hyrcanus, the high-priest of Almighty God; and that their sacred money be not touched; but be sent to Jerusalem; and that it be committed to the care of the receivers at Jerusalem; and that they be not obliged to go before any judge on the sabbath-day, nor on the day of the preparation to it, after the ninth hour. But if any one be caught stealing their holy books, or their sacred money, whether it be out of the synagogue, or public school, he shall be deemed a sacrilegious person, and his goods shall be brought into the public treasury of the Romans. And I give order, that the testimonial which they have given me, on account of my regard to that piety which I exercise towards all mankind, and out of regard to Caius Marcus Censorinus, together with the present decree, be proposed in that most eminent place, which hath been consecrated to me by the community of Asia, at Ancyra. And if any one transgress any part of what is above decreed, he shall be severely punished." This was inscribed upon a pillar in the temple of Cæsar.

An embassy of Augustus Cæsar.

2. "Cæsar to Norbanus Flaccus, sendeth greeting. Let those Jews, how many soever they be, who have been used, according to their ancient custom, to send their sacred money to Jerusalem, do the same freely." These were the decrees of Cæsar.

3. Agrippa, also, himself, wrote, after the manner following, on behalf of the Jews. "Agrippa, to

"the magistrates, senate, and people of the Ephesians, sendeth greeting. I will that the care and custody of the sacred money, that is carried to the temple at Jerusalem, be left to the Jews of Asia, to do with it according to their ancient custom; and that such as steal that sacred money of the Jews, and fly to a sanctuary, shall be taken thence and delivered to the Jews, by the same law that sacrilegious persons are taken thence. I have also written to Sylvanus, the prætor, that no one compel the Jews to come before a judge on the sabbath-day."

4. "Marcus Agrippa to the magistrates, senate, and people of Cyrene, sendeth greeting. The Jews of Cyrene have interceded with me for the performance of what Augustus sent orders about to Flavius, the then prætor of Libya, and to the other procurators of that province, that the sacred money may be sent to Jerusalem freely, as hath been their custom from their forefathers; they complaining that they are abused by certain informers, and, under pretence of taxes, which were not due, are hindered from sending them, which I command to be restored, without any diminution, or disturbance given to them. And if any of that sacred money in the cities, be taken from their proper receivers, I farther enjoin that the same be exactly returned to the Jews in that place."

5. "Caius Norbanus Flaccus, prætor, to the magistrates of the Sardinians, sendeth greeting. Cæsar hath written to me, and commanded me, not to forbid the Jews, how many soever they be, from assembling together, according to the custom of their forefathers; nor from sending their money to Jerusalem. I have therefore written to you, that you may know that both Cæsar and I would have you act accordingly."

6. Nor did Julius Antonius, the prætor, write otherwise. "To the magistrates, senate, and people of the Ephesians, sendeth greeting. As I was dispensing justice at Ephesus, on the ides of February, the Jews, that dwell in Asia, demonstrated to me, that Augustus and Agrippa had permitted them to use their own laws and customs, and to offer those their first fruits, which every one of them freely offers to the deity, on account of piety; and to carry them in a company together to Jerusalem, without disturbance. They also petitioned me, that I also would confirm what had been granted by Augustus and Agrippa by my own sanction. I would therefore have you take notice, that according to the will of Augustus and Agrippa, I permit them to use, and do according to, the customs of their forefathers, without disturbance."

We have cited these instances and precedents, that the Greeks may find, on perusal, the honours which have been done us by antiquity, and the privileges, in point of custom, discipline, and worship, that have been, from time to time, granted us by sovereign powers, even to the toleration of our religion, and the service of the true God. These decrees are also recorded to soften the prejudices which render destitute of liberality and candour, entertain against us. Nations in general, and places in particular, change in manners and customs; but the grand law of nature is immutably the same, and extends differently to Jews, Greeks, and Barbarians. Upon this principle our laws are formed; and to maintain them sacred, we must conciliate the esteem of all mankind. This affords me an opportunity of recommending candour and benevolence to men of all persuasions, which, when they prevail, will reconcile those animosities that arise from difference of opinions, and recommend to all mankind virtue, which is the grand and solid basis of human society.

HEROD the Great in search of TREASURE, breaking open the ROYAL SEPULCHRE of KING DAVID, when two of his attendants were KILLED by LIGHTENING, during the sacrilegious Attempt.

CHAP. XI.

Great family dissensions ensue upon Herod's rifling the sepulchre of David. Judgment inflicted on his guards. The hypocrisy of Antipater, and general fallacy of the king's relations. Herod exercises the greatest oppressions and cruelty, and is reduced to a state of remediless horror.

Herod rifling the sepulchre of David.

HEROD having lavished vast sums in ostentatious munificence, both within and without his kingdom, and heard that Hyrcanus, his predecessor, had opened David's sepulchre, and taken out of it three thousand talents of silver, and that there was a much greater number left behind, he determined on making the like attempt. Taking, therefore, with him, some of his confidants, he conveyed himself by night into the sepulchre, but with all possible caution, to keep it from the knowledge of the people. He found a great store of rich plate and vessels, both gold and silver, which he carried off; but was disappointed in his expectation of money, as it had been all taken away by Hyrcanus. Being desirous, however, of making further search, he advanced till he came to the very coffins in which the bodies of David and Solomon were deposited. It is said, that two of his guards were killed by a flash of fire which burst out of the recess, which was interpreted as a judgment on the rashness of the undertaking. Herod was so alarmed at this prodigy, that he not only quitted his design of prosecuting the search, but, to expiate the sacrilege in some measure, he erected a most sumptuous monument of marble at the mouth of the sepulchre, to bar up the entrance.

Record of Herod.

Nicolaus, the historian of those times, makes mention of this monument; but is silent as to the king's going down to the sepulchre, a circumstance so impious and dishonourable, that he thought it expedient to suppress it. For, being cotemporary with the king, and writing his history under his immediate inspection, he was under a necessity of relating such circumstances only as would tend to his honour, without even pointing at those that would be productive of a contrary effect. The plan he adopted, was either to palliate or disguise his most notorious cruelties; and, in some instances, pass them over unnoticed. His partiality, nay misrepresentation, is evident in his plausible colouring of the murder of Mariamne, and the base indignities offered her two sons, under pretext of incontineny in the one, and a design upon the life of the father in the other. Such actions as could be admitted praise-worthy, he extolled by the most lavish encomiums; while those that were highly reprehensible, were either extenuated, or passed over unnoticed. It might be said, in favour of Nicolaus, that he wrote panegyric rather than history; not so much for the information of posterity, as the gratification of his patron. With respect to myself, being nearly allied to the Asmonean kings, and, on that account, attained to the dignity of the priesthood, it is my incumbent duty to relate matters as I find them, with all reverence to the descendants of that prince, but yet with an undeviating regard to truth, to which I am determined inflexibly to adhere throughout the whole of my history.

Herod's behaviour to his subjects.

The troubles in Herod's family seemed to be much augmented after this sacrilegious attempt upon the sepulchre of David; whether from a judicial vengeance, to increase former calamities so as to render them incurable, or whether fortune assailed him at a particular season, as a punishment for his enormous crimes, cannot be determined. The feuds in his family resembled the tumult of a civil war, and were maintained by the joint effects of outrage and calumny; but the grand means were the artifice and hypocrisy of Antipater, who, while, on the one hand, he inborned his creatures to bring accusations against his brothers, acted himself, on the other hand, as an advocate in their defence; thinking, under this disguise, to accomplish their destruction. He wrought so far upon the king, by these artifices, that he looked upon him as the guardian of his life: nay, so high an opinion had he of his fidelity, that he recommended his prime minister Ptolemy, to advise with Antipater on the most important concerns of state; so that these two, in concurrence with the mother, might be said to mould the king either into love or hatred, as best subserved their particular interests.

Alexander and Aristobulus, on the other side, who were men possessed of a due sense of honour, could not tamely submit to so indignant a degradation, as to be trampled on by their inferiors. Their wives were affected in the same manner. Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus, and wife of Alexander, detested Salome, both from the love she bore her husband, and a female jealousy, on seeing the daughter or Salome, who was married to Aristobulus, put upon the same level with herself.

Female dissensions.

There fell out, at the same time, another unfortunate circumstance, that engaged Pheroras, the king's brother, in the dispute, which arose, at length, to a high degree of jealousy and hatred. Herod made an offer to Pheroras of his daughter in marriage: but he urged, in excuse for refusal, that he was desperately enamoured with another, whom, though of very inferior rank, he was determined to marry. Herod could not but lay this indignity to heart, especially from a brother, to whom he had given such a proof of affectionate regard, as to admit him to a share of the government. But finding himself at length so ungratefully requited, the honour he offered him rejected, his good intentions disappointed, and that he could not by any means bring him to reason, he married his daughter to the son of Phasael, his eldest brother. Some time after, however, when he thought his brother's love had cooled in a degree, he went to him, reprehended him for his former conduct in giving him such a repulse, and, as a fresh instance of his affection, made him a second offer of his other daughter, whose name was Cypras.

Pheroras refuses the daughter of Herod.

In consequence of this proposal, Pheroras applied to Ptolemy, who advised him, by all means, to close with his brother; nor hazard his fortune, as well as quiet, in the loss of the king's favour, which would subject him to the most imminent danger, and all through means of giving way to a ridiculous amour. Pheroras approved the counsel, and embraced it; begged the king's pardon; and putting away his wife, although he had one child by her, promised the king, within a month, to marry his second daughter; binding himself by oath to hold no farther conversation with her whom he had renounced.

But when the thirty days were elapsed, Pheroras became such a slave to his passions, that, regardless of his promise given to the king, he took the former woman home, and cohabited with her again. This incensed Herod to such a degree, that he could not restrain his wrath, nor keep from the bitterest invectives on his brother, for a conduct at once so dishonourable and perfidious. As there were not wanting incendiaries to blow up the flame of domestic discord, Herod was deprived of all the peaceful enjoyments of life, circumstances furnishing incessant occasions for quarrel amongst his nearest and dearest relations. So deadly was the hatred of Salome to the sons of Mariamne, that she would not suffer her daughter to enjoy so much as the conjugal conversation of her own husband Aristobulus, but tampered with her to disclose what had passed between them in private; and if, at any time, an occurrence had made a disagreement betwixt them, she was particularly careful to widen the breach, and did her utmost endeavour to bring it to a mutual hatred. By these means she became acquainted with all their concerns, and induced her daughter to divulge what she had heard from the brothers when they were by themselves, respecting Mariamne and their father, whom she declared they hated; and were continually threatening, if once they got possession of the kingdom, they would make Herod's sons, by his other wives, country schoolmasters, as their present education, and their diligence in learning, fully qualified them for that employment. She added, that they declared, if ever they saw any of Herod's women adorned with their mother's jewels, they would cause them to be clothed in sackcloth, and confined so closely, that they should not see the light of the sun. These tales were carried by Salome to the king, who, though they could not but give him much concern, endeavoured to make matters up by fair means rather than foul; so that having rebuked his sons, and heard the defence they made, he contented himself, for the present; but soon after he was beset with severe trials.

Herod is calumniated by Pheroras

Pheroras informed Alexander, the husband of Glaphyra, who was daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, that he had heard from Salome, that Herod was enamoured of Glaphyra, and that his passion for her was unconquerable. Alexander, upon hearing this, from his youth and jealousy, was all on fire, and concluded it was true, from observations he had made of Herod's obliging behaviour to her. This strong suspicion made such an impression upon him, that he went immediately to his father, and, with tears in his eyes, told him what had passed between him and Pheroras. This calumniating suggestion incensed Herod more than ever, as it proceeded from one of his own family, to whom he had ever rendered all the good offices within his power; so that he sent for Pheroras, and upbraided him, in the severest terms, with ingratitude, and the vilest deceit.

Pheroras blames Salome, who exculpates herself.

Pheroras, in order to exculpate himself, declared that Salome was the framer of the plot, and that he had the story from her mouth: but happening to be at hand, so as to hear this declaration, she vehemently exclaimed, that it was a malicious falsehood, contrived to take away her life, in revenge for the zeal and affection she had shewn for the saving of the king's, who, at this instant, she averred, was in greater danger than ever. She added, it was no wonder that Pheroras should hate her, as she was the only person who persuaded her brother to put away the wife he now had, and to take the king's daughter. As she said this, she tore her hair, and beat her breast, and gave proof of the greatest acts of dissimulation. Pheroras was now in the greatest anxiety of mind, between two inextricable difficulties; for he could neither deny what he told to Alexander, or disprove what Salome had said to him. They, however, maintained the dispute a considerable time, till Herod, being disgusted with the subject, dismissed them both; highly commending the moderation of his son, as well as his candour, in coming so frankly to him with the story. Salome incurred the disgrace of being the supposed author of this calumny, and the king's wives were ready to avail themselves of it, so that he was incessantly disturbed with complaints from one or the other, and his uneasiness was not a little increased by the following incident.

The amours of Syllæus and Salome.

Obodas was at that time king of Arabia, a prince totally addicted to indolence. His affairs were under the sole management of Syllæus, a man of graceful person and address, and in the prime of life. This Syllæus, coming upon some occasion to Herod, and seeing Salome, became enamoured of her, and made her an overture of marriage. Salome, losing her brother's esteem daily, discovered no aversion to the proposed match; so that, upon farther conversation, it was observed, by their countenances and gestures, that the amour advanced on both sides. The women acquainted the king with the affair, and represented it in a most ridiculous light. But Herod did not give credit to it, till having set Pheroras as a spy over them, he brought him word, that, by what he had gathered from the information of looks and signs, there was an amour between them. Syllæus, soon after this, took his departure; but within the course of two or three months returned, and treated with Herod himself concerning the match, pointing out the advantages that would accrue therefrom to him, not only in point of commerce, but with respect to his own right to a considerable part of the country already. The king, upon this, asked his sister if she was disposed to the match; and she, without hesitation, replied in the affirmative. But when Syllæus was informed of the necessity of conforming to the Jewish religion, if he espoused the king's sister, he could not assent to these terms, assigning, as a reason, that the Arabians would stone him to death; and so the treaty ended. Pheroras from hence took occasion to hint to the king, that Salome had, in some degree, sullied her reputation; while his wives peremptorily charged her with incontinence.

The match is broken off because Salome refused to embrace the Jewish religion.

Herod now determined, at the importunity of Salome, to marry his own daughter, whom Pheroras had refused, to a son Salome had by Costobarus. But Pheroras dissuaded him from it, alledging, that a sense of the death of his father would cool his affection, and advised him rather to give her to his own son, who was to succeed him in the government. The king took his counsel, gave her an hundred talents for her portion, and all former misunderstandings were forgotten.

Herod's daughter married to the son of Pheroras.

Notwithstanding this compromise between Herod and his brother Pheroras, feuds and animosities still prevailed in his family. It seems he had three attendant eunuchs, for whom he had a great partiality; and that some officious tale-bearer had told him, that Alexander had been tampering with them, for a sum of money, to betray him. Upon this information, the eunuchs were put to the torture, to discover what had passed between them and Alexander. They confessed that they had some conference with Alexander, but denied any knowledge of his having a treasonable design upon the life of his father. The tormentors, at the instance of Antipater, pressed them still harder and harder, till, at length, in the extremity of anguish, they declared, "That Alexander bore a mortal hatred to his father, and endeavoured to seduce them from their allegiance to him, as a prince infirm and impotent, though he used artifices to conceal the decay of nature: that, if they would come over to him, they should soon be preferred to the first offices of state; as the government must not only descend to him of course, but matters were so concerted, as to put it out of his father's power to disappoint it, as he had formed a powerful party among the officers and the king's friends, who were determined to stand by him at the hazard of their lives and fortunes."

New alliances in Herod's family.

The eunuch's confession concerning Alexander.

Herod was greatly agitated by this confession, which carried in it both reproach and menace, and, for some time, at a loss how to proceed, in order to prevent surprize, and avoid impending danger. Upon deliberation, it appeared most expedient not to go openly to work, but carry on his design of detection by spies and informers. He was now fraught with suspicion and hatred against all about him; and, by indulging those suspicions for the sake of his preservation, he continued to suspect those who were guiltless. Nor did he set any bounds to his suspicions; for the nearer the relation, the greater was his apprehension, as supposing they had better opportunity of effecting his destruction. With respect to such as were totally detached from him, the slightest information was their certain destruction. The situation of his attendants and domestics was singularly embarrassing; for their only security was to calumniate each other; by which practice, even when they succeeded, they drew upon themselves such envy and detestation, that seldom failed of meeting with its desert. So it was also with respect to private pique; for informers were generally entrapped in the snare they laid for others. The king had occasionally some qualms of conscience, for taking away the lives of such members without trial or conviction, though he persisted in the same iniquitous and cruel proceedings. At length, however, in the conclusion, and after the destruction of so many innocents, he was so far commendable, as to execute justice upon the false witnesses, who had so vilely sold the blood of their fellow-creatures.

His extraordinary suspicion.

Sentences of death without trial or conviction.

The palace was now in a state of distraction; many of the king's friends were banished thence, and those in particular to whom he had been most attached, as Andromachus and Gemellus, two of his principal favourites. These ministers had served him both abroad and at home, in embassies and councils, councils, in the careful education of his sons, and, in fine, in offices of the greatest trust and importance. He renounced Andromachus, for the kindness Alexander had shewn to his son Demetrius; and Gemellus, for the respect he bore to Alexander, having been his tutor and companion in his travels to Rome. It is probable he would have treated them with more severity, had he not been awed by their great popularity; so that he contented himself with depriving them of their offices, and banishing them from the court, that he might carry on his cruel purposes without controul.

These disasters, so disgraceful to Herod, as a prince and a man, sprang from the pernicious counsels of Antipater, who, finding him fearful and suspicious, insinuated himself into his confidence, gratified his humour, and caused him to imbibe, as a political maxim, "that it is necessary to make sure of all those who have power to do mischief." Herod followed this maxim; for when he had expelled Andromachus, and the rest of his friends, who had the honesty and courage to tell him plain truths, and gave him wholesome advice, he put all the confidants of Alexander to the question, concerning treasonable plots and commotions, when they all died upon the torture, having nothing to confess. This generous constancy being taken for obstinacy, induced this suspicious and cruel prince to increase the torments; though with this extremity they could not extort the shadow of a disloyal thought expressed at any time by his son Alexander. Antipater, with his wonted artifice, insinuated, that it was a point of honour in them, rather to deny the truth in question, than violate the trust reposed in them; by which means he incited Herod to attempt to discover, by the torture of great numbers, what attempts might be concealed.

At length, one under torture declared, that when Alexander was commended, as a graceful person, and a skilful marksman, he observed, that these qualifications, given by nature, though desirable in themselves, were not advantageous to him, as they excited the envy and jealousy of his father. He added, that when he walked along with his father, he endeavoured to depress and shorten himself, that he might not appear too tall; and that when he was hunting, if his father was near, he missed his mark from design, as he knew his father was ambitious of excelling in those exercises. Upon this pretended discovery, they respite the man's torture; and he proceeded with his declaration, that Alexander and Aristobulus had entered into a conspiracy once to take away their father's life as he was hunting, and if they succeeded, Alexander was to fly to Rome, to demand the succession. There were certain letters also produced from him to his brother, complaining of his father, for giving away two hundred talents a year in land to Antipater. Herod looked upon all this as sufficient evidence to confirm the suspicion he had of his children, and, in consequence, had his son apprehended and made prisoner; not that he gave much credit to what he heard, as they could have no interest in his destruction; nor was it probable they should go to Rome to solicit his kingdom, after a most notorious parricide. In the mean time, however, Alexander being imprisoned, without any plausible pretext to justify such a menace in the opinion of the multitude, Herod could not think himself secure, without giving them some satisfactory reason; and, to that end, put divers of Alexander's confidants and friends to the torture, and afterwards to death, in order to colour the pretence of his guilt, but they could not bring them to confess.

While the palace was in this confusion, and nothing to be seen or heard of but tumult, terror, and torment, a young man, in the utmost agony of torture, confessed that Alexander had written to some friends of his at Rome, to inform Cæsar, that there was a conspiracy against him, and that if he was sent for thither, he would discover it; for that his father had abandoned the interest of Rome, to treat with Mithridates, king of the Parthians; adding withal, that there was a poison already prepared at Ascalon. This accusation had such credit with Herod, that he immediately ordered the strictest enquiry to be made after the poison, but could obtain no information.

Alexander was so far from sinking under this oppression, that he neither attempted denial or defence; partly to exasperate his father, by shewing contempt on his outrageous behaviour, and partly to put him to shame, for his absurd credulity and suspicion. He sent him four letters, in which he gave him to understand, that he need not torture any more people upon questions to learn the truth of things, as he could assure him there was a conspiracy against his life, and that Pheroras, and several others, whom he least suspected, were concerned in it. He told him of the indecent behaviour of Salome; and, in a word, assured him, that there was a general resolution formed for taking him off, as neither freedom or happiness could be expected while he was living; and amongst the list of conspirators were two, named Ptolemy and Sapinnus, in whom he most confided.

The court, at this time, resembled a den of ferocious animals, rather than a society of the most polished of mankind, as nothing prevailed therein, but calumny, treachery and murder. The palace, which was the seat of mirth and festive sport, was now become the mansion of gloomy despair; and Herod was as weary of his own life, as he had made others of theirs; for, as he could not repose confidence in any man living, his present state was truly miserable; and he had no prospect before him, but that of confusion and horror. He could not be said to enjoy a moment's rest, sleeping or waking, for hideous representations, and horrid imaginations. At one time fancy would point out to him his son with a dagger at his breast, and at another time suggest some tremendous idea; so that, in a word, he was as miserable as conscious guilt, and the dread of justice, could possibly make him.

CHAP. XII.

Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, interposes to affect a reconciliation between Alexander and his father. Pheroras obtains pardon of Herod, who goes to Rome, and reconciles Titus, governor of Syria, to Archelaus.

WHEN Archelaus heard of the distracted state of Herod's mind, through the suspicions and dissensions which prevailed in his family, he deemed it the part both of a father and a friend, to exert his best endeavours to compose the differences betwixt the king and his daughter and son-in-law, for whom he had a very great affection. When he found, upon his arrival, that Herod was almost transported beyond the bounds of reason, he thought it imprudent to reprove him, or charge him with the rashness of his conduct, as it would most probably bring on a dispute, that would defeat the design on which he came. He therefore transferred the blame to Alexander, declaring the king had done nothing but what was just and honourable; and that, for his part, he would totally reject Glaphyra as a daughter, if he should find she had been privy to a plot, and not discovered it. This affected zeal of Archelaus in vindication of Herod, brought him, upon reflection, to a sense of his late conduct, so that he greatly abated of his rigour towards his son. From this sudden change of disposition the king, who lately accounted every man his enemy that spoke in favour of Alexander, now burst into tears on hearing Archelaus censure him severely; and requested he would not transport himself to that degree of passion, for the folly and rashness of an inexperienced youth.

When Archelaus had thus brought Herod into a more tractable temper, he palliated the matter, by transferring the blame to the advice of evil counsellors; observing, it must be owing to them, that a young man, who had no malice in his nature, was corrupted; and that he apprehended there was more reason to suspect the brother than the son. This excited Herod's displeasure with Pheroras, who, reflecting that Archelaus had the greatest influence with his brother, most importunately requested his intercession with him in his behalf. Archelaus did not reject his suit, but gave him to understand, that he could not undertake to change the king's disposition towards him immediately, recommending to him, as his best advice, to cast himself at his brother's feet, confess himself the cause of all the calamities of the family, and humbly implore his pardon and forgiveness. By following the advice of Archelaus, Pheroras gained his point in both respects; for the calumnies raised against Alexander, were, beyond all expectation, wiped off; and Herod, at the instance of Archelaus, was reconciled to his brother. Herod was so sensible of the obligations he lay under to the king of Cappadocia, that, on his return to his own country, he dismissed him with the most valuable presents. It was agreed upon between the two kings, that Herod should go to Rome, to inform Cæsar of the present state of his family, as he had written to him upon that subject. They went together as far as Antioch, where Herod effected a reconciliation between Archelaus and Titus, the governor of Syria, and then returned to Judæa.

CHAP. XIII.

Revolt of the people of Trachon. They are overcome by Herod's troops, and received and protected by Syllæus. Herod applies to the Roman governors to deliver up the rebels, who order satisfaction to be made him.

Cause of the rebellion of the Trachonites.

ON Herod's return from Rome, a war broke out between him and the Arabians, on the following occasion. The inhabitants of Trachon, a province that Cæsar had taken away from Zenodorus, and given to Herod, when they could no longer live by pillaging, were reduced to the necessity of following agriculture, an employment that yielded them neither satisfaction or profit. Herod, for some time, maintained a degree of order amongst them, and restrained them from making depredations on their neighbours, by which he acquired a deserved reputation. But, upon his going to Rome, to accuse his son Alexander, and commit Antipater to Cæsar's protection, the Trachonites spread a rumour of his death, revolted from his dominion, and betook themselves again to their accustomed way of pillaging their neighbours. But they were quickly suppressed by the king's troops. Only forty of the heads of them made their escape, and retired into Arabia, where Syllæus (still disgusted at the refusal of Salome) afforded them an hospitable entertainment within a well fortified place. From thence they not only over-ran Judæa, but Cælo-Syria, and carried off their prey; while Syllæus afforded them protection during their iniquitous practices.

Syllæus protects the free-booters

When Herod returned from Rome, and found his dominions had sustained great injury from them, and that he could not come within reach of the free-booters themselves, so long as they were under the protection of the Arabians, he was so incensed, that he made an incursion into Trachon, where he put whole families to the sword. This transported them to such a degree of rage, being obliged by the law of their country to avenge themselves on the murderers of their kindred, that Herod's dominions were never free from their incursions. Under these circumstances he applied himself to Saturninus and Volumnius, Cæsar's governors of those provinces, to deliver those plunderers into his hands. This requisition enraged them the more; and collecting in a body, to the number of a thousand, they ranged up and down, committing depredations in town and country, and laying all waste before them; so that their proceedings had, in every respect, the appearance of a war. Herod, therefore, insisted on the free-booters being delivered up, and the re-payment of the sixty talents which he, by the hands of Syllæus, had lent to Obodas.

Herod requires them to be delivered up.

Syllæus, who had now usurped the government of Obodas, denied that the plunderers were in Arabia, and put off the payment of the money, till the Roman governors, Saturninus and Volumnius, ordered the debt to be fully discharged within the compass of thirty days, and that they should reciprocally deliver up the subjects on each side. This mandate exposed the fallacy of Syllæus; for not one Arabian had taken sanctuary with Herod, while great numbers of robbers were found under the protection of the Arabians.

Obodas, a subject of the Roman government.

CHAP. XIV.

Syllæus violates his word. Herod obtains permission to recover his right by force. Takes Repta by assault. Defeats the Arabians. Marches with three thousand Idumæans to Trachon.

WHEN the time appointed for the payment of the money, according to the order of the Roman governors, was past, without Syllæus having fulfilled his agreement, Herod, hearing he was gone to Rome, peremptorily demanded satisfaction, both as to the debt, and the delivering up of the plunderers. But finding the Arabians obstinately persist in withholding justice, he obtained permission of Saturninus and Volumnius, to attempt the recovery of his right by force; and, in three days, made a considerable progress with an army into Arabia. Arriving at length at the castle called Repta, whither the free-booters had retired for shelter, he took it by assault, and then demolished the fortifications, without doing the least injury to the inhabitants. In the mean time Nacebus, the Arabian general, advanced with a reinforcement to the succour of his party, and there ensued an engagement, in which the army of Herod sustained very little loss; but many of the Arabians, together with their general, were slain, and the remainder scattered and put to flight.

Herod's army goes to Arabia.

The king having now chastised these free-booters, marched with 3000 Idumæans into the country of Trachon, in order to keep the plunderers in that quarter under restriction. Herod sent a particular account of these proceedings to the Roman governors in Phœnicia, giving them to understand, that he had not exceeded the bounds of his commission, in bringing to condign punishment the refractory Arabians, which, upon an investigation of the matter, they found to be consistent with the authority he had received from the Roman state.

CHAP. XV.

Syllæus gives false intelligence at Rome, and presents Cæsar with the particulars. Cæsar, in a letter of reproof, censures the conduct of Herod. The insolence of the Arabians. Herod's ambassadors are denied audience of Cæsar. Death of Obodas, and succession of Aretas, whose ambassadors and presents are refused by Cæsar. Nicolaus, of Damascus, is sent on an embassy by Herod.

IN consequence of Herod's conduct towards the Arabian free-booters, Syllæus hastened to Rome, where he totally misrepresented every circumstance concerning it. He had already insinuated himself so far as to be personally known to Cæsar, to whom, as he was walking before his palace, he addressed a complaint of Herod's having entered Arabia with an army, overturned the government, ravaged the country, slain 2500 noble Arabians upon the spot, with his friend and kinsman Nacebus, their general, amongst the rest, pillaged Repta of vast treasure that was deposited there, and all this through the advantage he took of the infirmities of Obodas, who had neither troops in readiness to oppose him, or a general in his absence fit for command. Syllæus added invidiously, that he would not have undertaken this journey to Rome, but in full confidence that Cæsar would provide for the public peace of all his people; and that, had he been there, he would have exerted himself in such a manner, a manner as would not have redounded either to the honour or advantage of Herod.

Cæsar is incensed at Herod.

This representation of the matter enraged Cæsar, who enquired of Herod's friends, as well as his own, who lately came out of Syria, whether or not Herod had led his army to any place out of his own jurisdiction. When this could not be denied, he admitted the truth of all that had been laid before him by Syllæus, and immediately sent a letter of reproof to Herod, giving him to understand, that "whereas formerly he had used him as his friend, he should now treat him as his subject." Syllæus also wrote an account of this to the Arabians, who, finding that Herod was in disgrace with Cæsar, neither delivered up the robbers, who had fled to them, or paid the money that was due, according to the contract subsisting between them. The people of Trachon, availing themselves of this opportunity, rose against the garrisons in Idumæa, joined the Arabian ravagers, laid waste the country, and took ample vengeance of Herod for his late rigorous proceedings against them.

The Trachonites rise against him.

Herod, having lost the favour of Cæsar, was under a necessity of bearing these insults; for both his courage and credit had failed him. He endeavoured to exculpate himself by his ambassadors, who were, at first, denied audience, and afterwards peremptorily dismissed, without any attention being paid to the business of their embassy: Herod could not but entertain apprehensions of the subtle insinuations of Syllæus, who improved the displeasure of the emperor to his own advantage; and finding him extremely credulous, and pliant to his will, made the best of his opportunity to work upon him in his own behalf to the prejudice of Herod.

His embassy is rejected by Cæsar.

Obodas being dead, and succeeded by Aeneas, whose name, on his accession to the government, was changed to Aretas, Syllæus endeavoured, by calumnies and presents to Augustus, to bring about his expulsion from his principality, and engross the power to himself. He was induced to this attempt from the disgust that Cæsar took to Aretas, for entering upon the administration without his knowledge and consent. The new king sent ambassadors to Cæsar, with complimentary letters, and magnificent presents, and, amongst the rest, a golden crown of immense value. These letters contained a positive charge against Syllæus for poisoning his sovereign Obodas, usurping his government, debauching the wives of the Arabians, and taking up vast sums of money to accomplish his purposes. But Cæsar rejected his embassy, as he had done that of Herod, without paying the least regard to his accusation of Syllæus.

Aretas succeeds Obodas in the kingdom of Arabia.

Cæsar is disgusted at him.

His rejection of the embassy and of the crown of gold.

In the mean time affairs in Judæa and Arabia became more and more perplexed, partly through the anarchy and confusion which prevailed, and partly because there was no rule maintained; one of the kings being not yet established in his government, and the other carrying no sway over his people: for Herod was so circumstanced, that he could not assert his regal authority without offending Augustus, and therefore was under a necessity of submitting to all indignities. At length, being brought to the last extremity, he took up a final resolution of attempting to appease the anger of Cæsar, through the mediation of his friends, and trying the effect of a third embassy to Rome; on which important business he deputed Nicolaus, of Damascus, an expert logician, and an accomplished orator.

CHAP. XVI.

Great dissensions in Herod's family. Eurycles ingratiates himself with Herod. Obtains the confidence of Alexander. His perfidy and fraud to acquire wealth. He is banished out of Lacedæmon. Herod still credulous and jealous. Jucundus and Tyrannus banished the court, and forced by torture to accuse Alexander. The governor of Alexandria put to the question. Counterfeit letters produced against Alexander. The false witnesses are stoned at Jericho. Salome betrays Aristobulus. The brothers prosecuted upon Salome's information. Examination of Glaphyra and Alexander, who deny the charge. Cæsar is reconciled to Herod. Nicolaus exhibits an accusation against Syllæus, and defends the cause of Herod. Syllæus violates his oath. Cæsar sends Herod a letter of condolence.

HEROD's family was now in a state of the utmost distraction, through the prevalence of intestine jealousies, which threatened the dire calamities, and chiefly arose upon the following occasion: There was one Eurycles, a Lacedæmonian, a man of noble extraction, but perverse disposition, and an adept in all the arts of the profoundest dissimulation. This Eurycles cultivated the friendship of Herod, through a mutual exchange of presents, and other good offices with him in the house of Antipater, by which means he became familiarly acquainted with Alexander, as pretending to him that he was in great favour with Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and also that he entertained the highest respect for Glaphyra. Under this semblance he minutely observed whatever passed in the family, in order to avail himself as opportunity might offer. In fine, he was so arch an hypocrite, as to conceal his designs from the keenest penetration; and, though a monster of perfidy, pass upon mankind as the most ingenuous and disinterested man in the world. By his arts he obtained the confidence of Alexander, who disclosed to him all his secrets, and reposed in him an unlimited trust. He gave him a detail of his misfortunes, such as the unkindness of his father, the death of his mother, and the increasing power and influence of Antipater. He represented his oppression as intolerable, as the king's aversion was become so inveterate, that he would not admit his children to his table nor conversation. These complaints Alexander credulously imagined would remain undisclosed in the breast of Eurycles; but they were all by him conveyed to Antipater, whom he told, that he did not bring him the information from any interested view, but from a motive of friendship, and a sense of the very great importance of the concern, warning him, at the same time, to beware of Alexander.

Eurycles ingratiates himself into the friendship of Herod, Antipater, and Alexander.

Obtains rewards from Antipater, Herod, and Archelaus.

Antipater looked upon this as a singular instance of the respect and friendship of Eurycles, made acknowledgment of it by very considerable presents, and at length related the purport of the information to Herod. The king was so prepossessed with a disposition to believe every evil report against Alexander, that, through the force of such prejudice, and divers ambiguous hints in the course of conversation, he contracted a hatred for him more implacable than ever.

Having obtained from him a present of fifty talents for his supposed generous service, the perfidious Eurycles went to Archelaus, with lavish encomiums on his son Alexander, insinuating to him, at the same time, the great pleasure and happiness he had derived in being accessory, upon several occasions, towards composing the differences between him and his father. His arts prevailed likewise with Archelaus, who gratified him with a pecuniary present; and this imposture he carried on without detection by any one of the several parties. He then returned to his own country, where he followed the practice of his base arts, till he was at length discovered, brought to justice, and, as the vilest of miscreants, banished Lacedæmon.

Herod was not now disposed, as before, towards Alexander and Aristobulus, when he was content with hearing the calumnies which others raised against them, but entertained so implacable a hatred, as to urge many to defamation contrary to their will. He observed all that passed, put questions, and attended to all informations that he thought might tend to criminate them, till, at length, he heard, that one Everatus, of Coos, was confederate with Alexander; a circumstance that seemed to give him great satisfaction.

Herod's aversion to his sons increases.

Calumnies against the brothers daily increased; and it seemed a matter of general concern, to exhibit some deadly charge, under pretence of regard for the preservation of the king. There were two persons, called Jucundus and Tyrannus, formerly of Herod's guards, men much admired for their stature, strength, and agility; but having incurred the displeasure of Herod, they were banished the court. Alexander, knowing the valour and activity of these men, entertained them as guards of his person, and treated them with every instance of liberality. The king, therefore, being suspicious of them, had them put to the question, upon torture, concerning the conspiracy. Having sustained the anguish for some time, with incredible resolution, they at length confessed that Alexander had solicited them to take an opportunity of killing the king, while he was upon the hunt, as the fact might be evaded under colour of a fall from his horse, upon his own spear, especially as he had narrowly escaped that accident once before. They made a farther discovery of money hid in the stable, and some of the king's lances and darts, delivered out by the master of the game to the servants of Alexander, by his own order.

The governor of Alexandria is put to the torture.

After these, the governor of Alexandria was put to the torture, upon the questions of promising to receive the brothers into his fortress, and of putting into their hands the king's treasure that was there deposited. The governor denied the charge; but his son avowed it, and produced letters under Alexander's hand, as he pretended, to this effect. "When we have finished all that we have proposed to do, we will attend you; but do you endeavour, according to promise, to receive us into your fortress." After this writing was produced, Herod was confirmed in his suspicion of the treacherous design of his sons; but Alexander peremptorily insisted that it was the malicious contrivance of Antipater, and a forgery by his secretary Diophantus, who was a man skilled in such illicit practices, and afterwards convicted and punished for the same.

Forgery of Antipater's secretary.

Herod being now at Jericho, after putting the witnesses to the torture, had them brought thither, to accuse his sons before the people, who stoned many of them to death, as, in their rage, they would have done Alexander and Aristobulus, had not Herod prevented them by means of Ptolemy and Pheroras. They were, however, committed to close custody; and spies set upon them, to observe every thing they did or said; and, in fact, they were treated as condemned criminals.

The brothers are cast into prison.

In this extremity Aristobulus endeavoured to excite Salome, his aunt, and mother-in-law, to compassion for his distress, and to a just indignation for the author of it; representing to her the danger she was in, from lying under an accusation of holding private correspondence with Syllæus, about the king's affairs, in hopes of marrying him. Salome carried these words to her brother, who, in the heat of his passion, commanded both his sons to be bound, kept separate from each other, and enjoined to commit severally to writing, the particulars of their treasonable design. They wrote according to the king's command, and both agreed in the same declaration, that they had never conceived a treacherous design. They acknowledged, indeed, an intention of making their escape; and the life they led under perpetual jealousies was worse than death.

Salome betrays Aristobulus to Herod.

The brothers disavow the charge of treason.

Herod puts questions to Alexander before the ambassador of Archelaus.

About this time there came on embassy to Herod, from Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, one Mela, a person of distinguished rank in that country. Herod, desirous of shewing the ill-will he supposed Archelaus bore him, sent for Alexander out of prison, and examined him in the presence of the ambassador, concerning his escape, whither he intended to go, and in what manner to dispose of himself. He frankly replied, that he proposed to go to Archelaus, his father-in-law, who had promised to send him to Rome; declaring most solemnly, that neither he or his brother had entertained the shadow of a treacherous thought against their father, whatever sy-cophants and liars might have insinuated to the contrary. He had declared, he said, that Jucundus and Tyrannus might be examined more particularly; but it was agreeable to the design of Antipater to have them dispatched; so that, at his instigation, they fell by the hands of the multitude.

After this declaration, in the hearing of the ambassador, Herod commanded him and Alexander to be taken to Glaphyra, and that she should be strictly interrogated as to this abominable conspiracy against his life. They were no sooner come within view of the princess, than, upon sight of her husband in chains, she exhibited tokens of the utmost phrenzy, tearing her hair, and uttering the most piercing groans, which were answered by deep fetched sighs from Alexander, insomuch, that the surrounding multitude was struck with astonishment. Ptolemy at length put the question to the prince, whether his wife was privy to his actions. He replied, "How is it possible that the woman I love dearer than life, and by whom I have had endearing pledges of that love, should be unconscious of my actions?" The princess then exclaimed, that "she never knew he entertained a wicked design; but that, if her accusing herself falsely, would tend to his preservation, she would confess it all." Alexander declared; that "they were innocent of the charge alleged against them, by those from whom they had deserved better things; but if an intention of making their way to Archelaus, and then to Rome, was to be imputed to them as treason, they were certainly answerable for it." Glaphyra also made the same confession.

Alexander and Glaphyra, in the trial of the charge.

Herod, construing this declaration as a proof of the ill-will of Archelaus towards him, dispatched Olympus and Volumnius with letters to him, with orders to touch at Eleusa, a city in Phœnicia, and there deliver them. They had instructions also to expostulate with him, upon a strong presumption of his being engaged with his sons in the confederacy. Their orders were from thence to sail for Rome; and, in case they should find by Nicolaus of Damascus, that Cæsar was become more tractable than formerly, they were to present another express to him, with the proceedings against Alexander and Aristobulus, and copies of the evidence upon which they were convicted. Archelaus acknowledged his readiness to receive the princes, and that he undertook to afford them such sanction, as the best service he could render both the father and the sons, being fearful, lest Herod, in the heat of rage and jealousy, might drive them to extremities. He affirmed, upon the whole, that he had no design of sending them to Cæsar, or supporting them against their father.

Archelaus's defence to Cæsar.

When Herod's deputies arrived at Rome, and found Cæsar reconciled to their master, they delivered their letters according to order. They were previously laid before Nicolaus for his inspection, who managed his commission after this manner. As soon as he came to the emperor's palace, at Rome, over and above the instructions that he had in charge, he brought a formal accusation against Syllæus, having procured proofs upon him from the Arabians, (who were greatly divided among themselves,) of the most flagitious practices that could be imagined, particularly the murder of Obodas, which was rendered undeniably manifest, by intercepted letters under his own hand. Nicolaus, whose main concern was to effect a permanent reconciliation of Herod with Cæsar, greatly improved this discovery to the advantage of his principal, being assured that he would not be allowed to make a direct defence of Herod; but if he desired to accuse Syllæus, an opportunity would present itself for speaking in Herod's behalf.

Cæsar's conduct to Herod.

The day being appointed for a hearing, Nicolaus, in the presence of the ambassadors of Aretas, delivered an accusation against Syllæus, as the murderer of his lord and master the king, and great numbers of the Arabians; as having taken up immense sums of money towards disturbing the public peace; as an abandoned debauchee, both at Rome and in Arabia; and as guilty of the most daring ef-

Nicolaus's accusation against Syllæus.

frontery, in imposing falshood and calumnies upon Cæsar himself, and particularly with respect to the account he gave of the conduct of Herod, which was fallacious throughout the whole. When Nicolaus came to this last article, Cæsar interposed, with a command to speak to this single point, and shew that he had not led an army into Arabia, nor slain two thousand five hundred men there, nor taken prisoners, nor pillaged the country. Nicolaus made answer, that he should take the liberty to demonstrate that either none at all, or but very few of the imputations, were true, of which the emperor had been informed. This assertion drew the attention of Cæsar, and Nicolaus thus proceeded in his plea for Herod:

“ There was a debt due to Herod of five hundred talents, upon a bond, where it was specified, that, when the time appointed for payment was elapsed, it should be lawful to make a seizure of any part of his country. With respect to the body of men that Cæsar calls an army, it was merely a party sent out for putting a legal claim into execution. This party was not sent immediately according to the tenor of the bond, because Syllæus had come before Saturninus and Volumnius, and at last had sworn at Berytus, by the fortune of Cæsar, that he would pay the money in the course of thirty days, and deliver up the fugitives that were under his protection. The time arrived; but neither the money was paid, or the fugitives delivered up; so that Herod was obliged to address the governors again, who gave it as their opinion, that he might do himself right by distresses. This was the occasion of his going into Arabia, and of the war which his adversaries so tragically describe. How can this be deemed a war, when it had the approbation and permission of the governors, in prosecution of a lawful compact, and after a violation of a solemn oath, both in the name of the gods and Cæsar? ”

“ With respect to the captives, they were robbers that came from the country of Trachon, where the number, at first, amounted to no more than forty, but increased afterwards. They escaped the punishment Herod would have inflicted upon them, by taking refuge in Arabia. Though the common enemies of mankind, they were entertained by Syllæus, who gave them lands, and went shares with them in their booty. These were the men whom Syllæus bound himself by oath to restore, together with the borrowed sum within the time limited. I can now with confidence defy any man to say that Herod took any other prisoners in Arabia than these free-booters, of whom several escaped. Thus does the calumny of the captives, which has been represented in so odious a light, appear to be no better than a fiction to provoke the indignation of the emperor: for I can take upon me to affirm, that, when the forces of the Arabians came upon us, and one or two of Herod's party fell, he then only defended himself; and there fell Nacebus, their general, and, in all, about twenty-five others, and no more. This number Syllæus hath enlarged, by multiplying every single soldier to an hundred; so that he reckons the slain to have been two thousand five hundred.”

Cæsar was so incensed at this relation, that, turning towards Syllæus, he sternly asked him, how many Arabians were slain in that action? After some hesitation, he confessed himself mistaken in the number, upon which they read the conditions of the bond, the arbitration of the governors, and the remonstrances of the several cities and towns, complaining of the injuries sustained from the robbers. Augustus, being now fully informed of the matter, passed sentence of death on Syllæus; took Herod into favour again; acknowledged a concern for his mistake, in listening to the calumnies that transported him to such severities against him; and reproached Syllæus as the compulsive cause of his ingratitude towards his best friends. In fine, Syllæus was sent back to Arabia, there to discharge the debt, and afterwards to be punished with death.

Cæsar was still offended with Aretas, for presuming to usurp royal authority, without having first obtained his consent, inasmuch that he determined to transfer the government of Arabia to Herod; but changed his mind, on reading the letter which Olympus and Volumnius brought him, containing invectives against his own sons. The deputies were instructed; if they found Cæsar pacifically disposed, to deliver him those letters, which they accordingly did; and Cæsar, upon reading them, reflecting on the advanced age, and turbulent temper, of Herod, retracted his resolution; called for the ambassadors of Aretas, and, after having spoken word of reproof on the temerity of their master, in not waiting till he had received the authority from him, accepted their presents, and confirmed Aretas in his government. Cæsar reconciled Aretas.

Cæsar, upon this reconciliation, wrote a letter of condolence to Herod, on account of his sons, giving him full power, if he found them engaged in so unnatural and impious a conspiracy, to proceed against them as parricides; but if, at length, it should happen that their misdemeanours amounted to no more than an intention to escape, he should content himself with an admonition, and not proceed to extremity. The sum of his advice was to call a council at Berytus, a city under the Roman jurisdiction, and there, with the assistance of the governors of the adjacent provinces, together with Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, hear and determine upon the whole matter, and bring the point to a final decision. His letter to Herod.

CHAP. XVII.

Herod, upon his reconciliation with Cæsar, calls a council at Berytus, and persecutes his sons with the utmost rancour. They resolve that Herod may dispose of his sons at option. Saturninus is for mitigating the punishment, while Volumnius urges death, upon which they are condemned. Herod goes for Tyre, and meets Nicolaus, who accompanies him to Cesarea. Tyro's generous resolution, and expostulation with Herod, in behalf of the brothers. Tryphon's information against Tyro. Herod's inhuman cruelty.

THIS letter from Cæsar afforded Herod the highest satisfaction, not only as a token of his reconciliation with the emperor, but as vesting him with full authority over his sons. It is remarkable, that, though, in former times of prosperity, he had treated his sons with great rigour, when life was in question, he abated his severity, and assumed a degree of moderation. But, upon the change of affairs, and his reinstatement in the favour of the Roman emperor, he became outrageous in his resentment, and proceeded against them with ungovernable rancour. Herod's barbarity his sons.

Pursuant to Cæsar's direction, he summoned a council to meet at Berytus, but excepted Archelaus, perhaps from personal pique, or apprehension that he would endeavour to frustrate his design. When the council was met according to summons, he did not produce his sons, but kept them in a village belonging to Sidon, that they might appear when called for. He then entered the council-chamber alone, and there preferred an accusation against his sons, in the presence of one hundred and fifty persons; but without premising his own misfortunes, or pointing out the necessity of the present proceeding. It was a charge fraught with language unbecoming a father, and accompanied with boisterous exclamations, and violent gestures, that indicated symptoms of fury bordering on phrenzy. His arguments were confused and inconsistent: no proofs were adduced to govern the opinion of the court. His assertions were founded on his own authority alone; and the bench seemed composed rather ther of the parties, than judges to determine upon evidence, and according to the grand principles of right and wrong.

There were some letters of the young princes read; but not one of them contained the remotest hint of any plot or contrivance against the prosecutor. All that could be inferred was, a consultation as to the method of escaping, together with some expressions of dissatisfaction and offence. When Herod came to that part of the letters, he endeavoured to pervert their obvious meaning, by adducing them as demonstrative evidence of a conspiracy, and most solemnly declared, it was worse than death to peruse their contents. He affirmed, he might insist upon the power he had received over his own children, both from nature and the grant of Cæsar; and added an allegation of a law of his own country, which enjoins, that, "If parents laid their hands on the head of him that was accused, the bye-standers were obliged to stone him to death," which, though he was ready to do in his country and kingdom, yet, at present, he would rather decline his privileges, and submit the matter to the further consideration of the council; not as judges to determine whether the case be as is represented, or not, since it is so indubitably manifest, but to take their opinion with respect to the justification of the sentence, as an instructive lesson to posterity, against such impious practices on the life of a parent.

The assembly plainly perceiving, from the evasive finess displayed throughout the whole proceeding, as well as the withholding of the princes from the presence of the court, that equity was totally suppressed, and a reconciliation impracticable, confirmed the authority of Herod with respect to the disposal of his sons. Upon this occasion Saturninus, a person of consular dignity, who had executed many honourable commissions, arose and observed, that "he was for punishing the princes, but not with death; as having children of his own, he was duly impressed with the case, and therefore would be very loth, after the calamities that the king of Judæa had endured already, to oppress him with the heaviest of all at the last." He was followed by his three sons, who spoke with feeling and spirit, and enforced the opinion delivered by their father. Volumnius, on the contrary, exerted himself with great vehemence against the princes; exclaiming, that nothing but death could expiate the horrid crime of parricide; and the majority coinciding with his opinion, carried the question.

The sentence was no sooner passed, than Herod hastened to Tyre, taking his sons with him; and meeting with Nicolaus, on his return from Rome, he related to him the circumstances that had passed at Berytus, and enquired of him the opinion that prevailed concerning the matter at Rome. Nicolaus informed him, that the princes were generally blamed for their foul practices, and deserved to be laid in chains: nay, that death was their legal due, if the conspiracy could be clearly proved; though the world imputed the prosecution rather to malice than justice. But if Herod found himself otherwise disposed, he might acquit them, without involving himself in an irretrievable difficulty. This Nicolaus gave as the opinion and judgment of his friends at Rome; upon which Herod, after a long pause, without making a single comment, bid Nicolaus put to sea with him, and they proceeded together to Cæsarea.

Upon their arrival at Cæsarea, they found that the point in dispute between Herod and his sons, was the general topic of conversation, and that the people waited the issue with the utmost anxiety. An apprehension prevailed, that the feuds and animosities of the family would come to a fatal conclusion. The case of the brothers was sincerely compassionated, though opinion was suspended, and popular resentment smothered.

As an exception to the general conduct upon the occasion, Tyro, a veteran in the military service, of distinguished valour, gave his opinion on the point with the utmost freedom. To this he might have been induced from having a son of the same age, and who had the strictest intimacy with Alexander. This honest veteran publicly exclaimed, that justice and truth were banished the earth; that nothing prevailed but malice and deceit; and that mankind were so blinded by their inordinate passions, that they could no longer discern right from wrong, or good from evil. This, though a dangerous freedom, was so noble an instance of virtue and resolution, that it could not fail of meeting with universal approbation; so that those who durst not follow the example, could not but revere the man who generously stood forth in vindication of oppressed innocence, and to stem the torrent of corruption.

Nor did his efforts stop here; for he boldly presented himself before the king, and being granted a private audience, thus addressed him: "Since, Sire, I labour under insupportable grief, I am determined to give it vent, though at the hazard of my life; and probably the liberty I take, if you are so disposed as to hear me with patience, may tend to your advantage. May I be permitted to enquire whither are fled that understanding and magnanimity, that, in time past, have carried you through so many difficulties? Whence comes this solitude and desertion of your friends and relations? For those I cannot deem such, that can behold the horrid transactions in your court and family, and stand still unconcerned spectators. Do you not perceive the tendency of these things? Can you resolve to take away the lives of these two princes, accomplished with every virtue, and subject yourself to an ambitious son, and those of your relations; you have so often doomed to punishment? Do you not find yourself tacitly condemned, and the case of your sons universally lamented; and is not your whole army, both officers and private soldiers, particularly afflicted for the princes, and enraged with the authors of their miseries?"

Some part of this expostulation the king heard with calm composure; but when Tyro touched upon the perfidy of his domestics, and launched out into an unbounded freedom, he deemed it rather a reproach than a caution, and sternly asked who these officers and soldiers were, to whom his declaration referred? Upon Tyro's naming them, Herod ordered them all together, with the veteran himself, to be taken up, and committed to prison.

Upon this occasion, one Tryphon, who was the king's barber, laid an information against Tyro, importing, that he repeatedly tampered with him, by promises of pecuniary reward, as well as the favour of Alexander, to cut the king's throat, while he was under the operation of the razor. Orders were immediately given, that Tyro, his son, and the informer, should be put to the torture. The son seeing his father so cruelly tormented, and so resolute in sustaining the anguish, without hope of mitigation, declared, "that, if the king would free him and his father from those excruciating pains, he would relate the truth." When the king had passed his word so to do, he said, "that an agreement was made, that his father, having private access to the king, should lay violent hands on him, if he suffered death, as he was almost certain it would be an act of generosity in favour of Alexander." Upon this declaration his father was delivered from present torture; but whether the confession was founded on truth, or whether it was a mere pretence to obtain deliverance, has not yet appeared.

Herod was now finally resolved to proceed to the execution of his purpose, without any further doubt or deliberation; so that calling the people together, he ordered 300 officers, together with Tyro, his son, and the informer, to be brought forth, who, upon his accusation of them to the multitude, were all stoned to death upon the spot. Alexander and Aristobulus, by their father's command, were sent away to Sebaste, and there strangled. Their bodies were deposited in a sepulchre at Alexandrion, with divers of their ancestors.

Josephus
in the proceedings of
against his sons.

It may, perhaps, seem unreasonable to suppose, that such an inveterate hatred should prevail betwixt father and sons, as to overcome all natural affection, and be productive of such dire effects. But it may justly deserve consideration, whether the cause arose from a continued course of provocation in the young princes, or from the insuperable obduracy and ambition of the king. With respect to the sons, they might, perhaps, in the heat of youthful passion, be too haughty and imperious; ready to entertain evil reports of their father, and partial judges of his conduct. They might be suspicious, and so eccentric in their words and actions, as to expose themselves to spies and informers, who sought for matter to alledge against them. On the other hand, what could argue greater weakness in Herod, or be more heinously criminal, than, without any proof or conviction of a treasonable design, or even so much as the presumption of a contrivance, to indulge a lawless, nay, more than brutal, passion, by putting to death his own sons, who possessed such rare accomplishments, both mental and personal; and in particular Alexander, the elder.

If he was determined on a condemnation, might not imprisonment or banishment have sufficed? Under such circumstances, there would have been no fear of treachery, and as little of open force, because of the patronage of the Roman power. But to deprive them of life, to gratify an ungovernable passion, can never be justified by any law, human or divine. He lived, indeed, afterwards to give additional proofs of his towering ambition, rancorous envy, and relentless cruelty, which he exercised, as occasion afforded, upon the rest of his relations; though, as will be seen in the sequel, some of them deserved the punishment. However, upon the whole, the barbarity of Herod must be an eternal stigma on his character.

C H A P. I.

Antipater is universally detested by the Jewish nation, for being accessory to the murder of the princes Alexander and Aristobulus. Maintains great sway in Judea. Endeavours in vain to delude Salome. Herod compels her to marry Alexas. Sends Glaphyra, the widow of Alexander, back to her father, Archelaus, king of Cappadocia. Antipater much disgusted at the respect in which the people held the memory of the princes. Herod is prevailed on to dissolve certain contracts.

Antipater
universally hated.

Herod has the name of king, but
the power.

ANTIPATER having, by his insidious arts, effected the destruction of his brothers, paved the way for compassing his design upon the life of his father, and indulged the most sanguine hopes of attaining to the very summit of his ambition. But he was soon disappointed in his towering expectation; for, although he was delivered from the fear of his brethren being rivals, as to the government, he found the general odium, he had incurred throughout the nation on their account, to be an obstacle almost insuperable. The alienation of the soldiery was a more disagreeable circumstance, as the security of these kings depended upon them, whenever they found the people desirous of innovations. These mischiefs he drew upon his head by fraud and perfidy; yet, if the exercise of his power was his delight, it might be said that he actually governed at this time, his father being king only in name, while the affairs of the state were under his guidance and direction. Nay, the very crime for which he deserved to die, passed for an instance of his affection and respect, as if he had consulted the preservation and safety of the king in the death of the princes; whereas, in reality, he gratified his aversion to the father in what he did; and such was the inveteracy of his malice, that he detested them even for the father's sake.

All Antipater's arts and contrivances now tended to make way for the taking off Herod, that he might have none to accuse him of the vile practices he was devising, and that Herod might have no refuge, nor any to afford him assistance, since such must have Antipater for their avowed enemy. He looked upon the government as his own after the death of Herod, but thought that delays would be dangerous, so far as they might lead to discovery of his insidious arts to his father, and thereby frustrate his ambitious design. To this end he spared neither cost or pains to gain the good will of his father's friends, by a winning courtesy, and most unbounded munificence. The objects of his regard were his friends at Rome in general; but he was particularly desirous of conciliating the esteem of Saturninus, governor of Syria, as also of his brother.

Nor did he despair of bringing over to his interest Salome, the wife of a particular friend, and confident of Herod. Antipater possessed all the art of address and insinuation, and could assume the mask of complacency to conceal the basest intentions. But he could not impose upon his aunt Salome, who saw through all his disguises, opposed artifice to artifice, and defeated his designs; though he had so ordered it, that her daughter, the widow of Aristobulus, was married to his uncle, by the mother's side, and the other daughter to Callaeus. Salome was passionately fond of Syllaeus; but Herod, by means of the assistance of the empress Julia, who represented to her the train of ill consequences that would result from her disobliging her brother, prevailed with her to marry Alexas.

Herod, at the same time, sent Glaphyra, the widow of his son Alexander, back to her father Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, returning the portion which he had with her, in order to obviate all ground of controversy, and took moreover great care of the education of his grand children. Alexander had two sons by Glaphyra; and Aristobulus, by Bernice, the daughter of Salome, had three sons and two daughters. Herod would occasionally present these children to his friends, deploring the hopeless fate of his sons, and praying that they might avoid the same.

Herod causes his grand children to be educated.

same, improve in virtue, and live to acknowledge the care of their education. He designed the daughter of his brother, Pheroras, for wife to the eldest son of Alexander; and the daughter of Antipater to the eldest son of Aristobulus; and to the son of Antipater, one of the daughters of Aristobulus; the other daughter to his son Herod; whom he had by the daughter of the high-priest; for polygamy, according to our law, is allowable.

Antipater's aversion increases with Herod's tenderness towards them.

The principal motive of the king, in these alliances, was the commiseration of their orphan state, and to render Antipater, by these inter-marriages, more affectionate towards them. But Antipater retained the same disposition for the children as he had before done for their fathers; and Herod's tenderness was so far from softening him, that, on the contrary, he became fierce and jealous; and the more the king favoured them on the one hand, the more Antipater hated them on the other, lest they should hereafter rival him; and especially with the assistance of Archelaus and Pheroras, the tetrarch, whose son at that time stood fair to marry one of the daughters. It was the greatest mortification to Antipater to observe the compassion the people retained for the care and memory of the unfortunate princes, and with what detestation they beheld the contrivers of their ruin, while they waited for an opportunity of exposing Antipater for his malicious practices against his brethren. It occurred to him, upon reflection, that the most effectual method of securing the government to himself, was to prevail with Herod to dissolve the contracts above-mentioned, which, with much importunity, he brought to pass, and obtained the promise of the daughter of Aristobulus for himself, and for his son the daughter of Pheroras, whereupon the former marriage agreements were annulled.

Herod prevailed on to dissolve certain contracts.

His wives and children.

King Herod, at this time, had nine wives. The first was the mother of Antipater. The second was the daughter of Simon, the high-priest, by whom he had a son, called by his own name. The third was the daughter of his brother. The fourth his cousin-german, by whom he had no issue. The fifth a Samaritan, by whom he had two sons, Antipater and Archelaus; and one daughter, called Olympias, who was afterwards married to Joseph, the king's kinsman. Archelaus and Antipater were brought up at Rome, by a particular friend. His sixth wife was Cleopatra, of Jerusalem, by whom he had Herod and Philip, who was also bred up at Rome. The name of his seventh wife was Ballas, by whom he had Phasael. His eighth was Phœdera. The ninth was Elpis, by whom he had two daughters, Roxana and Salome. As to his elder daughters by Mariamne, the mother of Alexander and Aristobulus, and whom Pheroras refused to marry, he gave the one to Antipater's sister's son, and the other to Phasael, the son of his brother. This was the posterity of Herod.

CHAP. II.

Zamaris, a Babylonian Jew, settles a colony in Syria. Is invited by Herod to Batanaea. Herod protects the liberties of the Jews. Philip levies taxes. Deaths of Zamaris and Jacimus; the latter of whom leaves his son Philip general of the army.

Herod fortifies himself against the Trachonites.

Zamaris leaves Babylon, and comes to dwell in Syria.

HEROD, being now desirous of securing himself on the side of the Trachonites, resolved to build a spacious village in the middle of the country, and to put a strong garrison in it, to serve as a check upon the inroads from that quarter; and, upon occasion, to fall out upon the enemy. While he was ruminating upon this project, he was given to understand, that a certain Jew had come from Babylon with 500 horsemen, with bows any arrows, and near a fifth part of them his own relations; and that, with these troops, he had passed the Euphrates, and now sat down near Daphne, in Syria, where Saturninus, the governor, gave him a castle, called Valatha, not far from Antioch, for his habitation. Herod, upon this intelligence, sent an invitation to the Jew to come over to him with all his people, pro-

misg them lands, and other conveniencies, in the territory of Batanaea, upon the borders of Trachon, with privileges of exemption from all duties and tributes for the land as well as for the men, and a commission only to defend that quarter against the incursions of vagrant plunderers.

Herod invites him to settle in Batanaea.

The Babylonian, induced by these offers, came thither with his people, took possession of the land, and built in it fortresses and a town, which he named Bathyra. By these means he not only protected the inhabitants from the inroads of the Trachonites, but secured the Jews also in their processions from Babylon to Jerusalem, according to the duty and practice of their profession. From this consideration he was joined by vast numbers of such Jews as conscientiously adhered to the religion and laws of their forefathers; and the country was well peopled, on account of their universal freedom from taxes. This continued during the life of Herod; but the person who succeeded him charged them with some small impositions; they were continued, however, for only a short time. Agrippa the Great, and his son, of the same name, imposed very heavy taxes upon them, as did the Romans after them, but never deprived them of personal liberty, as we shall take occasion to shew hereafter.

He builds Bathyra.

At length Zamaris, the Babylonian, to whom Herod had given this country for a possession, departed this life, having maintained an upright character, and left behind him children that inherited the virtues of their father, and amongst others Jacimus, a gallant commander, who had served the kings of Babylon in their guards. This Jacimus died in an advanced age, and left behind him a son, called Philip, who, for his exemplary probity and valour, was in such esteem with king Agrippa, that he made him general of his army.

Zamaris dies, and leaves a virtuous issue.

CHAP. III.

Antipater is vested with the administration of public affairs. A female combination. Salome discovers their counsels. They take part with the Pharisees, who refuse the oath of allegiance to Herod. A fine set upon them for their refusal is paid by the wife of Pheroras. Bagoas, and many of the Pharisees, put to death. Pheroras refuses to divorce his wife. Herod forbids Antipater and his mother all communication with Pheroras.

WHILE the affairs of Herod were in this confused state, he placed such a confidence in the faith, zeal, and affection of his son Antipater, that he vested him with the entire administration of government, so that all public affairs absolutely depended on his will. But he flagrantly abused the trust reposed in him, by glossing over falsehoods and injustice, with specious pretences of duty and loyalty to his father, so that, in effect, his artifice was as dangerous as his power. But none in appearance cultivated so strict a friendship with him as Pheroras; while Antipater artfully encompassed him with a female claw, that watched his words and actions; for Pheroras was in absolute subjection to his wife and her mother, notwithstanding the hatred he bore them for the indignities they had offered his virgin daughters. But these were matters too trivial to cause dissention between parties so necessary to each other in carrying on the main business, and who were all privy to so many important secrets; besides, Antipater was attached to them both on account of himself and his mother.

Antipater's great influence with Herod.

Apparent friendship between Antipater and Pheroras.

Salome, the king's sister, frequently thwarted their intentions; and being particularly informed of the whole plan of this female combination, had determined to make discovery of it to Herod; so that the accomplices finding their motions watched, and fearful of coming under the jealousy and displeasure of the king, contrived that their meetings in future should be more private than they had been, as the most effectual means of evading suspicion. As time and opportunity served, they would take occasion to revile each other, especially in the presence of

of Herod, or any of his friends, who would report such behaviour to him, and the plot was carried under this guise for some time.

But they could conceal from Salome neither the first contrivance, or the means through which they had made some progress in it. She traced their projects step by step, and communicated every particular to her brother, and not without aggravation. She represented to Herod, that "if their private assemblies, and clandestine counsels, were not founded upon a design on his life, they might as well be open and public; that their affectation of variance and feuds, when in public, while they preserved unanimity in private, were evident tokens of fraud and collusion; and that, in fact, they acted in perfect concert to accomplish one common purpose and design."

Thus did Salome state the matter to Herod, who, though he had received some previous hints of it, to which he gave credit, did not absolutely depend on his sister's veracity, conscious that calumny was one of her darling vices.

This female clan were much attached to a certain sect amongst the Jews, who valued themselves highly upon the exact skill they had in the law of their fathers, and would impose upon mankind a belief that they were the peculiar favourites of heaven. These were the Pharisees, a sect arrogant and crafty, who, through consummate pride and vanity, made no conscience of insulting majesty, and trampling upon royal authority. Accordingly, when the whole nation of the Jews were called upon to swear allegiance to the king and to Cæsar, there refused of this sect a number amounting to above 7000. Being condemned by the king to a fine for this refusal, the wife of Pheroras deposited it for them. In order to requite this kindness, as they pretended to possess a foreknowledge of events from Divine inspiration, they foretold that it was the Divine decree, that the kingdom should be transferred from Herod and his sons, to the princess, her husband Pheroras, and their issue.

Salome gave the king notice of this, and of the bribery and corruption that had been practised at court in favour of this interest. Upon strict search and enquiry, several Pharisees were apprehended and put to death, as the authors of this seditious presage. Amongst those who suffered upon the occasion, was Bagoas, and Herod's minion Carus, besides several of his family, that were convicted of the conspiracy upon the testimony of the Pharisees themselves. Bagoas was persuaded to maintain an idle notion, that he was to be celebrated as the benefactor of the prince that was designed for the throne; and every thing was to succeed with the new king, and the government to be established in his family.

When Herod had punished the criminal Pharisees, he called a council of his friends, and exhibited an accusation against the wife of Pheroras, alleging, "that it was through her counsel and advice, that his brother so contemptuously rejected the tender of the royal virgins to him in marriage; and that she had most unnaturally, and against all law, fomented feuds between brethren, both by deeds and words; that she had abetted the seditious Pharisees, in easing them of the fine, which he himself had imposed; and, in short, that she was the principal agent in the conspiracy." From these premises, he took occasion to recommend to Pheroras the propriety of putting away a woman of so infamous a character, without any persuasion from him, especially as matters were come to such a pass, that he must either disown her as a wife, or never expect to be owned by the king as a brother.

Pheroras was much affected by this passionate declaration of Herod, and peremptorily declared, that no consideration should move him to renounce his wife, since he would rather die than live without her company. Herod then moderated his anger, only forbidding Antipater and his mother any communication with Pheroras, and the female clan their usual assemblies. They promised obedience to the king's orders, but kept up their former intercourse, and especially that between Antipater and Pheroras.

CHAP. IV.

The jealousy of Herod alarms Antipater, who is sent to Rome with presents, and Herod's last will and testament. Syllæus charged with treason, and to be tried at Rome.

ANTIPATER having now a strong suspicion of his father's jealousy and displeasure, and being apprehensive of experiencing their effects, wrote to his friends at Rome, to have him sent for with all expedition to wait upon Augustus. His request being immediately complied with, Herod dispatched him with rich presents, and his last will and testament, wherein he declared Antipater his successor; or, in case of his decease, his son Herod, whom he had by the daughter of the high-priest.

At the same Syllæus, the Arabian, went to Rome, though he had neglected to obey the injunctions of Cæsar. Antipater there accused him of the same crimes of which he had formerly been accused by Nicolaus of Damascus, as advocate for Herod. Syllæus was also accused by Aretas, for having put to death, at Petra, several men of rank and character, without his knowledge or consent; and, amongst others, Sohemus, a person worthy of universal esteem, and likewise Fabatus, one of the emperor's servants. The circumstance relative to Fabatus was this:

There was one Corinthus in Herod's guards, a man in whom he particularly confided. Syllæus tampered with this man for a considerable sum of money, to take off the king; and the offer had such an effect, that he had promised to execute his proposal. Fabatus, having been made acquainted with this circumstance, immediately related it to the king. Corinthus, being put to the torture, confessed the whole plot. He also caused to be apprehended two Arabians, the one the head of a tribe, and the other a friend of Syllæus, who being both put to the torture, confessed that they came thither to press Corinthus to the execution of what he had undertaken, and to assist him in it, if there should be occasion. The informations were sent by Herod to Saturninus, and by him to Rome, where the cause was to be heard and decided.

CHAP. V.

Pheroras, at Herod's command, retires to his government, and swears not to return during the king's life. Herod falls sick, and sends for Pheroras, who excuses himself upon the plea of his oath. Death of Pheroras.

WHEN Herod found Pheroras inflexibly attached to his wife, he commanded him to retire to his government; and he most willingly obeyed; taking a solemn oath not to return during the life of Herod. Nor did he swerve from his vow; for the king soon after falling sick, he was requested to pay him a visit, and receive some secret orders from him before he died. Pheroras pleaded in excuse, that he was under oath, and durst not break it. Herod, however, so far relaxed in his hatred to his brother, that, when Pheroras himself fell sick soon after, without following his example, he, of his own accord, paid him a visit. The distemper carried him off; and the king gave orders for the conveyance of his body to Jerusalem, where it was honourably interred. The death of Pheroras became the origin of Antipater's misfortunes, though he was now at Rome; for justice at length arrested, and brought him to account for the blood of his brothers. I shall give a minute detail of this circumstance, that it may be a warning to mankind to conduct their lives by the rules of virtue.

CHAP. VI.

Enquiry into the death of Pheroras: Poison is administered to him by a confidant of Syllæus. Several women put to the torture. A charge exhibited and proved against the mother of Antipater. Doris stripped of her jewels and banished. Antipater joins in a plot to poison the king. The widow of Pheroras makes discovery of the whole. Last words of Pheroras in discharge of his conscience. More witnesses examined. Herod puts away his wives. Bathyllus brings poison from Rome for Antipater's mother and Pheroras.

Enquiry concerning the death
of Pheroras.

AFTER the performance of the funeral obsequies, two of Pheroras's freed-men, who had been much esteemed by him, applied to Herod, and intreated him not to suffer the murder of his brother to pass unavenged, but to make the minutest search, in order to bring the perpetrator of it to condign punishment. They informed the king, who gave great credit to their words, that their master supped with his wife the night he was taken ill, and that a certain potion was brought him with a sort of food that he had not been accustomed to eat: that when he had eaten, he died of it: that his potion was brought out of Arabia, under pretence of its being a love potion, but, in reality, to take him off, as the Arabian women are skilled in compounding such poisons. The woman, against whom they alledged this charge, was confessedly an intimate friend of one of Syllæus's mistresses. It was also deposed, that both the mother and sister of Pheroras's wife had been at her place of abode, persuaded her to sell this potion, and brought it with them the day before it was administered to him at supper.

The king was so enraged at hearing the story, that he ordered several of the women to be put to the torture, free as well as slaves. They continued some time without confession, till, at length, one of them, in the agony of torment, exclaimed, "Would to heaven the mother of Antipater were now under the same anguish, for that base woman has been the cause of all our miseries." This discovery put Herod upon a resolution to extort from them every particular of the plot, and to run through the whole project from circumstance to circumstance; as, at their private meetings and consultations, the occasional discourses that passed betwixt Herod and Antipater had been minutely discussed, as well as the means that were to be used to keep matters from the knowledge of Pheroras.

The female witnesses farther enlarged upon the hatred Antipater bore his father, and that he had complained to his mother how very long he lived, inasmuch, that, as he was himself advanced in years, if the kingdom should devolve to him, it would not afford him any great pleasure: that, as there were many brothers, who had children bringing up, his hopes were but uncertain: that, in case of his death, Herod had ordained that the kingdom should be conferred not on his son, but rather on a brother. It was added, that he had accused the king of great barbarity, and of the slaughter of his sons; and that it was from the fear he was under, lest he should do the like to him, that he contrived this journey to Rome, as well as sent Pheroras back to his government.

These particulars were consonant with what his sister had told him, and therefore tended to corroborate her testimony, and free her from the suspicion of unfaithfulness. Being perfectly satisfied of the treasonable designs of Doris, the mother of Antipater, Herod immediately stripped her of all her jewels to the value of many talents, and expelled her the palace, while he treated the women of Pheroras's family with more lenity on account of their information.

There was abundant proof against Antipater; but the most unpardonable article of his accusation was drawn from the confession of one Antipater, a Sa-marian, an officer of great trust under Antipater, the son of Herod. This man, among other things, averred, that his master had put a mortal poison into the hands of Pheroras, for the king to take in his absence, as the work might then be effected with less suspicion. The poison (he said) was brought out of Egypt, by Antiphilus, a friend of Antipater, and sent to Pheroras by Theudion, the brother of the mother of Antipater, and by that means came to the wife of Pheroras, her husband having given it her to keep. When the king interrogated her concerning it, she confessed; and, as she was running to fetch it, she cast herself down from one of the palace galleries into the court, but the bruise she received was not mortal. As soon as she came to herself, the king promised her and her domestics pardon; upon condition of their declaring the whole truth; but threatened them with the severest torments, if they concealed any part of the design.

Upon this Pheroras's widow bound herself, by a solemn oath, to lay open the whole matter, without the least reserve, and declared what was generally supposed to be true; that "The potion was brought out of Egypt by Antiphilus, and that his brother, who was a physician, had procured it: that, when Theudion brought it, she kept it, upon Pheroras's committing it to her, being prepared, at the instance of Antipater, for the king: that, when Pheroras fell sick, and the king treated him with such brotherly kindness, he was greatly affected thereby, and calling to her, after his departure, exclaimed, that Antipater had inveigled him into a most unnatural plot for poisoning his brother, and the traitors's father: that Pheroras, recoiling at so horrid an act, and determined not to incur such heinous guilt in leaving this mortal life, requested her immediately to bring the poison, and throw it into the fire before his face: that, upon these words, she fetched it, and threw the greater part into the fire, reserving a small remainder for herself, in case it should be her lot, after the decease of her husband, to be put to extremities."

of the widow of Phe-
roras.

With these words she produced the box containing the poison before them all; when the mother of Antiphilus, and another brother of his, being both put to the question, they confirmed the matter, by giving evidence as to the identity of the box itself. There was an accusation exhibited also against one of the king's wives, the daughter of the high-priest; and as they could not bring her to confession, Herod cast her off, and struck her son, of his own name, out of his will, though he had appointed him his successor, if Antipater had died before him. He deposed Simon, his father-in-law, from the pontificate; and raised Matthias, of Jerusalem, the son of Theophilus, to that dignity.

In the mean time Bathyllus, one of Antipater's freed-men, came from Rome, and being put to the torture, confessed that he brought poison for Antipater's mother, and for Pheroras; that if the former potion did not operate, they might try the other. There came also, at the same time, letters from Herod's friends at Rome, by the approbation, and at the suggestion, of Antipater, to accuse Archelaus and Philip, as if they calumniated their father on account of the murder of Alexander and Aristobulus; and they commiserated their unhappy fate, suggesting also, that they were recalled, to be treated in the same manner with those who went before them. These letters had been procured, for great rewards, by Antipater's friends, while he himself wrote to Herod in his usual prevaricating manner, both accusing and excusing the brothers, to gloss over the matter, by means of specious pretence, and ambiguous hints. The controversy was still maintained between Syllæus and Antipater; the latter of whom had procured a number of friends and advocates, by means of presents, amounting to an expense of two hundred talents. It seems a matter of wonder, that there should be so many accusations exhibited against him in Judæa, during the space of seven months, without his having knowledge of them; though this may be reconciled to probability,

CHAP. VII.

Artful correspondence between Antipater and Herod. News of the death of Pheroras. Antipater goes to Sebaste, where he is universally execrated. Quintilius Varus, governor of Syria, holds counsel with Herod at Rome. Antipater comes in state to the palace. Is admitted, but his train excluded. A charge of treason and fratricide exhibited against him. Trial appointed for the next day. Quintilius Varus to preside on the bench. Salome and all the evidences produced. Herod prefers his accusation. Antipater makes his own defence. Nicolaus of Damascus, counsel for Herod, urges the prosecution, and applies to Varus for justice. Divers charges alledged to Antipater. His character painted in the most odious light. He is committed to prison. Letters intercepted, and discoveries made. Herod sends a state of the whole case to Rome.

Herod writes to Antipater to hasten home.

ANTIPATER, having written to the king, that he was settling his affairs at Rome, and preparing for his return, Herod concealed his resentment, and wrote back to him, desiring him not to defer his journey, lest any misadventure should befall him in his absence. The king avoided any hints of displeasure in his letter, except some trifling complaints against his mother, which, on his return, he declared should subside. Indeed, he made professions of candour and friendship, fearing that, through suspicion, he might defer his journey, and that, during his continuance at Rome, he might concert plans for supplanting him in the government.

This letter came to Antipater's hands as he was upon the way in Cilicia: but he had received the news of the death of Pheroras before, at Tarentum, and with much concern; not from any affection to Pheroras, but from disappointment in his not having taken off his father, according to promise. Upon his arrival at Calenderis, a city of Cilicia, he deliberated with himself, whether he should proceed or return, being much chagrined at the disgrace his mother had sustained in her ejection. Some of his friends advised him to wait, in expectation of farther intelligence; others to hasten home without delay, not doubting but, upon his arrival, he would invalidate all charges brought against him, as his accusers derived all their weight and importance from his absence, being thereby prevented from refuting their tales and calumnies.

These arguments prevailed with him to proceed, so that he continued his course, and soon landed at Sebaste, a port erected by Herod, at an incredible expence, in honour of Augustus Cæsar, and called after his name Cæsarea. Here he found himself in a most mortifying situation, as now, on his return, he received not one token of respect: nay, on the contrary, was insulted with execrations; whereas before, at his departure, he was followed with warm benedictions, and joyful acclamations. Nor could the people but entertain an aversion for him, while they supposed he was going to receive punishment for the horrid crime of fratricide.

Antipater is ill received at the port of Cæsarea.

Quintilius Varus succeeds to the government of Syria.

Quintilius Varus, successor of Saturninus in the government of Syria, was at this time at Jerusalem, coming thither at the request of Herod, to assist him with his advice in the present state of affairs. As they were sitting together in counsel, Antipater came into the palace, arrayed in his robes of state; the gates having been set open to him, though his train were excluded. This circumstance threw him into some agitation of mind, which was greatly increased, upon his presenting himself to his father's embrace, when he was spurned from him with reproaches of fratricide and treason, and given to understand, that he would be publicly in court charged with those crimes the following day, and that Varus would preside as judge upon his trial. Retiring in the utmost confusion, he was met by his mother and wife (the daughter of Antigonus, Herod's predecessor) from whom having learned all circumstances concerning him, he then prepared himself for defence upon his trial.

On the day following the court assembled, Varus and the king sitting in judgment, with their friends about them. Salome, the king's sister, was cited thither also, with others of their relations. There were brought thither likewise all those who had made any voluntary discovery, or any confession upon torture; and besides, some of the domestics of Antipater's mother, who had been taken up a little before his return, and brought with them letters, importing, by way of caution, "that he should by no means come back, since the whole matter was come to his father's knowledge, and Cæsar was the only refuge he had left." Antipater then threw himself at the king's feet, requesting only to be admitted to his defence, and not condemned unheard. Herod ordered him to rise and stand forth to take his trial. The king then addressed himself to the court, in words to the following purport:

"I am (said he) an unfortunate man, to have been the father of such children, and to fall at length, in my advanced age, into the hands of such a wretch as Antipater. I have been assiduously attentive to his education, nor have I denied him any requests he ever made. And what is his return? A conspiracy against my life, and an attempt to seize on a crown by impious violence, which, by the double right of title and free gift, must devolve upon him. What advantage can he propose to himself in the gratification of so extravagant an ambition? as I made him a successor by will, and effectually a partner with me, in dignity, glory, and power, even during my own life, settled on him an annual income of fifty talents, and made him an allowance of three hundred more for the expence of his journey to Rome? With respect to the charge brought by him against his brothers, if they were guilty, he has imitated their example; if not, he has alledged groundless charges against his near relations, and by that means absolved them, and incurred himself the guilt of parricide."

The king could not proceed through an involuntary effusion of tears, and therefore desired Nicolaus of Damascus, his old and particular friend, who was thoroughly instructed in every circumstance relative to the case, to proceed to the examination of the witnesses, and an explanation of their respective evidences. Antipater, by way of prevention, applied himself to his defence, and turning to his father, thus spoke:

"Can there be a probability (said he) that, after having rescued my father from the treacherous designs of so many others, I should at length turn traitor to him myself, or fully the reputation of a tried allegiance with so foul a blot? Could I desire to be greater or more happy than I was? Or could I be actuated by such egregious folly, as, under the most splendid circumstances, to expose myself to infamy and misery? The succession was settled upon me according to every form of law; and I was so far admitted by the king's bounty into a share with him in the exercise of his royal power, that I was in the possession of the government, in effect rather than expectation, and that without any one to controul me, or envy my claim. Why should I seek that with danger, of which I acquired the quiet enjoyment by the rectitude of my conduct? or expose myself to certain infamy, for the vain flattery of an uncertain hope? especially considering the consequences of this ambition, with respect to my brothers, whom I myself accused, convicted, and punished. This I did, and of this I shall never repent, but, on the contrary, value myself on the merit of that service, question.

“ service, as the highest instance I could give my “ honoured father of filial duty, and inviolable alle“ giance. With respect to my general conduct in “ the city of Rome, I dare appeal to Cæsar him“ self, who can no more be imposed upon than an “ oracle, and could produce several letters, under “ his own hand, in my favour. Would it not be “ unjust, would it not be impious, to oppose the “ calumnies of abandoned men to the authority of “ such unquestionable evidence? or a set of mis“ creants, whose chief pleasure is to embroil the “ royal family, and who have taken the advantage, “ in my absence, of possessing the people with de“ famatory rumours against me, which they could “ never compass so long as I was within distance of “ speaking for myself. With respect to the evidence “ extorted by the rack, it is commonly false, be“ cause the anguish of extreme pain naturally im“ pels the sufferer to many things, to gratify those “ at whose instance they are put to the question.”
This said, he offered himself to be put to the question, and abide the issue of it.

Antipater delivered his defence with such energy as to excite the compassion of the whole court, and draw tears even from his enemies; nay, Herod himself was observed to relent, although he did his utmost to conceal it.

When Antipater had gone thus far, Nicolaus took up the cause where the king left it; scanned every article, cited and summed up the proofs, the names of the witnesses, and the particular confessions of those that had been put to the question.
He passed then to the subject of the king's bounty, care, and tenderness, in the education of his children, and how ill it was requited. “ As for Alexander “ and Aristobulus, while they were under the do“ minion of ambition, rather than avarice, and “ hurried on by the intemperate motions of youth “ and hot blood, it was not so much a wonder for “ them (said he) to be debauched by evil counsel, “ into a neglect or contempt of their duty; but as “ to the case of Antipater, it was worse than bru“ tal; for in the very fiercest of beasts there is a “ kind of natural gratitude for their keepers:
“ whereas this man was so far from being gained “ upon by the goodness and bounty of an indul“ gent father, that, as he was not to be deterred by “ the calamitous example of his brothers, so, on the “ contrary, he valued himself upon an emulation of “ their wickedness and cruelty. Was it not you “ yourself, Antipater, (says he,) that first discovered “ their design? Were not you then the prosecutor?
“ and you yourself again, the director of the sen“ tence, and consequently of the punishment? This “ is not to reflect upon your zeal and indignation
“ in so just a cause; but it astonishes me to find you “ so bitter against your brothers, for the very same “ thing that you do yourself; which manifestly “ shews, that your business was not so much the “ preservation of the father, as the ruin of the chil“ dren; and, under colour of a severe brother, to “ get the reputation of a tender and dutiful son;
“ and so with the more security to make way to the “ king himself. This was the exploit you were “ about. How came it to pass else, that the bro“ thers were put to death, and not their accom“ plices? What could be the meaning, or the end “ of this; but first, that you and they were agreed “ upon the matter; and secondly, that, as soon as “ the first difficulty should be over, they might be “ at hand to help you out with the next? So that “ you had a double satisfaction in the contempla“ tion of your wickedness: the one was by imposing “ publicly upon the world a most flagitious im“ piety for meritorious virtue; the other was in the “ carrying on, and the hopes of executing that hor“ rid barbarity yourself, which you took upon you “ to revenge in others. If you had heartily detest“ ed that malice, you would as well have abhorred
“ the imitation of it. But you have had the pre“ caution, however, to take the best people out of “ the way, and to set yourself clear of competitors, “ being resolved to leave neither rivals or wit“ nesses; and that being done, to crown the murders

“ of the brothers with that of the father; and by “ so doing, not only to escape the punishment you “ have deserved, but to bring your parent to bear “ the burden of your crimes, in such a parricide as “ was never heard of before: for the treason was “ not formed against a person of the common race “ of fathers, but against a parent tender and in“ dulent to the highest degree; the conspirator “ marked out for the succession already, a half“ sharer in the crown by advance, settled before“ hand in the present enjoyment of his greatness, and “ secure in the reversion of it by his father's will:
“ but your insatiable desires were not to be bounded “ by his goodness, but by such measures only as “ your own ingratitude and perverseness should pre“ scribe. Your own half of his right would not “ answer your end, unless you might have his part “ too. Your pretence was the saving of him, when,
“ at the same time, the plot was to destroy him: and “ the crime was not all your own, but your mother “ was made a party in it, and the whole family was “ by it embroiled. After all this, what can you “ think of the insolence of calling your father “ beast? But neither your relations or your bene“ factors are to escape the poison of your scandal:
“ and, as if the venom of your own heart had not “ been sufficient to instruct and irritate a revenge;
“ you have called to your help your guards, coun“ sellors, and suborners of both sexes, in a confede“ racy against one ancient man: and now, after the “ torturing of so many men and women, free and “ slaves, one with another, upon your account, and “ after such a cloud of undeniable evidences, you “ have yet the confidence to out-face the truth, and “ to follow your enterprize upon the life of your “ father, with an attempt upon the authority of the “ very law that punishes such criminals: and this
“ you do in contradiction to the equity of Varus, “ and to the universal measures of natural justice.
“ What is it that makes you disparage extorted tes“ timonies, but because you would derogate from “ the credit of those proofs that lay open to your “ wickedness, and conduce to the preservation of “ your father?

“ Sir, (says Nicolaus to Varus,) by the majesty of “ the Roman empire, and by your own honour, I “ adjure you that you vindicate the king from the “ indignities of his own family, and deliver up this “ monster of hypocrisy to death; that, under a pre“ text of reverence to his father, hunted after the “ blood of his brothers; and, if he had not been “ reasonably detected, his father's turn would have “ been next, to make his own way to the crown.
“ You know well that parricide is no private crime, “ but a public affront to the laws of society, and of “ reasonable beings; and so abominable a pollution “ in the very thought, as well as in the act, that “ whoever suffers it to pass unpunished, offers an “ indignity to human nature itself.”

Nicolaus adverted farther to some idle expressions which fell from the mother of Antipater concerning predictions, sacrifices relating to the king, and the succession of the crown, (stories Antipater had related in an hour of regale with Pheroras's family,) examinations upon torture, and matters which concerned the testimony of witnesses: in fine, every thing was advanced by this able advocate for Herod that could tend to criminate Antipater. To add to his mortification and perplexity, those men who were acquainted with his practices, but had concealed them through fear, when they saw he had been exposed to the accusations of former witnesses, and that his extraordinary fortune, which had supported him hitherto, had now evidently betrayed him into the hands of his enemies, who were insatiable in their revenge, discovered whatever they knew.

Antipater is exposed to a general accusation.

His ruin was, indeed, effected; but not by the enmity of those who were his accusers, so much as his own abominable devices against his father and brethren, exciting disorders in the family, causing them to embroe their hands in the blood of each other,

other, and expressing his detestation and regard, not from principle, but merely to subserve his present purpose.

The evidence in proof of what had been alledged against him could not be set aside, because the witnesses neither spoke out of favour to Herod, nor were they obliged to conceal what they knew by any apprehension of danger; so that they frankly inveighed against his enormous crimes, which they declared deserving of the highest punishment; not so much for the king's safety, as to deter mankind from following so infamous an example. So many accusations were voluntarily exhibited against him, that Antipater, notwithstanding his shrewdness and effrontery, had nothing to advance by way of refutation.

When Nicolaus, and the rest of the accusers, had left off speaking, Varus addressed himself to Antipater, telling him, if he had any thing to offer in his own defence, the court was ready to hear him, as his father and himself were equally desirous of finding him entirely innocent. Antipater then cast himself upon the ground, and appealed to the Great Searcher of Hearts, beseeching him to vindicate his innocence, as to any injurious design upon his father, by some evident token from heaven, that would convince the world of his integrity. This is the usual method with men destitute of virtue; when they undertake actions, it is in conformity to their own inclinations, as if they believed the Supreme Being had no concern with human affairs: but when once they are found out, and are in danger of undergoing the punishment due to their crimes, they endeavour to overthrow all the evidence against them by an hypocritical appeal to the great fountain of truth and justice. This was the very case of Antipater, who, when he acted, in every instance, as if there had been no Supreme and Superintending Being, and was in consequence arrested by justice, but had nothing to invalidate the evidence adduced against him, presumptuously insulted the Majesty of Heaven, ascribed it to his power that he had been preserved hitherto, and produced to all who were present, the difficulties he had undergone in exerting himself for the preservation of his father.

Varus, finding he could give no direct answer to any of the questions, except appeals to heaven, ordered the potion to be brought before the court, in order to make trial of the force of it. It was accordingly brought, and being administered to criminal under sentence of condemnation, he immediately expired. Upon this experiment the court rose, and Varus went away the next day to Antioch, the place of his usual abode, as the kings of Syria commonly make that the place of their general residence.

The particulars that passed between Varus and Herod were not known to the generality of the people, though it was supposed, upon the whole, that his proceedings towards his son were according to his entire approbation. When Herod had committed him to prison, he sent letters to Cæsar at Rome, by messengers, who were directed to inform him of the heinous crime of which Antipater had been found guilty. At this very time a letter was found written to Antipater, by Antiphilus, out of Egypt, which, when opened, appeared to contain the following contents. "I have sent you Acme's letter at the hazard of my life. You well know I am in danger from two families, if I am discovered. I wish you success in your present undertaking."

The king made a strict enquiry for the other letter of Antiphilus's servant; who brought that which had been read; but he denied having received it, till at length it was discovered enclosed within a seam of his upper garment: the contents were these: "I have written to your father according to the purport of your desire. I have taken a copy, and sent it as if it came from Salome to my mistress (Julia.) You will find, when you read it, that Herod will punish Salome as plotting against him." This pretended letter of Salome to Julia was composed by Antipater, as to its real meaning, but in the words of Acme it ran thus: "I have done my endeavour that nothing which passes should be concealed from you: therefore, upon finding a letter written from Salome to my mistress against you, I have taken a copy and sent it you, at the hazard of my life, but for your advantage. The reason she wrote it was her great desire of being married to Syllæus. Do you therefore destroy this letter, that I may not come into danger of my life." Acme had written to Antipater himself, and informed him that, in obedience to his command, she had herself written to Herod, as if Salome had laid a plot against him, and had also sent a copy of a letter, as coming from Salome to her mistress. This Acme was a Jewess, and servant to Julia, Cæsar's wife. She carried on this device from an attachment to Antipater, by whom she had been bribed with large presents to assist him in his infamous practices against his father and his aunt.

Herod was so enraged at this late instance of the baseness of Antipater, that he was ready to order him to immediate execution, not only for having plotted against his life and his sister's, but even corrupted Cæsar's domestics. Salome did all in her power to instigate him to it, calling upon him to slay her, if he could produce any credible testimony that she had acted in this manner. Herod sent for his son, interrogated him on the matter, and called upon him to offer what he could in his own vindication. Being detected in his villainy, he stood mute; upon which Herod commanded him, without delay, to make discovery of his associates in these abominable practices, when he laid the whole upon Antiphilus, mentioning none else. Herod hereupon had resolved to lend this miscreant to Cæsar to answer for his crimes; but fearing, lest, through the assistance of his friends there, he might escape condign punishment, he kept him close prisoner, and sent ambassadors to Rome with a state of the case, instructions and copies of the letters given in evidence, and, in particular, with an account of Acme's being concerned in the plot.

CHAP. VIII.

Herod is seized with a distemper, and makes his will. A sedition amongst the Jews abetted by two eminent men, Judas and Matthias. Herod's life despaired of. The golden eagle is thrown down from the temple at the instance of Judas and Matthias. They are taken into custody. Justify themselves. Sent bound to Jericho. Matthias is deposed from the pontificate, and Jozar advanced to that dignity. The insurgents are burnt alive. Herod's distemper increases. He sends for Salome and Alexas. His final cruelty.

WHILE Herod's ambassadors were making the best of their way with their letters and instructions for Rome, he fell into a distemper, made his will; and having conceived an unfavourable opinion of Archelaus and Philip, through the calumnies of Antipater, he declared Antipas, his youngest son, his successor. He bequeathed a thousand talents to Cæsar; and to his wife Julia, his children, friends, and freed-men, five hundred talents. The rest of his money, with his lands and revenues, he distributed amongst his children and grand children; and left his sister Salome a very considerable fortune, in acknowledgment of her unshaken fidelity. Being now in the twentieth year of his age, and despairing of recovery, he became so petulant and choleric, as to be the plague and detestation of all around him: and he seemed to have indulged this disposition and temper, through a prevailing conceit that he was fallen into contempt and odium with the people, who were therefore pleased with his misfortunes. Indeed, he was confirmed in this opinion by a commotion that soon happened upon the following occasion.

a sedition.

There were two men, Judas and Matthias, who had acquired great reputation amongst the Jews, for their learning, eloquence, and skill in the laws; and were particularly beloved by the people, for the care they took in training the rising generation to the knowledge and practice of the duties of their profession. When these men, eminent for their attachment to the religion and customs of their country, as handed down from their ancestors, found that his life was despaired of, they excited the younger part of the people to destroy the new structures which the king had erected, contrary to the law of their fathers, giving them all assurance of obtaining the rewards due to their exertions in so noble a cause. They represented to them, that all the broils and factions in the king's family, and the unusual distemper with which he was now afflicted, were judgments upon him for his innovations. Amongst other instances of superstitious magnificence, they mentioned the large golden eagle, of prodigious weight and value, set over the portal of the temple, observing, that, as that was in direct violation of the Jewish law, which positively forbids the use of images in such cases, it would be a meritorious action to pull down the eagle.

Judas and Matthias tempted to pull down Herod's

from the front of the temple.

To enforce this injunction, they laid before them, "that, though it might be an enterprise of danger, a glorious death was much more eligible than a life of conformity to superstitious practices; and that their blood could not be better spent than in the vindication of the laws and rites of their country, which would immortalize their names, when otherwise the noble and ignoble would be undistinguished in the same common fate; therefore it behoved all men, of honour and virtue, to improve the irreversible decree of death, by a right choice of the most glorious occasion for it; by which means they would transmit the reward and fame of laudable actions to their posterity."

This address was no sooner finished, than a rumour was spread abroad of the king's death, which enforcing the matter recommended, the populace mounted the portal at noon day, tore down the eagle, and hewed it in pieces with axes, in the sight of a vast concourse of spectators, who were in the temple. The captain of the king's guard, immediately upon hearing this uproar, hastened with a band of soldiers to prevent further mischief, supposing it a matter of more consequence than it was; for coming to the spot, there was no enemy to be seen, but a rude undisciplined multitude, that were all scattered upon the first charge, except about forty of the most resolute, who, with their leaders, Judas and Matthias, stood their ground upon a point of honour.

These were taken and carried prisoners to the king, who demanded of them, if they had been so impiously daring as to lay violent hands upon that sacred figure? They replied, "they had it in contemplation a long time; and at length coming to a resolution, they acted like men of virtue and courage, in putting it into execution: that what they had done, was in vindication of the honour of the Supreme object of their adoration, and the precepts of their great master, whose disciples they professed themselves to be: that they humbly presumed the king would not make it a matter of wonder, if they preferred the laws they had received from Moses, and, indeed, from their Creator, before any decree whatsoever: that they did not suffer for evil doing, but for the sake of conscience; and that they were ready to deliver up their bodies in this cause, either to punishment or death." It appears, from this justification of their conduct, that their profession and practice agreed, and that they were ready to suffer with the same resolution as they had acted with before.

The king ordered them to be sent in chains to Jericho, where he summoned a great council of the leading men amongst the Jews, and being very infirm, was carried in a chair to the assembly. He laid before them, "that he had undergone indefatigable pains and labour for the service of the commonwealth; rebuilt their temple at an immense charge;

No. 23.

"a work that the whole Asmonean race had not been able to compass in an hundred and twenty-five years: that he had not only rebuilt the temple, but beautified, endowed, and enriched it with ornaments and presents, worthy of so magnificent an undertaking." He concluded with observing, "that, when he thought he had secured the glory of his memory, by the good offices he had performed in his public character, he was treated with ingratitude and indignity, insulted in the face of his people, his gifts and oblations torn from the very temple, and an act originating from pious motives, construed into sacrilege."

Herod states
the case to the council.

The leading men of the council, to prevent the dangerous consequences of that degree of rage into which Herod might probably be hurried upon the occasion, exculpated themselves, by declaring not only their innocence of the fact, but their opinion that the rioters deserved the severest punishment; and by this declaration the king was pacified towards them. As a token of his severest repentment, he deprived Matthias of the high-priesthood, upon a presumption that he was an abettor of the outrage, and conferred the dignity on Jozar, his brother-in-law. After Herod had deprived Matthias of the pontificate, he gave orders for the burning of the other Matthias, whom he termed the ring-leader of the sedition, and all his companions with him, alive. As it fell out, there was that night an eclipse of the moon.

Herod's distemper now greatly increased, infomuch, that it appeared a judgment upon him for his crimes. He laboured under a most malignant fever, attended with an asthma, cramps, and contractions of the nerves, together with other most nauseous symptoms. Notwithstanding his most deplorable situation, he indulged hope of recovery; sent throughout his kingdom for physicians and remedies; and passed over the river Jordan himself to the hot baths at Callirrhoe, that empty themselves into the lake of Asphaltites. These waters, besides their mineral virtue, are not unpleasant to the palate. On coming to this place, his physicians ordered him to bathe in a vessel of oil, which had such effect upon him, that his attendants thought he was at the point of death: however, he survived this operation some time. But finding, at length, all hopes of recovery vain and delusive, he appointed a donation of fifty drachmas a man to be distributed amongst the soldiers, large sums amongst his friends and officers, and so returned to Jericho, where he became so choleric, that he formed, as his last resolution, a project that indicated madness and cruelty in the extreme.

distemper and torments.

He sent out a summons to all the principal men of the Jewish nation to repair immediately to him at Jericho, and not fail, upon pain of death. Upon their appearance, according to the proclamation, he ordered them all to be shut up in the circus, (a place for horse races,) one with another, guilty or innocent, and having sent for his sister, Salome, and Alexas, her husband, addressed them in words to the following effect: "The time of my departure approaches. I am oppressed with pains, and death is the common lot of mankind. I cannot but feel myself agitated at the thought of being deprived of those funeral honours which are due to royalty. I am conscious of the treatment I shall receive at the hands of the Jews: they detested me when living, and will of course rejoice when I am no more. But it lies in the power of you two to afford me some alleviation of my grief from this cause; and it is no more than a duty you owe me. Follow my direction, and I dare yet promise myself the most magnificent funeral solemnity that ever prince had, to my own entire satisfaction, and without a single tear of hypocritical affectation. The moment I expire, let the circus be surrounded with soldiers, and the word of command given to destroy every man within the enclosure. Let my death be kept a profound secret till the work is accomplished; in the due execution of which, you will lay a double obligation upon me: the one, in the performance "of my will; and the other, in the celebration of my death, with the honour of a public mourning."

He accompanied these words with tears and sighs, adjuring his relations, by all that was sacred, and by every tie of consanguinity and friendship, to be punctual in the discharge of the trust reposed in them, which they accordingly promised to execute in the minutest particular.

The author's judgment of Herod.

From this circumstance it will be easy to form a judgment of the temper and disposition of this most execrable of mankind, who not only took a pleasure in exercising cruelties upon his nearest relations, from a principle of love for life, but, on his departure, left a commission, that, by its execution, should put the whole nation into mourning, as one of every family was to be slain, and this without any injury, provocation, or exception; whereas, amongst people who are not dead to the feelings of humanity, it is usual to bury all animosity in the grave of our departed fellow mortals.

CHAP. IX.

Acme put to death by order of Augustus Cæsar. Antipater left to Herod's discretion. Herod attempts to kill himself. Is prevented by his nephew Abiath. Antipater, upon a presumption of the death of the king, treats with the keeper of the prison about his escape. The keeper gives information to Herod, who orders him for immediate execution.

Herod's ambassadors come from Rome with agreeable news.

AS Herod was giving these commands to his relations, his ambassadors arrived from Rome, with an answer to the letter they were commissioned to deliver to Cæsar. The substance was briefly this: "That Augustus had caused Acme to be put to death for a correspondence with Antipater; and had left Antipater himself to the king his father, either to be put to death, or banished, according to his direction." It afforded Herod the greatest satisfaction to find himself both revenged on Acme, and at liberty to dispose of his son as he pleased. But though this information gave him some temporary relief, he soon relapsed into his former extremity of pain, and, in an outrageous fit, called for an apple and a knife, it being usual with him to pare his own apples. He was observed to look suspiciously about him, as if he had some intent of stabbing himself: but his nephew, Abiath, kept an eye upon him, and, at the very instant of the attempt, caught hold of his right hand, with an outcry, and prevented it.

Herod attempts to kill himself.

The exclamation alarmed the court a second time, and it was generally supposed that the king was at that moment expiring. Antipater therefore taking it for granted, and making no doubt of the death of his father, entertained an assurance of procuring his liberty, and by that means of paving his way to the throne. In this confidence he treated with the keeper of the prison about his discharge, holding forth to him large offers and promises, both of present reward, and future preferment, when he should come to the crown. The keeper, so far from complying with his proposal, discovered the whole matter to the king, who detested him before, but, was so enraged by this representation, that, though in the very agonies of death, he commanded one of his guards to slay Antipater without farther delay; and ordered his body to be interred, without any funeral honours, in the castle of Hyrcania.

CHAP. X.

Herod alters his will, and declares Archelaus his successor. Death of Herod is kept secret. The leading men are discharged the circus. The king's death published. Archelaus acknowledged as king. Pomp and order of Herod's funeral. Archelaus waits the ratification of Herod's act by Cæsar.

HEROD, upon changing his mind, changed his will also, and appointed Antipas (to whom, in his former testament, he had bequeathed the government) to the tetrarchy of Galilee and Peræa, but gave the crown to Archelaus. The provinces of Trachon and Gaulin, Batanæa and Panias, he assigned to his son Philip, brother-in-law of Archelaus, under the title of a tetrarchy. Jamnia, Azotus, and Phasaelis, he gave to his sister Salome, with five hundred thousand drachmæ of coined silver. He also made provision for the rest of his kindred, by leaving them sums of money, and annual revenues to a very considerable amount. He bequeathed also to Cæsar, ten millions of drachmæ, in ready coin; and to the empress Julia, five millions more, besides vessels of gold and silver, with sumptuous apparel.

Herod changes his will.

Affairs being thus settled, Herod departed this life five days after he had caused Antipater to be slain, thirty-four years after the expulsion of Antigonus, and in the thirty-seventh year from his being declared king of the Jews by the Romans. He was a man inexorably cruel, a slave to his passions, whose will was his law; and yet, upon the whole, he may be said to have been fortunate. He ascended the throne of Judæa from the condition of a private man; was involved in many difficulties, but surmounted them all; and lived, at last, to a great age. With respect to his domestic broils, however unfortunate he may have been in the opinion of others, he seems to have been very fortunate in his own, as he ever found himself able to overcome his enemies.

Death of Herod.

Brief character.

The death of Herod was kept a profound secret by Salome and Alexas, who immediately dismissed the leading men that were confined in the circus, telling them, in the king's name, they might repair to their respective estates, and attend to their own affairs, as there was no farther occasion for them. It being now deemed a proper time for publishing the king's death, Salome and Alexas gathered the soldiery together in the amphitheatre at Jericho, where Herod's letters to the army were read, containing gracious acknowledgments of their past faith and services, and desiring them to continue the same dutiful affection to his son Archelaus in future, whom he had declared his successor. Ptolemy, the keeper of the king's seal, read after this the testament itself, with this express clause in it, that the act itself was not to be deemed valid, without the consent of Cæsar. This was followed with acclamations, saluting Archelaus as king, and wishing him a happy reign, both from the officers and soldiers, with promises of the same loyal attachment to the new king, as they had shewn to his predecessor.

Salome and Alexas dismiss the leading men.

Archelaus is declared king.

The next object of attention was, to prepare for the funeral solemnity; and it seemed to be the peculiar care of Archelaus, that nothing should be wanting to compleat its pomp and splendour, resolving himself to bear a part in the ceremony. The body was carried upon a golden bier, adorned with precious stones, covered with purple, a diadem upon his head, and over that a golden crown, with a scepter in his hand; his son and relations marching by the side. Next to these were the soldiers, in their proper distinctions and divisions. First the body guards, then the Thracians, after them the Germans, and next the Galatians, all of them armed, and arranged as for battle. Behind these marched the rest of the army, under their respective officers, with five hundred of the court attendants in the rear, bearing perfumes of different kinds. They proceeded in this order as far as Herodium, eight furlongs from Jericho, where the body was interred according to appointment; and this was the end of Herod.

Herod's funeral.

When seven days had been spent in attending upon the funeral obsequies of the deceased king, according to the custom of the country, and the appointed time for mourning was at an end, Archelaus entertained the multitude, and afterwards went up to the temple, where he placed himself upon a golden golden throne to receive the congratulatory acclamations of the people, which were answered, on his part, with every token of respect, intimating the sense he had of their kindness, after the hard usage they had met from his father, assuring them that their good-will should never be forgotten. "He did not pretend (he said) as yet to assume the name of king, having no right so to do without the authority of Cæsar in the ratification of his father's testament, for which cause he declined the dignity offered him by the army at Jericho; but whenever he should be settled in the government, it should be the constant object of his care to do all things for the benefit and satisfaction of his people, and to make his reign much easier to them, than what they had found during the reign of his father."

The people were charmed with the apparent candour and modesty of behaviour of their new prince, and depended, as is usual in such cases, upon the good faith of every particular for which he pledged himself. In order to put this complacency to the test, they preferred several petitions. Some imported a desire to be eased of their taxes, others to have their friends released who had been imprisoned by Herod. Some exclaimed against duties and impositions that were laid upon provisions; and divers pleas were offered upon divers pretences. In fine, Archelaus found it his interest to deny them no one favour they asked, esteeming the good-will of the people the most effectual means of securing to himself the continuance of the government.

CHAP. XI.

A plot to embroil the government. Satisfaction demanded of Archelaus for Herod's misdemeanors. A dangerous tumult. A party of factious Jews crowd into the temple. Archelaus sends a party to controul them, and they are nearly destroyed. Intenus going to Rome, and appoints Philip to the administration of affairs in his absence. Salome's perfidy to Archelaus. He meets Sabinus at Cesarea in his way to Judæa. Varus stops his journey, being engaged in the same business. Archelaus goes to Rome, and Varus for Antioch. Sabinus goes to Jerusalem, and demands Herod's books and keys; but the officers keep them for Cæsar. Antipas goes to Rome, and sets up for himself with a strong party. Sabinus lodges an information against Archelaus. Cæsar calls a council, where Caius, the son of Agrippa, sits as president. Antipater against Archelaus. Antipater appeals, and Nicolaus manages the cause. Archelaus humbles himself before Cæsar.

AT the commencement of the government of Archelaus, there arose a party of malecontent Jews, who seemed determined to bring about an innovation. The subject of their complaint was the case of Matthias and his associates, whom Herod had ordered to be put to death, for their assembling in a tumultuous manner, and pulling down the golden eagle which had been erected upon the top of the temple. During the life of the king, not one was to be found who durst make any attempt in vindication of these reformers; but, on his demise, a popular clamour was raised against him, and a great concourse assembled, and demanded of Archelaus, justice upon the friends of Herod, who had advised the execution of those who so nobly asserted the cause of the religion of their country. They peremptorily insisted upon the removal of the high-priest whom Herod had promoted in lieu of Matthias, and the appointment of another more worthy of that sacred function. This was granted by Archelaus, though he was much offended at their importunity, having proposed himself to go to Rome, and submit the case to the determination of Cæsar. However, he sent one of his principal officers to try what might be done upon terms of reason and moderation. The officer represented to them, "that the punishment inflicted upon those men was according to law; that their petitions were carried to too great an height; that they would do well to consider that Archelaus was going immediately for Rome; and that, upon his coming back with his commission ratified, every thing would be settled to their utmost content; and that therefore, it was both their duty and interest to preserve the public peace, without incurring the danger of sedition."

This candid representation, so far from having the desired effect, rendered the populace so clamorous, that, regardless of all law, they repeated their demand of revenge, now Herod was dead, for their friends whom he had destroyed whilst he was living. In the impetuosity of their zeal, they paid no respect to persons, or the rules of right and wrong; and were so intent on the ruin of those whom they considered as the objects of their vengeance, that they neglected the most necessary means of their own safety. In the mean time there was no want of reasonable applications to them, as well from Archelaus himself, as those whom he deputed; but these moderate proceedings rendered them more outrageous, insomuch that they wanted nothing but numbers to turn the tumult into a direct rebellion.

The Feast of Unleavened Bread, or the Passover, that celebrated memorial of the delivery of the Israelites out of Egypt, being now at hand, a more than ordinary concourse of people, as well from abroad as at home, came up to Jerusalem, to worship and offer sacrifices upon the solemn occasion. A party of seditious Jews, availing themselves of this opportunity, crowded into the temple, and there made a stand, with a resolution not to quit the place, though they were threatened with the most fatal consequences. They alledged, that they came thither to condole with the people for the loss of their two great teachers of the land, Judas and Matthias, and to stir them up to avenge their deaths. Archelaus, to prevent the mischief that might arise from the tumult of a multitude actuated by a zeal bordering on phrenzy, sent an officer, with a party of soldiers, to suppress the riot in due time, giving orders to seize the ringleaders, and bring them before him, if they should persevere in their resistance. The guards no sooner appeared, than the mutineers attacked them with the utmost fury and clamour; and the whole multitude falling upon them, with stones, and other implements of destruction, slew the greater number of them; so that the officer, with some few of the wounded men, were under the necessity of making their escape in the best manner they could. After this action they proceeded with their sacrifices.

The contest was now brought to such a pass, that Archelaus, concluding he must either suppress this tumultuous faction, or fall himself, sent out a powerful body of forces to encounter them, with orders to his horse to put all to the sword who should endeavour to make their escape, and to keep all succours from them. The body of horse, pursuant to command, cut off three thousand in the action, and the rest fled to the neighbouring mountains for shelter; so that Archelaus, having carried this necessary point, ordered proclamation for every man to retire to his own habitation, with which they readily complied, lest greater mischief should ensue.

Archelaus now prosecuted his journey to Rome, taking his mother, Nicolaus, Ptolemy, and several other friends along with him, leaving the care of his government and family to his brother Philip. He was accompanied also by Salome, and many of her kindred, under pretence of joining interests to assist Archelaus in obtaining the confirmation of his succession, but, in reality, to obstruct it, by exhibiting a complaint against him for his late conduct in the affair of the temple. Archelaus, being on his way with his attendants, was met by Sabinus, governor of Syria, at Cesarea, who was passing to Judæa to secure the effects of Herod. But Varus arriving very opportunely, restrained him from interfering in the matter, being there upon an invitation from Archelaus by Ptolemy on the same business; so that, out of respect to Varus, Sabinus neither seized upon any of the forts in Judæa, nor sealed up their treasure, but left all in the power and possession of Archelaus, until Cæsar should declare his resolution; and upon this promise he arrived at Cæsarea.

Sabinus violates his promise.

But when Archelaus was embarked for Rome, and Varus had departed for Antioch, Sabinus proceeded to Jerusalem, seized on the palace, sent for the officers of the garrison, and those who had the charge of Herod's effects, and demanded their keys and books. They informed him, however, that they could not be produced, as they had particular orders from Archelaus to keep all things, till his return, in the same state they received them, for the use and service of Cæsar.

Antipas goes to Rome.

At the same time Antipas, one of the sons of Herod, went to Rome, in hopes of obtaining the kingdom for himself. He was instigated to this measure by Salome, under colour of a prior right to the succession by an antecedent will, which (as she intimated) ought to be deemed more valid than the latter. Antipas took with him his mother, and Ptolemy, the brother of Nicolaus, who was an old friend of Herod, and ever well affected to his party. But the man that sed his ambition, and fixed him in his soaring attempt, was Irenæus, an accomplished orator, and a man of great sagacity, who had long been entrusted with the concerns of Herod. When he was advised by others to consider the seniority of Archelaus, and the claim he had to the succession by the last testament of his deceased father, the incentive of Irenæus, together with his own ambition, bore down every other consideration, so that he was determined upon the aspiring enterprise. Upon his arrival at Rome, all his kindred came over to him, not from any personal attachment, but their aversion to Archelaus, being desirous of gaining their liberty, and being put under a Roman governor; or, if they must have a king, preferring Antipas to Archelaus.

An information against Archelaus.

Defence of Archelaus.

Cæsar calls a council.

Antipater, the son of Salome, accuses Archelaus before Cæsar.

Sabinus had lodged an information with Cæsar against Archelaus; and Archelaus, by the hand of Ptolemy, presented the emperor with a memorial of what he had to offer in his defence, containing the ground of his claim, a recital of his father's will, an account of what monies he had left, together with the seal that enclosed them, submitting the whole to the determination of Cæsar. When Cæsar had perused these writings, with the letters also of Varus and Sabinus, and taken an account of the monies Herod had left behind him, the annual revenue of the government, and what Antipas himself had suggested in his own right, he called a council of his friends to advise upon the whole matter, and then gave audience to the competitors; Caius, the son of Agrippa, by his daughter Julia, whom he had adopted, being appointed president. Antipater, the son of Salome, an able advocate, and professed enemy to Archelaus, first rose, and spoke to this purpose, setting forth, That "it was ridiculous in Archelaus to plead now to have the kingdom given him, since he had, in reality, taken already the power over it to himself, before Cæsar had granted it to him; and appealed to those bold actions of his in destroying so many at the Jewish festival. And if the men had acted unjustly, it was but fit the punishing them should have been reserved to those that were out of the country, but had the power to punish them, and not been executed by a man, that, if he pretended to be a king, he did an injury to Cæsar, by usurping that authority before it was determined for him by Cæsar. But if he owned himself to be a private person, his case was much worse; since he, who was putting in for the kingdom, could by no means expect to have that power granted him, of which he had already deprived Cæsar, by taking it to himself. He also touched sharply upon him, and appealed to his changing the commanders in the army, and his sitting on the royal throne beforehand, and his determination of law-suits; all done as if he were no other than a king. He appealed also to his concessions to those that petitioned him on a publick account; and, indeed, doing such things, than

" which he could devise no greater, if he had been already settled in the kingdom by Cæsar. He also ascribed to him the releasing of the prisoners that were in the Hippodrome, and many other things, that either had been certainly done by him, or were belied to be done, and easily might be believed to have been done; because they were of such a nature, as to be usually done by young men, and by such as, out of desire of ruling, seize upon the government too soon. He also charged him with his neglect of the funeral mourning for his father, and with having merry meetings the very night on which he died; and that it was thence the multitude took the handle of raising a tumult. And if Archelaus could thus requite his dead father, who had bestowed such benefits upon him, and bequeathed such great things to him, by pretending to shed tears for him in the day-time, like an actor on the stage, but every night making mirth for having gotten the government, he would appear to be the same Archelaus with regard to Cæsar, if he granted him the kingdom, which he had been to his father; since he had then dancing and singing, as though an enemy of his were fallen, and not as though a man were carried to his funeral that was so nearly related, and had been so great a benefactor to him. But he said, that the greatest crime of all was this, that he came now before Cæsar to obtain the kingdom by his grant, while he had before acted in all things as he could have acted, if Cæsar himself, who ruled all, had fixed him firmly in the government. And what he most aggravated in his pleading was, the slaughter of those about the temple, and the impiety of it, as done at the festival; and how they were slain like sacrifices themselves, (some of whom were foreigners, and others of their own country,) till the temple was full of dead bodies; and all this was done, not by an alien, but by one who pretended to the lawful title of king, that he might compleat the wicked tyranny which his nature prompted him to, and which is hated by all men. On which account his father never so much as dreamed of making him his successor in the kingdom, when he was of sound mind, because he knew his disposition: and in his former, and more authentic, testament, he appointed his antagonist, Antipas, to succeed; but that Archelaus was called by his father to that dignity, when he was in a dying condition, both of body and mind; while Antipas was called when he was ripest in his judgment, and of such strength of body as made him capable of managing his own affairs. And if his father had the like notion of him formerly, that he hath now shewed, yet hath he given a sufficient specimen what a king he is likely to be, when he hath (in effect) deprived Cæsar of that power of disposing of the kingdom, which he justly hath; and hath not abstained from making a terrible slaughter of his fellow citizens in the temple, while he was but a private person."

When Antipater had made this speech, and had confirmed what he said by producing many witnesses from among Archelaus's own relations, he ended his pleading. Upon which Nicolaus arose up to plead for Archelaus, and said, "That, what had been done at the temple, was rather to be attributed to the minds of those that had been killed, than to the authority of Archelaus. For that those who are the authors of such things, are not only wicked in the injuries they do of themselves, but in forcing sober persons to avenge themselves upon them. Now it is evident that what these did, in the way of opposition, was done under pretence, indeed, against Archelaus, but, in reality, against Cæsar himself. For they, after an injurious manner, attacked and slew those who were sent by Archelaus, and who came only to put a stop to their doings. They had no regard either to God or to the festival, whom Antipater yet is not ashamed to patronize; either out of his indulgence of an enmity to Archelaus, or out of his hatred of virtue and justice. For as to those who

“ who begin such tumults, and first set about such “ unrighteous actions; they are the men who force “ those that punish them to betake themselves to “ arms, even against their wills. So that Antipa“ ter, in effect, ascribes the rest of what was done to “ all those who were of counsel to the accusers.
 “ For nothing, which is here accused of injustice, “ has been done, but what was derived from them
 “ as its authors. Nor are those things evil in them“ selves, but so represented only, in order to do “ harm to Archelaus. Such are these mens incli“ nations to do any injury to a man that is of their “ kindred, their father’s benefactor, familiarly ac“ quainted with them, and that hath ever lived in “ friendship with them. For that, as to this testa“ ment, it was made by the king when he was of a “ sound mind, and so ought to be of more authority “ than his former testament; and that for this rea“ son, because Cæsar is therein left to be the judge “ and disposer of all therein contained. And for “ Cæsar, he will not, to be sure, at all imitate the “ unjust proceedings of those men, who, during “ Herod’s whole life, had, on all occasions, been “ joint partakers of power with him, and yet so “ zealously endeavour to injure his determination;
 “ while they have not themselves had the same “ regard to their kinsman, (which Archelaus had.)
 “ Cæsar will not therefore disannul the testament “ of a man whom he had entirely supported, of “ his friend and confederate, and that which is “ committed to him in trust to ratify. Nor will “ Cæsar’s virtuous and upright disposition, which “ are known and uncontested through all the “ habitable world, imitate the wickedness of these “ men in condemning a king as a mad man, and as “ having lost his reason; while he hath bequeathed
 “ the succession to a good son of his, and to one “ who flies to Cæsar’s upright determination for “ refuge. Nor can Herod at any time have been “ mistaken in his judgment about a successor, “ while he shewed so much prudence as to submit
 “ all to Cæsar’s determination.”

When Nicolaus had finished his speech, Archelaus cast himself at Cæsar’s feet; upon which the emperor, raising him with the utmost courtesy, passed a judgment upon him that he was worthy of a crown; and this was construed as a confirmation of his authority. Cæsar then finding the young prince so highly gratified, dismissed the assembly without coming to a final determination, in order to deliberate whether he would settle the government on Archelaus alone, or in partition on the whole family, as they depended in general upon his will and pleasure.

*A sedition in Jerusalem. The ringleaders brought to punishment by Varus. Sabinus, in his absence, having the command, is threatened by the Jews. Sends to Varus for relief. The Jews mount the temple galleries, and gall the Romans, who set fire to the galleries, and burn the Jews. The temple rifled. The palace beset by the Jews. Rufus and Gratus go over to the Romans.
 Divers insurrections in Judæa. Simon, formerly a servant to Herod, sets up for king. He is routed, and loses his head. Athronges, a man of the meanest extraction, aspires to the crown, with four of his brothers. They are taken and suppressed. Varus marches to the relief of Judæa. Lays Sepphoris in ashes. The contest occasions the burning of divers places. The Jews fly before Varus, who puts two thousand of them to death. Abiab makes ten thousand of them prisoners of war. Varus leaves a garrison at Jerusalem, and returns to Antioch. The Jews send an having been very mutinous ever since the departure of Archelaus; but that Varus, falling upon them before they could collect their whole force, made examples of the ringleaders; and having, in a great measure, quelled the insurgents, returned to Antioch, leaving only one legion in Jerusalem to prevent tumults. But, notwithstanding the check that was put to their mutinous efforts, Varus was no sooner departed, than Sabinus, relying on the forces that were left there, turned his arms against the Jews; galled them sorely, attacked several of their forts and castles, and rifled every place, under pretence of searching for concealed money, and effects, but, in reality, to gratify his own ambition and avarice.

Varus quells the sedition of the Jews at Jerusalem.

The feast of Pentecost drawing on, a vast concourse of people repaired to Jerusalem from all quarters; some for worship and devotion, and others to gratify an insatiable revenge. These numbers assembled not only from Judæa, where the outrage most prevailed, but from Galilee, Idumæa, Jericho, and the towns beyond Jordan; being all unanimously resolved to call Sabinus to a severe account. They divided their troops into three bands:
 one of them took possession of the circus; another was posted upon the north and east side of the temple; and the third upon the west, where the king’s palace stood.

Commotions at the feast of Pentecost.

When they had thus surrounded the Romans, they made ready for the assault. Sabinus was alarmed at their intrepidity; and finding they were desperately resolved either to conquer or die, he sent with all speed to Varus for immediate relief, assuring him that the legion he had left there would certainly be cut to pieces. He himself, in the mean time, ascended a high turret belonging to the castle of Phasaël, which was erected in memory of Herod’s brother, who was slain by the Parthians, and from thence gave the signal with his hand to the Romans to sally out on the Jews, expecting others should expose their lives to gratify his avarice; though he durst not appear amongst the number of his friends. The Romans put all to the hazard, and a sharp encounter ensued, both parties exerting themselves with the greatest spirit and resolution. The Jews at length possessed themselves of some of the outward galleries of the temple, whence they galled the Romans from above, with stones and arrows, from their slingers and archers, as spectators, rather than actors in that part of the combat; for the Romans below were at too great a distance to reach their enemies. The fight continued a long time, to the disadvantage of the Romans, till, in the end, they set fire to the timber-work under the galleries, and plied it so hard, that the flames rapidly shot up to the roof, and laying hold of the pitch, wax, and oils, that were used in the ornamental part, put all in so furious a blaze, that it was certain death so much as to attempt a relief. Betwixt those that were crushed to death by the fall of the building, and those that were put to the sword upon the ground, there was not so much as one man escaped of those who had possessed the galleries. Several of them, in astonishment and despair, leapt into the flames; others cast themselves upon the points of their swords. Those who thought to conceal themselves by retiring the same way they ascended, were cut off by the soldiers; for courage could not avail them in such a situation.

The Romans sally upon the Jews.

They fire
 the galleries, and burn the Jews.

As the fire slackened, the Romans pressed through the ruins up to the very repository of the sacred treasure, a considerable part of which was plundered by the soldiers, and not above four hundred talents (as Sabinus pretended) were brought to him.
 The Jews were now in a complicated distress, through the loss of so many of their friends on the one hand, and the sacrilegious rifling of the temple on the other. However, in this state of desperation, they collected a body of the most resolute men, and beset the palace, threatening immediately to set fire to it, and put every man to the sword that should escape the flames, if they did not instantly quit the spot and depart, with a promise of impunity to Sa-binus and all his people upon that condition. Rufus and Gratus, with 3000 of Herod’s choicest men, went over to the Romans, together with the horse that were under the command of Rufus, which was a very considerable as well as seasonable reinforcement. Nevertheless, the Jews plied their work, mining the walls, threatening and advising the enemy to depart, without reducing them to the extremity of desperation, as they were resolved, at all hazards, to maintain their liberties, with the laws and customs of their forefathers. Sabinus was willing to comply; but being conscious of what he had deserved from the Jews, durst not trust to their promise. Besides, he thought the conditions too advantageous to be made good, and so determined to venture the holding it out, in hope and expectation of succour from Varus.

Several tumults in Judæa.

While matters were in this desperate situation in Jerusalem, there were several insurrections in divers parts of Judæa, at the instigation either of profit or vindictive malice. About 2000 of Herod's disbanded men gathered together upon the occasion, with a resolution to encounter a party of the king's under the command of Ahiab, Herod's nephew. But Ahiab, sensible that he was opposed by experienced veterans, avoided coming to action as much as possible, by shifting into desiles and fastnesses.

Depredations of Judas, the robber.

Judas, the son of Ezechias, the notorious robber, who had long annoyed Herod, with a band of desperadoes that he had collected at Sepphoris, a city of Galilee, made an inroad into the king's country, seized his magazines and military stores, alarmed the inhabitants, pillaged wherever he came, and aspired, in fine, to government itself, from a most rapacious disposition, and lawless ambition.

Ambition of Simon.

During this state of confusion, one Simon, formerly a servant of Herod, but a man of extraordinary strength, agility, and gracefulness of person, having the vanity to aspire to the crown, got together a body of guards, and was saluted by the frank's mob as king. As the first instance of his dignity and power, he burnt and rifled the palace at Jericho, set fire to many of the king's buildings, and allowed his followers the advantage of the booty. Nor would he have stopped there, had he not been repressed by Gratus, who, having espoused the cause of the Romans, advanced with his troops against him, when an obstinate engagement taking place, Simon's party, though resolute, being wanting in military skill, were totally routed and cut to pieces, and he himself being made prisoner, Gratus ordered his head to be struck off.

Is suppressed by Gratus.

This tumultuous disposition seemed universally to prevail; for the royal palace at Amatha, by the river Jordan, was burnt to the ground by a set of lawless banditti, resembling those under the direction of Simon. Indeed, a spirit of outrage, or rather epidemical madness, possessed the multitude, and that through want of good order under a confirmed king of their own; for the introduction of foreigners, through their intolerable pride and avarice, rather inflamed than reclaimed them.

Similar instance in Athronges, a peasant.

After the example of Simon, one Athronges, a man who had no pretence either to birth, virtue, ability, or fortune, but a mere clown, of enormous bulk, and vast strength, put in a claim to government, and pretended to have formed a resolution of venturing his life for the obtaining a prerogative to plunder at will. This Athronges had four brothers, of the same gigantic form with himself. They had each of them a band of men under command, which they deemed a sufficient means for gaining their point. Great multitudes came over to these five brothers; so that Athronges appointed his four brethren to act as his lieutenants, while he himself sat in council with a diadem upon his head, forming resolutions, and giving orders in affairs of state. This pageantry continued some time, during which the royal style and title seemed to be maintained, for they acted according to their own will and pleasure, none disputing their authority, or disobeying their commands. They were cruel in the extreme, whenever either the Romans or the king's forces fell into their power; for they held them in equal aversion; the latter for their licentious conduct under the government of rod, and the former on account of injuries of later date. The animosity grew daily more implacable, insomuch, that they might be said to diffuse devastation and massacre, from motives of rapine on the one hand, and cruelty on the other. They fell upon a Roman convoy, out of an ambush, with corn and arms for the camp, slew Arius, the commander, with forty choice men upon the spot; and the rest would have shared the same fate, if Gratus had not advanced with a party at the critical juncture, and compelled them to retire. They maintained these skirmishes a considerable time, to the great annoyance of the Romans, but at length to their own suppression; for they were all taken, particularly in an encounter with Gratus, and another with Ptolemy. Archelaus took the eldest of them prisoner; and the last, finding their case desperate, the men spent with toil and sickness, and no prospect of recruit, surrendered himself to Archelaus, upon oath for the performance of conditions.

They are all subdued.

During this general scene of tumult, or, as it may be called, terms of licence for outrage and robbery, every new band of mutineers was for setting up new kings, which caused universal distractions in the state. The Jews were rent by feuds and factions amongst themselves, while the Romans sustained some injuries, but not of equal detriment with those of the former.

Judæa overrun with freebooters.

As soon as Varus received intelligence of the state of Judæa, by a letter from Sabinus, he was in great apprehension for the third legion, and therefore took the other two legions, and four troops of horse, with the several auxiliary forces, which either the king, or the tetrarchs afforded him, and hastened away to Judæa to the relief of the besieged. He gave orders that all that were sent out upon this expedition, should make Ptolemais their place of rendezvous; and took with him 1500 auxiliaries, with which he was supplied by the citizens of Berytus. Aretas also, king of Arabia Petrea, from his aversion to Herod, and, in order to secure the favour of the Romans, supplied him with a very considerable reinforcement both of horse and foot. When Varus had collected all his forces, and drawn them up in a body at Ptolemais, he gave the command of part of it to his son, and one of his particular friends, with orders to march into Galilee, which lies in the neighbourhood of Ptolemais.

Varus marches to the relief of Sabinus.

The people of Berytus and Aretas send the Romans assistance.

Upon this inroad into the country, he carried all before him in spite of opposition; took Sepphoris, laid the city in ashes, and made its inhabitants slaves. Varus himself advanced with his army towards Samaria, but suffered no damage to be done to the city, because he knew the inhabitants to be well affected and peaceable in their dispositions. He pitched his camp in a certain village, called Arus, which the Arabians burnt in revenge to the very friends of Herod for Herod's sake. The army advanced afterwards to Sampho, which the same Arabians rifled, though a strong place, and then set it on fire: in fine they filled all places wherever they went with devastation and slaughter. Emmaus was burnt, after the inhabitants had deserted it, by order of Varus, in revenge for his soldiers that were slain there.

Sepphoris burnt, as are also Sampho and Emmaus.

When Varus approached Jerusalem, the Jews, who had besieged the Roman legion in that quarter, abandoned their post, and fled into lurking places with precipitation. But as to the Jews of Jerusalem, when Varus reproached them severely for what they had done, they cleared themselves of the accusations, alledging that the conflux of the people was occasioned by the festival; that the war was not made with their approbation, but through the rashness of strangers, while they were on the side of the Romans, and besieged together with them, rather than having any inclination to besiege them. There came also before-hand to meet Varus, Joseph, cousin-german of king Herod; as also Gratus and Rufus, who brought their soldiers along with them, together with those Romans who had been besieged. But Sabinus, from conscious guilt, avoided the presence of Varus, stole out of the city, and went to the sea side.

Varus, upon this, sent a detachment from his army into the country, in quest of the ringleaders of the revolt; and, upon discoveries and clear proofs being adduced against them, punished those that were most guilty, and dismissed the rest. The number of those who were crucified upon this occasion, amounted to about 2000. After this he sent away his army, as they had committed many outrages against his will, in the heat and rage of military licence. But hearing soon after, that 10,000 of the Jews were collected into a body, he ordered a strong detachment to fall upon them in their quarters, so that, by the advice of Abiab, they surrendered themselves, without making any resistance. Hereupon Varus set the common people at liberty, sent the ringleaders to Cæsar, and pardoned all the rest, except some relations of Herod, who, without any regard to affinity or justice, had engaged in so unnatural and ruinous a war. Matters being thus composed, Varus left the same legion in garrison at Jerusalem, and returned to Antioch.

The commotions in Judæa were no sooner quelled than Archelaus had many embarrassments to encounter at Rome, which arose upon the following occasion. The Jews, by permission of Varus, sent an embassy to Augustus Cæsar, petitioning for liberty of living according to their own laws. There were fifty Jews joined in the commission, and upwards of 8000 in the city of Rome, that presented themselves to countenance the embassy. Cæsar hereupon appointed a select number of his friends, and others of the first rank, to attend him in the temple of Apollo, a most magnificent structure of his own erecting. There came thither ambassadors, attended by a long train of Jews, and Archelaus, with his friends likewise. But his kindred were at a loss how to act upon the occasion; for, on the one hand, they abhorred, and therefore could not join him; and, on the other, if they had closed with the ambassadors, they must have appeared to the king as enemies to a prince of their own blood. Philip, his brother, came hither also out of Syria, by the persuasion of Varus, with an intention of espousing the cause of Archelaus, for whom he had the tenderest regard; though he was not without hope, that, if the ambassadors should gain their point, and the government be divided amongst the children of Herod, a part of the same might be allotted to himself.

When the Jewish ambassadors were admitted to audience of the emperor, the following was the purport of their commission.

"They declared that Herod, was, indeed, in name, a king; but that he had taken to himself that uncontrollable authority which tyrants exercise over their subjects, and had made use of that authority for the destruction of the Jews; and did not abstain from making many innovations among them, according to his own inclinations. That whereas there were many who perished by that destruction he brought upon them, (so many, indeed, as no other history relates,) they that survived were far more miserable than those that suffered under him; not only by the anxiety they were under, from his looks and disposition towards them, but from the danger their estates were in of being taken away by him. That he did, indeed, never leave off adorning those cities that lay in their neighbourhood, but were inhabited by foreigners; so that the cities belonging to his own government were ruined, and utterly destroyed. That whereas, when he took the kingdom, it was in an extraordinary flourishing condition, he had filled the nation with the utmost degree of poverty. That, when, upon unjust pretences, he had slain any of the nobility, he took away their estates: that, when he permitted any of them to live, he condemned them to the forfeiture of what they possessed. That, besides the annual impositions which he laid upon every one of them, they were to make liberal presents to himself, to his domestics and friends, and to such of his slaves as were vouchsafed the favour of being his tax-gatherers; because there was no way of obtaining freedom from unjust violence, without givving either gold or silver for it. That they would say nothing of the corruption of the chastity of their virgins, and the reproach laid on their wives for incontinency; and those things acted after an insolent and inhuman manner; because it was not a smaller pleasure to the sufferers to have such things concealed, than it would have been not to have suffered them. That Herod had put such abuses upon them, as a savage would not have put on them, if he had power given him to rule over them. That, although their nation had passed through many subversions, and alterations of government, their history gave no account of any calamity they had ever been under that could be compared with this, which Herod had brought upon their nation. That it was for this reason, that they thought they might justly and gladly salute Archelaus as king; upon supposition, that whosoever should be set over their kingdom, he would appear more mild to them than Herod had been. That they joined with him in the mourning for his father, in order to gratify him; and were ready to oblige him in other points also, if they could meet with any degree of moderation from him. But that he seemed to be afraid lest he should not be deemed Herod's own son; and so, without any delay, he let the nation understand his meaning, and this before his dominion was well established; since the power of disposing of it belonged to Cæsar, who could either give it to him, or not, as he pleased. That he had given a specimen of his future virtue to his subjects, and with what kind of moderation and good administration he would govern them, by that his first action, which concerned them, his own citizens, and religion itself, when he made the slaughter of 3000 of his own countrymen at the temple. How then could they avoid the just hatred of him, who, to the rest of his barbarity, hath added this, as one of our crimes, that we have opposed and contradicted him in the exercise of his authority?" The main thing they desired was, that "They might be delivered from kingly and the like forms of government, and might be added to Syria, and put under the authority of such presidents as should be sent them. For that it would thereby be made evident, whether they be really a seditious people, and generally fond of innovations; or whether they would live in an orderly manner, if they might have governors of any sort of moderation set over them."

Nicolaus vindicated the kings from these accusations, by observing, that, "As for Herod, since he had never been thus accused all the time of his life, it was not fit for those that might have accused him for lesser crimes than those now mentioned, and might have procured him to be punished, during his life, to bring an accusation against him now he was dead. He also attributed the actions of Archelaus to the Jews' injuries to him; who, affecting to govern contrary to the laws, and going about to kill those that would have hindered them from acting unjustly, when they were by him punished for what they had done, made their complaints against him. He accused them of their attempts for innovation, and of the pleasure they took in sedition, by reason of their not having learned to submit to justice, and to the laws, but still desiring to be superior in all things." This was the substance of the plea of Nicolaus.

Cæsar's generous proceedings in the point submitted to his determination. Partition of the kingdom between the sons of Herod.

WHEN Cæsar had heard the allegations and petitions of the ambassadors on the one part, and the pleading of the counsel on the other, he dismissed the assembly, and, after some few days, declared Archelaus successor to one moiety of Herod's jurisdiction, jurisdiction, under the title of ethnarch, not of king, though with a promise of the regal dignity, if he should appear, from his virtuous administration, to be worthy of that honour.

The other half was divided betwixt the two sons of Herod, Philip and that Antipas who had the dispute with Archelaus concerning the entire succession. Antipas had, for his portion, Galilee, with the country beyond Jordan, and two hundred talents a year in revenue. That of Philip was Batanæa, Trachon, and Auranites, and a part of what was called the palace of Zenodorus, with an hundred talents in yearly revenue.

Archelaus had Judæa, Idumæa, and likewise Samaria; which was discharged by Cæsar of a fourth part of the duty, for maintaining loyalty when other places were in rebellion. There fell also to his lot the Tower of Straton, Joppa, and Jerusalem; for Gaza, Gadara, and Hippon, living in conformity to the Greek customs and manners, were no longer dependencies upon the kingdom, but annexed by Augustus to Syria. The revenue of Archelaus was, upon the whole, six hundred talents.

Thus flood the patrimony of the sons of Herod. With respect to Salome, besides the cities of Jamnia, Azotus, and Phasaelis, with five hundred thousand drachmæ of coined silver bequeathed her by her brother, Cæsar presented her with a royal palace at Askalon, within the dominions of Archelaus; and her income was estimated at six hundred talents a year; all the other legacies, to the rest of the king's relations, being made good also, according to the will of Herod. Augustus bestowed likewise upon Herod's two virgin daughters, over and above what their father had left them, two hundred and fifty thousand drachmæ of silver, and married them to the sons of Pheroras. Nay, to compleat his generosity and magnificence, he divided his own legacies among the sons of Herod, some few pieces of plate excepted, which he reserved for himself, not for their intrinsic value, but as memorials of the donor.

A spurious
Alexander sets up as the true one

THESE affairs being settled by Cæsar, a certain young man, by birth a Jew, but brought up at Sidon by a freeman of Rome, ingratiated himself with the kindred of Herod by the resemblance of his visage, which those that saw him attested to be that of Alexander, the son whom Herod had caused to be slain. The Jew availed himself of the hint, and insinuated some remote pretence that he might have to the government. To assist him in the execution of his plan, he had recourse to one of his own tribe, who was versed in the cabals and intrigues of courts, together with all the arts necessary for carrying on the purpose of fraud and deception. Revolving upon the matter, they came to a determination that the Jew, who bore the resemblance, should declare himself to be that very Alexander who was said to be dead, and a report was to be propagated to this effect, "That the person entrusted with the execution of the two brothers (Alexander and Aristobulus) had set up two other bodies in their place, and preserved them both."

The impostor was not only pleased with the conceit of the part he was to play, but the cheat passed current upon other people, insomuch that, coming to Crete, and afterwards to the isle of Melos, the Jews so implicitly believed it, that he took up several sums of money amongst them upon the credit of his blood royal. He now became so far infatuated as to form ideas of principalities and powers, what favourites he would raise, and to what preferments.

With these air-borne fancies he went for Rome with a train of attendants. Upon his arrival at Puteoli, all the Jews, who entertained any regard for Herod, gathered about him, and received him as their king; mankind being naturally credulous, where they have resemblances to work upon their imaginations. This person, it seems, was so very like the prince, that several of his intimate friends not only affirmed, but swore, upon the sight of him, that it was Alexander himself, and could be no other. The rumour of this discovery being spread throughout Rome, brought all the Jews from that quarter to meet him on the way, with thanksgivings in their mouths for so surprizing a deliverance.

Upon his arrival at Rome, he was carried in a royal litter, with the utmost pomp and magnificence, through the streets, and followed by multitudes of people with the loudest acclamations. All these honours were paid him for the sake of his supposed mother, the innocent, much-injured Mariamne.

But Cæsar, thinking Herod to have been a man not easily to be imposed upon in a matter of such importance, did not credit the report. However, for the sake of curiosity and satisfaction, he sent a freeman of his, one Celadus, a cotemporary and companion of the two brothers, to bring this new Alexander into his presence, which he accordingly did, being as much imposed on as any of the rest. He could not, however, deceive Cæsar: for, although there was a resemblance between him and Alexander, yet it was not so exact as to elude a nice discernment. Besides, the hands of this spurious Alexander were rough and callous, through the labour to which he had been accustomed; and, instead of the softness and delicacy of the prince, his body, in general, was found to be coarse and rugged. Cæsar, observing how exactly the parties agreed in their tale, demanded what was become of Aristobulus, and as they were both delivered together, how it came to pass they did not appear together, and urge their claim to the inheritance?

Detected

The impostor made answer, that Aristobulus staid at Cyprus, through fear of the danger of the seas; for if they should both have miscarried together, the whole race of Mariamne would have been extinct; so that regard was had to the preservation of Aristobulus. The spurious Alexander affirming this, and the contrivers of the story joining exactly with him in concert, Cæsar took him aside, and thus addressed him; "Be ingenuous with me, and your life shall be spared as a reward. Tell me who you are, and who it is that has been so base and arrogant as to contrive and propagate so flagrant an imposture, for it is too subtle a scheme to be laid by one of your age."

When he found there was no means of evading the point, he disclosed to Augustus the author, the contrivance, and the manner of proceeding. Cæsar fulfilled his promise to the impostor, condemning him only to the galleys, being of a robust habit of body, and proper for that service. His advisers was put to death: and as for the people of Melos, he had them sufficiently punished, in having lavished so much money upon their spurious Alexander. Such was the ignominious conclusion of this scene of imposture.

and brought down one half the stream that watered the village of Neara, to a grove of palm-trees, which he had planted in the field below. He built, also, a village, which he called after his own name, Archelais; and, without any regard to the law of his forefathers, took to wife Glaphyra, the daughter of king Archelaus, and widow of his brother Alexander, by whom he had several children; though such marriages are expressly forbidden by the Jewish law. Archelaus's dream.

Simon's exposition.

In the tenth year of the government of Archelaus, the principal men of Judæa and Samaria were so disgusted at his tyrannical administration, that they jointly exhibited an accusation against him before Cæsar. They proceeded in it with more confidence, because they knew that severity in the extreme was directly contrary to the commands of Cæsar, who had expressly enjoined him to govern with moderation and justice. Upon hearing this complaint, he sent for Archelaus, who was his agent at Rome, to come to him immediately, and ordered him to go and bring Archelaus, the ethnarch, before him, without vouchsafing him a letter. The messenger, pursuant to command, posted away for Judæa, where he found Archelaus at a banquet with his friends, and, having communicated the emperor's order, called upon him to hasten away. Upon his arrival at Rome, Cæsar heard both charge and defence, and passed sentence of banishment upon Archelaus, with confiscation of all his goods, and sent him away to Vienne, a city of Gaul.

Archelaus, the ethnarch, a little before his summons to Rome, had an extraordinary dream, which he related to his friends, and was to the following purport. He fancied that he saw ten ears of wheat, all ripe and full, and oxen devouring them. This vision dwelling upon his mind when he awoke, he consulted several sages, skilled in divination, about the meaning of it. But the wise men being divided in their judgment, one Simon, an Essene, with the permission of the rest, gave his opinion of the signification of that dream, which was, that it foreboded some misfortune to Archelaus; for the dreaming of oxen, being animals designed for labour, seemed to import affliction, and a change of affairs; because upon their turning up the ground, every thing changed its place and form. He added, that, by the ten ears of corn, was intimated the same definite number of years, which take their revolutions in course, and that the government of Archelaus seemed now to be at an end. This was Simon's interpretation of the dream; and, upon the fifth day after the vision, Cæsar's agent came into Judæa, by his order, to cite Archelaus before him.

His wife Glaphyra, whose first husband was Alexander, the son of Herod, and brother of Archelaus, but, on his being put to death by his father, was married to Juba, king of Mauritania, and afterwards to Archelaus, on the divorce of his former wife Mariamne; this Glaphyra, it is to be observed, during the time of her cohabiting with Archelaus, had the following dream: "She fancied that she saw Alexander, her first husband, standing by her, at which she rejoiced, and embraced him with great affection; but that he expostulated with her on her conduct, observing, that she had verified the adage, that women are not to be trusted, since, after pledging her faith to him, who was the husband of her virginity, she had not only engaged in a second marriage, but a third, and violated the express injunction of law and decency, in taking for her husband his brother Archelaus." He added, however, "that ancient kindness should never be forgotten, and therefore it should be his care to deliver her from reproach." She related this dream to several of her female companions, and within a few days afterwards departed this life.

Glaphyra's dream of her first husband.

I have introduced these circumstances relative to the princes which are the subjects of the present part of my history, as the example held forth thereby is worthy of consideration, and as they seem to afford an instructive lesson with respect to our immortal state, and the wisdom of Divine Providence.

Cæsar annexed the lands of Archelaus to the province of Syria; and sent Cyrenius, a man of consular dignity, to tax the province, and dispose of the palace of Archelaus.

His wife Glaphyra, whose first husband was Alexander, the son of Herod, and brother of Archelaus, but, on his being put to death by his father, was married to Juba; king of Mauritania, and afterwards to Archelaus, on the divorce of his former wife Mariamne; this Glaphyra, it is to be observed, during the time of her cohabiting with Archelaus, had the following dream: "She fancied that she saw Alexander, her first husband, standing by her, at which she rejoiced, and embraced him with great affection; but that he expostulated with her on her conduct, observing, that she had verified the adage, that women are not to be trusted, since, after pledging her faith to him, who was the husband of her virginity, she had not only engaged in a second marriage, but a third, and violated the express injunction of law and decency, in taking for her husband his brother Archelaus." He added, however, "that ancient kindness should never be forgotten, and therefore it should be his care to deliver her from reproach." She related this dream to several of her female companions, and within a few days afterwards departed this life.

I have introduced these circumstances relative to the princes which are the subjects of the present part of my history, as the example held forth thereby is worthy of consideration, and as they seem to afford an instructive lesson with respect to our immortal state, and the wisdom of Divine Providence.

Cyrenius is appointed governor of Syria; and Coponius, governor of Judæa, sent with him. Cyrenius levies taxes in Syria and Judæa. The Jews thereupon become seditious, but are brought to submission by the persuasion of Joazar, the high-priest. Judas and Sadducus stir up the people to rebellion and the commission of outrages. The temple burnt to the ground. Dangerous effects of innovation. The ringleaders start a fourth sect.

Cyrenius is sent to tax Syria and Judæa.

CYRENIUS was at this time appointed by Cæsar to the government of Syria. He was a man of eminent character, a senator of Rome, and one that had passed through all dignified offices. Coponius, a man of the equestrian order, was sent together with him, as governor of Judæa; but that province being already annexed to Syria, it came within the department of Cyrenius to take and assess the people, and dispose of the effects of Archelaus. The Jews at first murmured at this mode of assessment; but, through the authority and persuasion of the high-priest, Joazar, they were brought to submissive compliance, without farther trouble.

Judas and Sadducus stir up rebellion.

There started up, soon after this, one Judas, a Gaulanite, of the city of Gamala, who, together with one Sadducus, a Pharisee, excited the people to a revolt, by his insinuating that taxes were the badges of slavery; that it was the incumbent duty of the nation to contend for liberty unrestrained; and that one fortunate turn might make them free and easy for ever, advance their reputation, and secure them in their possessions. The multitude, fired by the suggestions of these incendiaries, proceeded to the most outrageous violence: murders, robberies, and depredations, without distinction of friend or foe, universally prevailed, under a pretence of advancing the common cause of liberty and property; but, in reality, to subvert all government and good order, gratify the vilest of passions, and promote the private interest of the most abandoned members of society.

Horrid outrages.

While intestine broils prevailed to such a degree of ferocious madness, that the citizens were sheathing their swords in the bowels of each other, they had to encounter the destruction of a war abroad, and the desolations of a famine at home. Yet to such excess of outrage were they transported by their frantic rage, that the scene of blood and devastation continued, till the sacred temple itself was laid in ashes.

War and famine. The temple burnt to the ground.

These were the fatal consequences of aiming at innovations in our laws and customs, and desiring to reject fundamental rules and maxims. To that absurd disposition the multitude were excited by Judas and Sadducus, who, from conceit and caprice, introduced a fourth sect, and gaining over many disciples, laid the foundation of our future miseries, by a system of philosophy, with which we were before unacquainted. As these principles proved so fatal in their tendency, it will not be improper to present the reader with their definition.

C H A P. II.

The opinions and practices of the Pharisees, a sect in great repute with the people. Opinions of the Sadducees. Doctrines and manners of the Essenes. Principles of a fourth and new sect.

THERE were, amongst the Jews of old, three peculiar sects of religion. They were distinguished by the denominations of Essenes, Sadducees, and Pharisees. Though I have taken frequent occasion to treat of them, I cannot, on account of the new sect introduced, pass them over unnoticed with propriety in this place.

The manner of life presented by the Pharisees is rigid and simple, disdaining luxurious delicacies. They scrupulously adhere to the dictates of their reason, and pay such veneration to the judgment and opinion of their seniors, as to follow them implicitly. They ascribe all contingencies to fate, but not as to exclude mens freedom of actions; laying it down as a maxim, that, though all are done by Divine appointment and permission, this by no means excludes the concurrence of the will, in points which respect either good or evil. They assert the doctrines of the immortality of the soul, and a future state of rewards and punishments; that the wicked are to be consigned to perpetual chains and darkness, and the good to rise again to a state of bliss. By these doctrines they have acquired great esteem with the people, inasmuch, that all forms of worship, prayer, and sacrifices, are presented by them, and an universal opinion entertained of their wisdom, temperance, and integrity.

The Sadducees, on the one hand, deny the immortality of the soul, and affirm, that we have no other obligations upon us but to observe the law; inasmuch, that they value themselves upon a right they have to dispute the most important points with their teachers. This sect is not numerous, but mostly composed of men of rank; who, when properly qualified for offices of state, are compelled to conform, at least in profession, to the principles of the Pharisees, otherwise they would incur the resentment of the multitude.

The Essenes ascribe the government of the world to Divine Providence, without any exception; hold the immortality of the soul; and revere justice, both in theory and practice, as the cardinal virtue. They send their gifts to the temple, without going thither themselves; for they offer sacrifices apart in a peculiar mode, and with more ceremonies. They are men of excellent morals, and their chief employment is agriculture. They are eminent for their rectitude of conduct, beyond either Greeks or Barbarians, which seems to be the chief object of their study and application. They have all things in common, without any distinction of rich and poor. They have neither wives or servants; as they look upon one as an encroachment upon the natural liberty of mankind, and the other as a state of life attended with trouble and anxiety; so that they chuse rather, by a mutual exchange of good offices, to assist each other. This is the sum of their principles and manners; and the sect is supposed to amount, in number, to upwards of four thousand. Their treasurers and commissaries are men of integrity, chosen from among their priests; and it is their care to make provision out of the fruits of the earth, for the maintenance of the whole body. Their manner of living, upon the whole, much resembles the Platti, among the Dacians.

The founder of the fourth and new sect was Judas Galilæus, and this was much the same with that of the Pharisees, except in the maxims of an uncontrollable liberty: they will rather expose themselves, and their dearest relations, to the most exquisite torments, than call any man by the name of master. But this is a truth so well confirmed by every day's observation and experience, that it needs no comment; besides, the invincible constancy of this people, in the endurance of pains, is beyond expression. The sect, which maintained these principles, were farther inflamed by the intolerable cruelties of Gessius Florus, which ended at length in a general revolt from the Romans. Thus much for the distinct sects amongst the Jews.

CHAP. III.

The end of the taxation of Cyrenius. Joazar is deposed from the pontificate, and Ananus promoted to that dignity. Herod and Philip being settled in their tetrarchy, build several cities in honour of Cæsar. The Samaritans prophane the holy temple. Coponius returns to Rome, and is succeeded in the government of Judæa by Marcus Ambivius. Death of Salome. Death of Augustus Cæsar, emperor of Rome, and succession of Tiberius. Ambivius is succeeded by Ananus Rufus, as is the latter by Valerius Gratus. Ananus removed from the high-priesthood, and rapid successions of Ismael, Eleazar, Simon, and Joseph.

Gratus returns from the government of Judæa, and is succeeded by Pontius Pilate. Herod builds a city, and calls it Tiberis, in honour of the emperor. Phraates, king of Parthia, murdered by his son Phraataces, who is destroyed by a tumult. Orodes taken off by a conspiracy. An embassy to Rome, recommending one of the Parthian hostages for king. Vonones beats Artabanus into Media. Is himself afterwards routed and pursued by Artabanus, and solicits the protection of Tiberius, but in vain. A dispute about the form of government. Germanicus sent to adjust the matter, and poisoned by Piso.

WHEN Cyrenius had disposed of the effects of Archelaus, and settled the taxation according to order, which fell out in the thirty-seventh year after the battle of Actium, Joazar, the high-priest, becoming unpopular, he deprived him of the dignity, and appointed Ananus, the son of Seth, to succeed him. Herod and Philip, being settled in their tetrarchies, adjusted affairs in the best manner possible. The former built a wall about Sepphoris, which he made the bulwark and capital of all Galilee. After this he fortified another town, which, at that time, was called Betaramphtha; but he afterwards changed the name to Julias, in honour of the empress. Philip, on his part, beautified and enlarged Pælas, at the head of the river Jordan, and called it Cæsarea. He also advanced the village Bethsaida, upon the bank of the lake of Genezareth, to the rank of a city, both as to bulk, magnificence, and number of inhabitants, calling it also Julias, in honour of Julius Cæsar's daughter.

During the government of Coponius, who was sent, as before observed, with Cyrenius into Judæa, a disturbance happened upon the following occasion. It is customary for the priests, upon the feast of unleavened bread, which we call the passover, to open the gates of the temple just after midnight. A band of Samaritans, who stole into Jerusalem, waiting the opening of the gates, immediately advanced, and threw the bones of dead men into the cloisters. Upon this account the Jews excluded them from the temple, which they were not accustomed to do at such festivals, and watched the sacred spot more carefully than they had formerly done.

A short time after this, Coponius returning to Rome, Ambivius succeeded him in the government of Judæa, under whose administration died Salome, sister of Herod, and left to Julia, over and above her toparchy, the cities of Jamnia, Phasaelis upon the plain of Archelais, with several plantations of palm-trees, that bear most excellent fruit.

Ananus Rufus succeeded Ambivius; and in his time Augustus Cæsar departed this life. He was the second emperor of Rome, and reigned fifty-seven years, six months, and two days; having been fourteen years of that time colleague with Anthony in the government. The term of his life was seventy-seven years. He was succeeded by Tiberius, the son of his wife Julia, being the third emperor of the Romans, who appointed Valerius Gratus to the government of Judæa. He also deposed Ananus from the pontificate, and put Ismael, the son of Fabius, in his place, who was soon after deposed, and the dignity transferred to Eleazar, the son of Ananus, the late high-priest. The office, however, was taken from him, after he had held it a year, and given to Simon, the son of Camith, who, after another year, was compelled to relinquish it to Joseph, whose surname was Caiaphas. Gratus having now held the government eleven years, returned to Rome, and was succeeded by Pontius Pilate.

Herod, the tetrarch, was now in great favour with Tiberius, and built a city to his honour, called Tiberis. It was built upon the best spot of ground in all Galilee, on the bank of the lake of Genezareth, not far from the hot baths of Emmaus. The city was peopled partly by strangers, and partly by Galileans. Some were compelled to become inhabitants, while others took up their residence there by choice. Nay, in order to render it populous, inhabitants were collected collected from all quarters, and of all conditions, high, low, rich, and poor, free men and slaves. For the encouragement of the indigent to settle there, he gave them very considerable privileges and immunities; to some houses, to others land; for he was sensible that, to render this place habitable, was to transgress the ancient Jewish law; because many sepulchres were to be here taken away, in order to make room for the building of the city Tiberias; and our laws pronounce, that such inhabitants are unclean for seven days.

Death of Phraates, king of Parthia.

About this time died Phraates, king of Parthia, through the treachery of his son, upon the following occasion. The king amongst other presents that were formerly sent him by Julius Cæsar, had an Italian woman, whose name was Thermusa. He made her first his concubine; but being enraptured with her charms, and having a son by her, whose name was Phraataces, he made her his lawful wife, though he had several legitimate children. This Thermusa, perceiving the great affection he had for her, determined to attempt some means to procure for her son the succession to the throne of Parthia. Finding that her efforts could not succeed without removing the legitimate sons out of the kingdom, she prevailed with their father to send those sons as hostages to Rome; such was her ascendancy over the mind and will of her husband.

Phraataces, for parricide and incest, is expelled the kingdom.

Phraataces, being trained up at home to an expectation of the kingdom, thought it tedious to wait for a crown in reversion, and therefore formed a treacherous design, by the assistance of his mother, with whom he was supposed to have been guilty of the horrid crime of incest, for the taking away the life of his father. This being accordingly done, Phraataces rendered himself so odious to the people, both for parricide and incest, that, before he could enter upon the government, he was expelled, and perished in a tumult raised against him. Now the Parthian nobility agreed, that government and good order could not be maintained without a king, and resolving, at the same time, not to set any prince upon the throne that was not of a lineal descent with Arsaces, (the blood of Phraates being tainted by a marriage with an Italian concubine,) sent ambassadors, and invited Orodes to take the crown. But Orodes being odious to the multitude, on account of his cruel and untractable temper, a band of conspirators set upon and slew him. Some say the execution was done at a sacrifice, or a banquet; but the more general report is, that they slew him when they had drawn him out to a hunt.

Orodes invited to be king, slain soon after.

An embassy from the Parthians to Rome.

Upon this the Parthians sent an embassy to Rome, desiring one of the hostages for their king, and made choice of Vonones in preference to the rest. He was a prince worthy of the honour conferred on him, by two of the greatest empires upon the face of the earth, the Roman and the Parthian. But his own countrymen, being naturally fickle and haughty, quickly repented of their choice, and spurning the idea of a slave, (for so they construed the word hostage,) as well as rejecting the imposition of a king, not by any law of arms, as it was a time of profound peace, in the heat of their resentment, they sent for Artabanus, who was then king of the Medes, and of the blood of Arsaces. Artabanus immediately accepted the offer, and, upon his arrival at the head of a considerable army, was encountered by Vonones, who repulsed him, the generality of the Parthians as yet maintaining their allegiance: but Artabanus, being in a short time reinforced, gave Vonones a total overthrow in a second battle; so that, with great difficulty, he escaped, with some few horse, into Seleucia. Artabanus, taking advantage of the consternation of his opponents, pressed on the pursuit with a terrible slaughter, and retired to Ctelsiphon with his victorious army. This action put him in possession of the kingdom of Parthia. Vonones, in the mean time, fled into Armenia, expecting to obtain the government there, soliciting Cæsar also to assist him in his design. But whether the emperor suspected his courage, or himself was afraid of incurring the resentment of the Parthians, Tiberius stood aloof; and Vonones, despairing of the attempt, delivered himself up to Syllanus, governor of Syria, who, out of regard to his education at Rome, gave him an honourable reception. Artabanus, being now settled in the government of Parthia, made his son Orodes king of Armenia.

Vonones sent from Rome to take the kingdom.

Delivers himself up to Syllanus, governor of Syria.

At this time died Antiochus, king of Comagena, which occasioned the multitude to contend with the nobility; the latter being desirous of reducing the kingdom into the state of a province, while the former were for being under a kingly government, as they were before. Upon this dispute Germanicus was ordered away into the east, to compose the difference; but it proved the occasion of his ruin; for, after he had settled all affairs, he was poisoned through the treachery of Piso, as will be shewn hereafter.

Germanicus is poisoned by Piso.

CHAP. IV.

Standards set up in Jerusalem with Cæsar's image upon them. A tumult raised upon the occasion. Pilate causes the images to be removed. Demands money out of the sacred treasury. A great destruction of the Jews. Josephus bears illustrious testimony. Decius Mundus enamoured of Paulina, a woman of unspotted virtue, forms fatal resolutions. Ide, in conjunction with the priest of Isis, bring them to an interview. A criminal intercourse ensues. The priest and Ide are crucified, and the temple of Isis destroyed.

PILATE, governor of Judæa, upon the removal of the army from Cæsarea to Jerusalem, to take up their winter quarters there, brought several standards into the city, with the image of Cæsar, to the violation of the Jewish laws, which expressly prohibit the use of such figures; for which reasons no former governors brought ensigns with such ornaments upon them before. The present governor was the first that ever transgressed this rule; and further, he brought them in by stealth, and fixed them up in the dead of the night, when none were present. When the citizens observed them next morning, they assembled in great multitudes, and attended Pilate at Cæsarea, with a petition for the removal of those images to some other place. After several days waiting, and Pilate still refusing, upon pretence that it was a request not to be granted without offering an indignity to Cæsar, they still persisted in their importunities. But the governor, upon the seventh day of the Jews attendance, commanded a party of soldiers to be ready in arms, where he appointed them, and thereupon mounted a tribune, which he had caused to be erected in the circus, as a place most commodious for a surprize. When the Jews renewed their petition, he gave a signal to the soldiers to encompass them round, and threatened that their punishment should be immediate death, unless they would quietly depart to their respective habitations. The Jews, notwithstanding this alarming menace, cast themselves upon the ground, and laid their necks bare; thereby intimating that their lives were not so dear to them as the laws of their country. Pilate was so deeply impressed with this instance of their fortitude in preserving their laws inviolate, that he commanded the images to be carried back from Jerusalem to Cæsarea.

The next thing Pilate undertook was to bring an aqueduct to Jerusalem, about two hundred furlongs from the city; for which purpose he demanded money out of the sacred treasury. The Jews, enraged at this proceeding, assembled in great numbers, to try the effect of popular clamour in diverting him from his purpose. Some, as is usual upon such occasions, used reproaches, and poured forth the most provoking invectives; insomuch that he ordered a certain number of soldiers to assume the habit of the vulgar class, carry daggers under their garments, and be ready to obey a private signal. He then commanded the Jews to depart; but as they persisted not only in denial, but reproach, the signal was given to the soldiers, who fell upon them, them, dealing destruction indiscriminately; and the Jews being unarmed, and consequently unprepared for resistance, an end was put to the tumult.

At the same time there appeared in Judæa an extraordinary person, called JESUS, if it be lawful to call him a man. He was a famous worker of miracles, a teacher of those who were desirous of receiving the truth in simplicity, and brought over to him many disciples, both Jews and Gentiles. This was the CHRIST, whom Pilate, at the accusation of the princes and great men of the nation, delivered up to the ignominious punishment of the cross; notwithstanding which, those who first loved him did not forsake him. He appeared to them alive again the third day after his crucifixion, which the divine prophets had foretold, together with numberless other wonders concerning him. And thence, to this day, there is a set of people, who bear the name of CHRISTIANS, as owning him for their Head, Lord, and Master.

About this time another calamity caused great disorder among the Jews, which arose from certain shameful practices about the temple of Isis that was then at Rome. The particulars are as follow: There was at Rome, one Paulina, a woman no less eminent for her virtue than her birth, possessed of an ample fortune, most exquisite beauty, and had withal consummate modesty. She was married to Saturninus, a husband worthy of such a wife: but it so fell out, that one Decius Mundus, a Roman knight, in the prime of life, fell desperately in love with her. As she was a person above the temptation of presents, he was the more inflamed with a desire of gaining her, and proceeded so far, however, as to offer two hundred thousand drachmæ to ingratiate himself with the object of his adoration. When these means proved ineffectual, and he became more and more enamoured, he began to meditate his own destruction. There was a female domestic belonging to the father of Mundus, called Ide, a woman of intrigue and cunning, who observing his passion had transported him beyond all bounds of reason, encouraged him to hope for the possession of Paulina, by suggesting to him, that, for a consideration of fifty thousand drachmæ, his desire might be accomplished. Mundus, charmed with the proposal, produced the money; but Ide, persuaded that ore had no attraction with Paulina, and reflecting that she held the goddess Isis in the highest veneration, she had recourse to this invention. Having convened several of the priests of Isis, sworn them to secrecy, and secured them by a deposit of twenty-five thousand drachmæ, and a promise of as much more when the business was effected, she communicated to them the circumstance towards facilitating an interview between the parties.

The priests, lured by the temptation, promised fair; and one of them went immediately to Paulina, and, in a private conference, told her, that the god Anubis was passionately enamoured of her, and that she must favour him with a visit. Paulina welcomed the messenger; and was so elated with the ideal honour, that she could not forbear disclosing to her female companions the kind regard which the god Anubis entertained for her. She even made her husband acquainted with it; and told him that an assignation was made between them; to which, from a reliance on her insuperable virtue, he cheerfully acceded.

Paulina, in pursuance of this pleasing fancy, went into the temple of Isis, where, in the evening, she was shut up by one of the priests, and meeting with Mundus in the dark, had intercourse with him during the night, supposing she was honoured with the caresses of Anubis. In the morning they separated; and Paulina returned to her husband, charmed with the late adventure, which she failed not to relate to her female companions in exaggerated terms.

Upon the third day after the interview, Mundus happened to meet Paulina, and, in terms poignantly satirical, lampooned her credulity, that had induced her to take him into her arms, as a substitute for her adorable Anubis; intimating, at the same time, that it had saved him two hundred thousand drachmæ.

When the woman reflected on the deception, she rent her clothes, burst into vehement exclamations, related the whole circumstance to her husband, and requested, if he had any regard for her, that he would not suffer so flagrant an indignity to pass unpunished. The husband represented the matter to Tiberius, who, upon full enquiry and information, caused these sanctified, or rather sacrilegious, impostors, together with Ide, the inventress of the plot, to be crucified. He commanded the temple of Isis to be pulled down, and her statue thrown into the Tiber; but mitigated the sentence of Mundus to banishment, as a young man overcome by the irresistible force of his passion.

CHAP. V.

Profligate Jews impose themselves on the credulous as teachers of the law. Extort money upon fraudulent pretences. Cause the expulsion of their brethren from Rome. A Samaritan impostor. Siege of Tirathaba. The assailants cut to pieces. The Samaritans exhibit a complaint against Pilate. Marcellus made governor of Judæa. Pilate cited before Tiberius Cæsar.

A Certain Jew, a notorious profligate, who, to avoid the stroke of public justice, was compelled to fly his country, passed at Rome, in these days, as a kind of rabbi, together with three more of the same abandoned character and distinction. Holding themselves forth as professors and expounders of the laws of Moses, they gained several proselytes, and, among others, one Fulvia, a woman of rank and integrity, and a Jewess by profession. This person, having delivered herself up to their authority and guidance, was prevailed upon by them to send oblations of gold and purple to the holy temple at Jerusalem, which, from time to time, they converted to their own use. Saturninus, induced by his wife, who had detected the fraud, exhibited a complaint against the impostors to Tiberius, who commanded all the Jews forthwith to depart the city. There were 4000 soldiers entered upon the consul's roll, and sent away for Sardinia; besides great numbers who made conscience of bearing arms for the sake of their religion; and these were put to grievous torments; so that, for the infamy of four flagitious impostors, the Jews were all banished to a man.

Nor was Samaria free from tumults, which were excited by a certain impostor; who gave out, that, if the multitude would assemble at mount Gerizim, a spot held sacred in that country, he would undertake to shew them the holy vessels which Moses had caused to be there deposited. A credulous rabble, lured by this plausible tale, betook themselves to arms, waiting for others to join them, in order to march up to the mountain in a large body. But Pilate anticipated their design, by pre-possessing the mountain with a strong band of horse and foot; whence they charged the Samaritans, who had surrounded the village, routed and slew great numbers of them, and took and carried away a multitude of prisoners, the principal of whom were put to death by order of the governor of Judæa.

When this tumult was appeased, the leading men of the Samaritans applied to Vitellius, a person of consular dignity, and at that time governor of Syria, and brought a charge of murder against Pilate. Vitellius, upon this, sent his friend Marcellus to take charge of the government of Judæa, and ordered Pilate to Rome, to answer before the emperor, the accusations exhibited against him. Pilate had held the government of Judæa ten years, when he prepared for his journey to Rome; but Tiberius departed this life before his arrival.

Vitellius magnificently received at Jerusalem. Hyrcanus builds a castle, and calls it Antonia. Caiaphas deposed. Vitellius forms a league with Artabanus. The Parthians lose Armenia. Artabanus betrayed, but is reinforced, and recovers his kingdom. Treaty betwixt Tiberius and Artabanus. Darius sent as hostage. Vitellius returns to Antioch. Death and character of Philip.

Vitellius honourably received by the Jews.

AT this time Vitellius went into Judæa, and visited Jerusalem, (it being the Feast of the Passover,) where he was most honourably received, and remitted the inhabitants all the taxes upon fruits bought and sold. He restored to the priests also the keeping of the pontifical vestments in the temple, as they had been of old, but were of late deposited in the castle of Antonia, upon the following occasion:

The high-priest's vestments deposited in the temple of Antonia.

Hyrcanus, the high-priest, and first of that name, having built a tower near the temple, passed the greater part of his time there, keeping in his own custody the pontifical vestments and ornaments, in order to reserve them for his own use, as did his successors, for a considerable time after him. But Herod, upon his succession to the throne, was so well pleased with the situation, beauty, and strength of this fort, that he caused it to be improved at a very great expence, and called it by the name of Antonia, in honour of Anthony, his particular friend. In this castle he found the sacred vestments, and there he ordered them to be kept, from an opinion, that having them in his possession, would keep the Jews in proper decorum. Archelaus, his son and successor, followed his example, and from the same motive, as did the Romans also after the reduction of the kingdom into a province; and these pontifical robes were deposited in a cabinet appropriated to that sole use, under the seal of the priests and keepers of the holy treasury, the governor of the castle being obliged to have a lamp burning before the place. Upon the seventh day preceding the three solemn festivals, he delivered out the vestments to the high-priest, who, having caused them to be purified, performed the sacred functions in them; and the day following deposited them in the usual place. This was the practice at the three annual festivals, and upon the solemn fast.

But Vitellius was now pleased, in favour of the Jews, to give up all the pontifical robes into the possession of the priests again, and to discharge the governor from any further care of them. This he did to conciliate the esteem of the Jewish nation. He then deposed Joseph, who was also called Caiaphas, from the office of high-priest, and conferred it upon Jonathan, the son of the high-priest Ananus, after which he returned to Antioch.

Jonathan made high-priest instead of Caiaphas.

Upon his arrival, he received letters of instruction from Tiberius Cæsar, to form a league of friendship with Artabanus, king of Parthia; the emperor being apprehensive, if he should get possession of Armenia, that he might become a dangerous enemy; but Vitellius was enjoined to form the league upon no other condition than that of having one of the king's sons as an hostage. This induced Vitellius to tamper with the kings of Iberia and Alania, by the offer of a great sum of money, to engage them in a war with Artabanus. His utmost efforts could only prevail with the Iberians to open a free passage for the Alanians through their city, and so, by the Caspian mountains, to enable them to pave the way for an incursion into the kingdom of Armenia. By means of this irruption, Armenia was again taken from the Parthians; and that stroke was followed with so desperate a ravage of their own country, that the principal men were almost entirely cut off, together with the king's sons, and such vast numbers of the common people, that this invasion may be said to have laid all waste before it.

The Parthians lose Armenia.

Artabanus now fatally perceived that he had been betrayed under his very roof, and that his friends and relations were bribed into a plot with Vitellius for his destruction; so that not knowing in whom to repose confidence, and suspecting treachery under the guise of friendship, he made his escape into the upper provinces, where he was not only protected, but reinforced with so considerable an army of the Dahi and Saci, that he not only overthrew his enemies, but recovered his kingdom.

Artabanus restored to his dominions.

Upon this turn of affairs, Tiberius proposed an alliance with Artabanus; and, upon this invitation, Artabanus and Vitellius went to the Euphrates, and a bridge being laid over the river, they each of them came attended with their guards, and met upon the middle of the bridge. At the conclusion of the treaty, Herod, the tetrarch, gave them both a very splendid and magnificent entertainment, in a tent he had erected, at a great expence, upon the same river. Artabanus soon after sent his son, Darius, as an hostage to Tiberius, with a variety of presents, and one amongst the rest was a man seven cubits in height, by profession a Jew, whom they called Eleazar the Giant. Vitellius after this returned to Antioch, and Artabanus to Babylon.

The king's son, Darius, sent as hostage.

Herod, desirous of giving Cæsar the first information of their having obtained hostages, dispatched a messenger with every particular of the treaty to Rome; and each circumstance being so accurately described, the intelligence of Vitellius became needless. He was, however, much disgusted at his officious anticipation, but smothered his resentment till Caius came to the government.

At this time died Philip, the brother of Herod, in the twentieth year of the reign of Tiberius, and the thirty-seventh of his tetrarchy, of Trachon, Gaulanitis, and Batanea. He was a man of a quiet, easy disposition, and spent his whole life in the compass of his own jurisdiction. He scarcely ever went abroad, but in company with some few of his select friends; and had a chair carried after him, which, upon several occasions, he used as a seat of justice. If an appeal was made to him for his decision of any matter in controversy, he immediately proceeded to the examination of the cause, and gave sentence according to validity of evidence. He died at Julias, and was buried, with great funeral pomp, in a monument he had prepared for himself; but leaving no issue behind him, Tiberius annexed his domains to Syria, upon condition that the tributes in that tetrarchy should not go out of the country.

Death and character of Philip, Herod's brother.

C H A P. VII.

A war between Herod, the tetrarch, and Aretas, the king of Parthia. Particulars of the occasion of it. John the Baptist imprisoned by order of Herod. Vitellius marches by the way of Judæa towards Petra. The Jews are offended at the images in the Roman ensigns. Vitellius, Herod, and attendants, go to a public festival held at Jerusalem. The pontificate transferred from Jonathan to Theophilus. Intelligence of the death of Tiberius. Progeny of Herod the Great.

A WAR broke out at this time between Herod and Aretas, king of Parthia, upon the following occasion. Herod, the tetrarch, married the daughter of Aretas, with whom he cohabited a considerable time; but being called afterwards to Rome, he paid a visit to Herod, his brother-in-law, (the son of the daughter of Simon, the high-priest,) in his way, where he became so passionately enamoured of Herodias, wife of his brother, and daughter of Aristobulus, their brother, that he had the confidence to make a proposal of marriage to her, upon his return from Rome, and of putting away his wife, the daughter of Aretas, which was agreed to on both sides, as the condition of their marriage. He then prosecuted his voyage for Rome, where, having done his business, he returned home. His wife, having by this time received intelligence of his intrigue with Herodias, artfully insinuated a desire of obtaining his permission to go to Machæras, a castle upon the the borders of the dominions of Aretas. Herod, not suspecting the cause of her request, readily complied; and, as Machæras was placed under the dominion of her father, every necessary preparation was then made for her journey. The governor, immediately upon her arrival, furnished her with Arabian guards, who conducted her from stage to stage, with all possible speed, to her father's palace. When she related the circumstance of Herod's amour, Aretas became naturally incensed; and there being, at that time, a dispute concerning the boundaries of some land in Gamala, and the two armies in the field ready to decide the point in question, they laid hold of this pretence, and brought it to a battle, in which Herod was totally routed, through the treachery of a band of refugees that came over from Philip, and were at that time in the pay of Herod. The tetrarch no sooner gave Tiberius intelligence of this disaster, than he dispatched orders to Vitellius to make war upon Aretas, to retaliate the supposed indignity, and either bring him prisoner, or send his head to Rome.

There prevailed amongst the Jews a general opinion that this disaster was the effect of a Divine vengeance upon Herod and his army, for the blood of John, surnamed the Baptist, who was basely murdered by order of this tetrarch. He was a man of an immaculate character, whose grand concern was to exhort the Jews to the practice of piety and virtue, point out the necessity of repentance, and hold forth, by baptism, the import and meaning of regeneration and a new life; not as consisting in abstinence from a particular sin, but in an habitual purity both of mind and body. Such was the influence and authority of this great and good man, as appeared from the multitude of his disciples, and the veneration they had for his doctrine, that Herod was apprehensive he might instigate them to a revolt. Actuated therefore by this sordid principle, he sent him away bound to Machæras, (the castle before mentioned,) where, by the malice and contrivance of Herodias, his brother's wife, (with whom he was greatly enamoured,) the Baptist was afterwards put to death; and that impious barbarity was followed by a Divine vengeance on the execrable cause of it, as the Jews, from the best foundation, were firmly persuaded.

Vitellius was now preparing for the Arabian war, and upon his march towards Petra, with two legions, and all the auxiliaries, horse and foot, of the Roman allies. When he was advanced as far as Ptolemais, thinking to take his passage across Judæa, the leading men of the country met him on his way, intreating him to steer some other course, as the images which the Romans usually bear on their ensigns are repugnant to the religion and laws of the Jews. The general complied with the request, and sent his army about, through the compass of an extensive plain, while he himself, with Herod the tetrarch, and his friends, went up to Jerusalem, to the celebration of a public festival which then approached. He was received with the utmost respect and honour, and took his abode there three days, during which time he transferred the office of high-priest from Jonathan to his brother Theophilus. Upon the fourth day he received intelligence of the death of Tiberius; and, in consequence thereof, made the people swear allegiance to Caius Caligula, the successor; called back his troops, and ordered them into winter quarters, putting a stop to the war upon the change of government.

There prevailed a report that, upon the intelligence of the expedition of Vitellius, Aretas consulted the diviners and soothsayers respecting the event of the undertaking, and that they foretold, "That the army then upon the march should never reach Petra; as either one of the princes would die, or the general appointed to the command, or the person against whom the war was made;" so that Vitellius returned to Antioch. As I am now relating these vicissitudes of human events, I deem it not foreign to the purpose to make some remarks on the fate of Herod and his family, which certainly displays remarkable instances of the wisdom and power of Divine Providence. It tends to shew, that dignity of birth, the most splendid fortune, or numerous progeny, are objects of no consideration with piety and virtue. We find this maxim confirmed in the case of Herod, who, within the course of an hundred years, had not any remains left of so numerous a family. This should serve as a check to the vain pretensions of arrogant mortals, and lead them to admire the wonders of Providence; and, amongst the rest, the advancement of Agrippa from a private fortune, to so eminent a degree of dignity and power. We have given an account of the progeny of Herod in the abstract, but shall now give it in detail.

Herod the Great had, by Mariamne, the daughter of Hyrcanus, two daughters, Salampso, who married Phasaël, the son of Phasaël, the king's eldest brother, with the father's consent, and Cypros, who married Antipater, the nephew of Herod, by his sister Salome.

Phasaël had, by Salampso, five children, Antipater, Herod, Alexander, and two daughters, Alexandra and Cypros, who married Agrippa, the son of Aristobulus; but Alexandra was married to one Timius, a nobleman of the isle of Cyprus, who died without issue. Agrippa had, by Cypros, two sons and three daughters. The latter were Bernice, Mariamne, and Drusilla; the former Agrippa, and Drusus, who died in his minority. Agrippa, the father, was brought up under his grand-father Herod the Great, together with his brothers Herod and Aristobulus, as was also Bernice, the daughter of Salome and Costobarus.

The children of Aristobulus were at that time infants, when their father, and his brother Alexander, were put to death by Herod. When they arrived to years of maturity, this Herod, the brother of Agrippa, married Mariamne, the daughter of Olympias (who was king Herod's daughter) and of Joseph, Herod's brother, by whom he had Aristobulus. Aristobulus, the third brother of Agrippa, married Jotape, the daughter of Samisgeram, king of the Emesenes, by whom he had a daughter called after her mother, and that was born deaf. These were the children of the three brothers; but Herodias, their sister, married Herod, the son of Herod the Great, whom he had by Mariamne, the daughter of Simon, the high-priest, and from thence came Salome; after whose birth Herodias made no scruple, in defiance of the law of our country, of taking Herod, the tetrarch of Galilee, for her second husband, though her husband's brother, by the father's side, having also abandoned a former husband who was yet living. Salome, the daughter, married Philip, the son of Herod, the tetrarch of Trachonites, who died without issue: after which he married Aristobulus, the son of Herod, and brother of Agrippa, by whom she had three sons, Herod, Agrippa, and Aristobulus. Thus much for the family of Phasaël and Salampso.

Cypros had, by Antipater, a daughter, called after the mother, who was married to Alexas Selcius, the son of Alexas, who, by her, had one daughter, Cypros. But Herod and Alexander, the brothers of Antipater, died without issue. Alexander, the son of king Herod, that was put to death by his father, had, by Glaphyra, the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, Alexander and Tigranes.

This Tigranes was that king of Armenia, who had an accusation brought against him by the Romans, and died without children. Alexander had a son called Tigranes also, after the name of his uncle, whom Nero advanced to be king of Armenia; and had a son named Alexander; who married Jotape, the daughter of Antiochus, king of Comagena, and was made king of Lesis, in Cilicia, by Vespasian. The race of Alexander's sons declined from the Jewish laws and discipline to the religion of the Greeks; and the other daughters of Herod the Great left no children behind them. Having thus gone through the posterity of this prince, as far as the reign of Agrippa, we shall now advert to the history of Agrippa himself, and shew the amazing

CHAP. VIII.

Exaltation and profusion of Agrippa. He conciliates the favour of the great. Incurs the hatred of his brother Aristobulus. Is graciously received by Cæsar at Caprææ. Charged with a defraud by Herennius. Dismissed the court. Success of his artifices. Dilatory temper of Tiberius. Agrippa committed to prison upon an accusation of Eutychus. Prediction of a German upon an owl's perching over Agrippa's head. Tiberius inexorable towards him. Popularity of Caius. Tiberius, upon consulting the oracle, as to the succession, is directed to Caius. Transfers the government to him. Death of Tiberius, and succession of Caius. Character of the late emperor. Agrippa discharged from confinement, and treated with singular honour. Marcellus appointed to the government of Judæa.

Extravagance of Agrippa.

AGRIPPA, being at Rome, a short time before the death of Herod the Great, and frequently admitted to the emperor's palace, had insinuated himself into the graces of his son Drusus, as also of Antonia, the wife of Drusus the elder, by means of his mother Bernice, for whom Antonia had great esteem. Agrippa was naturally of an open generous temper, but kept within the bounds of moderation, in his expences, during the life of his mother; but, upon her demise, gave into every excess of extravagance, and especially amongst the creatures of the court, insomuch that he had incurred such loads of debts, that he was under a necessity of abandoning Rome. Tiberius, at the same time, also losing his son, could not bear the sight of any of the companions of Drusus, as they would remind him of his loss.

Consequences attending it.

Having squandered his property, and injured his character, through his profusion, and being pressed by creditors without the means of making satisfaction, Agrippa returned to Judæa, and, partly thro' shame for his indiscretion, retired to Malatha, a castle in Idumæa, resolving there to put an end to a miserable life. Cypros, apprehending the most fatal effects from the daily increase of his melancholy, wrote to her sister Herodias an account of his very necessitous condition, adjuring her, by all the ties of honour and affinity, to afford him some assistance. This application so far wrought upon Herodias, that she prevailed with her husband to send for Agrippa, allow him a pension, and the government of Tiberias, for his present maintenance. But Herod did not long continue his protection; nor did Agrippa discover much satisfaction with his situation; insomuch, that, at a convivial board, Herod reflected upon his poverty, and reproached him with having, by his profusion, rendered himself a dependant on his bounty.

Is kindly received by Flaccus.

Agrippa, disgusted at so palpable a taunt, betook himself to Flaccus, a particular friend at Rome, and at that time governor of Syria. Flaccus gave him a kind reception, having, as a guest, Aristobulus, who, though his brother, was inimical to Agrippa: but this circumstance did not prevent Flaccus from dividing his good offices indiscriminately betwixt them. Aristobulus, however, indulged his spleen; and an incident occurred, that furnished him with the means of working Flaccus into an unfavourable opinion of Agrippa. There was a dispute betwixt the people of Damascus and those of Sidon concerning the limits of their territory. The cause was to be tried before Flaccus; and the people of Damascus being informed of the weight of influence Agrippa had with the governor, determined, by a valuable consideration, to engage him in their interest. The bargain was struck, and promises exchanged; so that Agrippa strenuously contended for the claim of Damascus in opposition to that of Sidon. Aristobulus, finding that his brother was actuated by a pecuniary motive, complained of him to the governor, who, upon examination, and proof of the charge, rejected Agrippa; so that being again abandoned to the wide world, he went to Ptolemais, with a resolution of going back again into Italy. In this extremity he employed Marfyas, one of his freedmen, to procure a sum of money upon any terms, to supply his present exigencies. Marfyas accordingly applied to Protus, a freeman of Bernice, the mother of Agrippa, and his late patroness, that, in her last will and testament had recommended him to the service of Antonia, for the loan of a sum of money to him upon his bond. Protus accused Agrippa with non-payment of what was already due; and by that means compelled Marfyas, when he made the bond of twenty thousand attic drachmæ, to accept of two thousand five hundred less than what he desired.

Upon the receipt of this supply, Agrippa went to Anthedon, took shipping, and prepared himself to put to sea. But intelligence of this being given to Herennius Capito, procurator of Jamnia, he sent a band of soldiers to demand of him payment of a debt of three hundred thousand drachmæ of silver, which he borrowed from Cæsar's treasury when he was at Rome. This accident, for a few hours, suspended his purpose. He made fair promises; but, when night came on, cut his cables, stood off to sea, and steered his course for Alexandria. Upon his arrival, he desired Alexander, the principal officer of the revenue, to lend him two hundred thousand drachmæ upon his own security. The officer rejected his request; but complimented his wife upon her known integrity, and offered the loan of the money upon her bond. In fine, upon the security of Cypros, Alexander supplied Agrippa with five talents at Alexandria, and letters of credit for the rest at Puteoli; for he was not willing to venture the whole sum in his hands together, from a knowledge of his profusion and extravagance. Cypros, finding, by this time, that her husband was resolutely bent upon his journey, went back with her children to Judæa by land.

He sails for Alexandria.

Agrippa goes for Rome.

Agrippa, upon his coming to Puteoli, informed Tiberius Cæsar (who then resided at Caprææ) by letter, that he was come so far to pay him his duty, and requested permission to wait upon him. Tiberius, without delay, returned him the kindest answer, with assurance of his gracious reception at Caprææ; and accordingly, upon his arrival, saluted him with the greatest tenderness, introduced him into his palace, and entertained him in the most sumptuous and magnificent manner. But the day following Cæsar received letters of complaint against Agrippa from Herennius Capito, setting forth that "being three hundred thousand drachmæ in the emperor's debt, and the money long since due, he had only demanded satisfaction in the bond; but that Agrippa, having stolen away to evade justice, the emperor was in danger of losing his money." Tiberius viewed this in so heinous a light, that he ordered the officers of his court not to admit Agrippa till he had paid his debt. Agrippa took no notice of the emperor's displeasure, but went to Antonia, the mother both of Germanicus and of Claudius, (who came afterwards to the empire), and setting forth the danger he was in of losing the favour of Cæsar, for the want of three hundred thousand drachmæ, obtained the loan of that sum from her, as a testimony of her respect for the memory of Bernice, and the friendship that had ever subsisted between them. With this money he discharged the debt; and not only re-instated himself in the emperor's favour, but gained so far upon him, that he committed his grandson Tiberius, the son of Drusus, to his care and government. Agrippa was so sensible of the obligations he had to Antonia, that he paid his court to her grandson Caius, who was held in general esteem, both for his own sake, and the reverence he had for the memory of Germanicus, his father. Agrippa found means of borrowing a million of drachmæ from one Thallus, a freeman of Cæsar; part of which he appropriated to the payment of Antonia, and the overplus to the defraying of the expences in his attendance upon Caius, who had now taken him into his greatest confidence.

The

The friendship between Agrippa and Caius coming to so great a height, the former took occasion, on the mention of Tiberius, as they were sitting together in a chariot, to suggest a wish, that "Tiberius was taken off the stage, and Caius succeeded to the empire." These words were overheard by Eutychus, who was Agrippa's freeman, and drove his chariot, but for the present did not disclose them. It happened soon after, that Eutychus, upon an accusation of robbing his master of some wearing apparel, deserted his service; and being apprehended, and brought before Piso, governor of the place, was asked the cause of it, when he replied, he had something to say to Cæsar, that tended to his security and preservation. Eutychus, upon this, was sent bound to Capreæ, and kept in chains by Tiberius, who, even on the most urgent occasion, was addicted to sloth and delay. He would not admit ambassadors without hesitation, nor supply vacancies in governments of provinces, till he received certain information of the deaths of former deputies or governors. He was very negligent also in hearing the causes of prisoners; and being asked, by his friends, the reason of his delay in such cases, he thus replied: "If I should give ambassadors too easy admittance, they, of course, would be soon dismissed, and others sent in their places; so that my whole time would be employed in admitting and discharging ambassadors. With respect to officers, when places are once filled, it is easier for the subject to keep than to change them; for magistrates are naturally covetous, and more so when they suppose their offices will not be of long duration."

That this is the true character of Tiberius needs no other proof than that, during the course of a reign of twenty years, he sent only two governors into Judæa, which were Gratus, and his successor, Pilate, and that he pursued the same plan in all other parts of his empire. The reason he gave also for the delay of bringing prisoners to their trial, was to keep them the longer in pain; and to punish them for their past crimes, by a lingering torment worse than death itself.

This was the true cause of Eutychus being kept so long in chains before Cæsar would vouchsafe to hear him: but Tiberius, after some time, coming from Capreæ to Tusculanum, about an hundred furlongs from Rome, Agrippa desired Antonia to move for Eutychus that he might have a hearing, that it might be known what he had to object against his patron. Tiberius had great respect for Antonia; partly through consanguinity, as being his sister-in-law, and the widow of Drusus, and partly through the reputation of her virtue, in the refusal of a second marriage, though she was importuned by Augustus himself. Besides these motives, Tiberius had personal obligations to Antonia; for had it not been for her sagacity, faith, and industry, that desperate plot of his minion, Sejanus, had certainly cost him his life. As he was a man of power and credit, the captain of his guards had engaged several men of senatorial dignity, divers of Cæsar's freemen, court favourites, and military officers, in the conspiracy. Sejanus had certainly gained his point, had not the vigilance and resolution of Antonia defeated his schemes: for when she had discovered his designs against Tiberius, she wrote him an exact account of the whole, gave the letter to Pallas, the most trusty of his servants, and sent to the emperor at Capreæ. By virtue of this discovery, both the confederacy itself, and the agents concerned in it, were brought to light, and justice done upon Sejanus and his accomplices. This added to Cæsar's former obligations to her, who, with propriety, could deny her no request; so that, upon the importunity of Agrippa, she pressed Tiberius to give Eutychus an hearing. The emperor consented, observing, that, if Eutychus had traduced Agrippa, he must abide by the consequence; and, on the other hand, if the accusation, upon enquiry, appeared to be true, the punishment would certainly fall upon the criminal. Antonia gave Agrippa this caution; and the more she inclined to moderation, he was the more eager to bring it to a scrutiny; inasmuch, that Antonia, when she found he would not take a denial, took an opportunity of accosting Tiberius, and presenting her request, that Eutychus might be called and heard. He most solemnly appealed to the gods, that what he was about to do he did reluctantly, and only in compliance with her request.

Upon this he commanded Macro, successor to Sejanus in his commission for the guards, to cause Eutychus to be brought before him; and as soon as he came into his presence, asked him what he had to allege against his patron Agrippa, who gave him his freedom? He answered, with all humility, that, "as he was one day driving Caius and Agrippa in his chariot, he overheard some discourse that passed between them; and particularly remarked a suggestion, that came from Agrippa, intimating a wish that Tiberius might be taken off the stage, and Caius succeed to the empire," as it might redound to his interest and advantage. Tiberius was disposed to believe this information, and was much incensed at Agrippa, because that, after his having committed the care of his grandson to him, he had dedicated himself wholly to the service of Caius. The emperor, upon this, turning to Macro, exclaimed, "Put him in chains." Macro, not understanding to whom Tiberius referred, asked him what man? The emperor sternly replied, "Agrippa." The latter immediately betook himself to prayers and supplications, adjuring Tiberius, by the tenderness he had for the memory of his son, with whom he had the honour to be so well acquainted, and for the sake of the services he had been so happy as to render to his grandson, to vouchsafe him his pardon. But all his intreaties were in vain; for the guards dragged him to prison in his purple robes as they found him. The weather being extremely hot, and Agrippa ready to perish with thirst, he observed one of Caius's slaves, whose name was Thaumastus, carrying some water in a vessel, and desired that he would let him drink. The servant immediately complied with his request; and having drunk heartily, he promised, for the service he had rendered him, if he surmounted the present difficulty, to prevail with Caius to grant him his freedom. Nor did he deceive him in his promise; for when he afterwards came to the crown, he procured Thaumastus's liberty, made him steward over his own estate, and, at his death, recommended him to his son Agrippa, and to Bernice his daughter, to continue him in that charge, wherein he acquitted himself with great honour during the remainder of his life.

As Agrippa was standing in chains before the palace, with others of his fellow prisoners, and leaning in a melancholy posture against a tree, there came an owl and perched upon it. A German, that was there in bonds, observing it, enquired of one of the soldiers, who that man in purple was? Being informed that he was a Jew of the first rank in point of extraction, he desired the soldier to suffer him to approach in order to speak to him, as he wished to enquire concerning some things relating to his country. This being granted, the German, by an interpreter, thus addressed him: "I perceive, young man, this sudden and surprizing change of fortune casts you down; nor will you easily be persuaded how near your deliverance approaches under the favour and protection of a Divine Providence that watches over you. I call the gods to witness, both yours and ours, by whose permission it is that we are here in bonds, that I speak not this to amuse and flatter you with vain hopes; for I well know that prognostics of this kind, if the event does not accord with the prediction, aggravate instead of alleviate the ills of life. But I deem it my incumbent duty, at all hazards, to assure you, that you will experience such a change of times and things, as shall advance you, from this state of misery and dejection, to the highest pinnacle of honour and power, and render you the envy of those who either despised or pitied you before. The remainder of your days shall be happy; and you shall leave children behind you to succeed to your good fortunes. But remember this, whenever you see this bird again, the fifth day after it will be your last. This is the “ sum of what you are given to understand by this “ good omen. My revelation is certain; and I de“ liver you the truth, to support you in your pre“ sent trouble, with the hope of better things to “ come. I am now to beseech you further, that, “ when you find these things come to pass, you “ will not forget your fellow sufferers, but consult “ the deliverance of those you leave behind you.”

A German's prediction concerning Agrippa.

The prophecy of this German appeared as ludicrous and improbable to Agrippa, in the relation; as it was afterwards wonderful and surprizing in the accomplishment. Antonia, in the mean time, was deeply affected by the hard usage of her friend; but taking it for granted, that Tiberius was not to be wrought upon, and that all applications and inter-cessions would therefore be in vain, all that she could do was to prevail with Macro to render his situation more tolerable, by setting affable, tractable men as guards over him; allowing him to sit at table with the officers who had him in custody; and giving access to his friends that were disposed to visit him. All this was accordingly granted, inasmuch that Silas, his friend, and Mariyas and Stychus, two of his freemen, brought him the most acceptable diet; and afforded him many other indulgen-cies under the connivance of the soldiers, from the hints they had received from Macro.

When Agrippa had remained in confinement six months, Tiberius, upon his return to Capreae, was taken with a faint indisposition, which increased upon him to such a degree, that he had no hopes of recovery. Perceiving his case desperate, he sent Evodus, a freeman, in whom he confided, to bring his children to him early the next morning, to take a last interview with their dying father. I would here be understood as speaking of adopted children;
 for he had none of his own; Drusus, his only son, being deceased: but Tiberius, surnamed Gemellus, the son of Drusus, was living; as was Caius, the son of his brother Germanicus, who had now attained to man's estate, and possessed most excellent accomplishments. He was the darling of the people, from the reverence they had for the memory of his father's virtues, who was a prince of the greatest moderation, affability, and condescension.
 His illustrious example not only gained the favour of the senate and people of Rome, but of the provinces in general that were subject to the empire, which he conciliated by every good office, and token of justice and humanity. His death, in fine, was not so much celebrated with external pomp and shew, as with tears flowing from real affection and compunction of heart; for the whole body of the people lamented the death of this prince as if each individual subject had lost a father. The reputation of Germanicus tended greatly to the interest of his son Caius, but particularly recommended him to the soldiers, who were ready to lay down their lives for his service.

Tiberius
 proposes an omen concerning his successor.

Tiberius, having given orders to Evodus to bring his sons to him the next morning, he prayed to the gods of his country to direct him, by some manifest signal, as to the appointment to the succession. He gave himself the preference to Tiberius; but durst not venture to pre-judge or determine in a point of such importance, without consulting the oracle. He then proposed to govern himself by this token, that he of the two that came first to him in the morning should be his successor. Having thus resolved, he gave it in charge to the tutor of Tiberius, his grandson, to bring his pupil to him by break of day, taking it for granted that the signal requested would be in his favour. But it fell out otherwise; for, upon his sending Evodus, by peep of day, to bring in him whom he should first see, he found only Caius, and accordingly informed him that the emperor required his presence. Tiberius, it seems, not suspecting the importance of the business upon which he was to attend, had rather loitered than hastened upon the occasion.

The omen for the empire in favour of Caius.

The emperor was not a little startled at the sight of Caius, considering in what manner Providence had defeated him in his design of disposing of the government, by settling it contrary to his inclination. But he was more affected through this disappointment, by apprehension for the personal safety of his grandson, than lots of the empire. For when dominion is in question, power must carry it: ambition knows no kindred; and amongst rivals for sway, the one can never think himself safe but in the ruin of the other.

Tiberius had been very much given to astrology, and the calculation of nativities, and had governed his actions, in a great measure, by the direction of wizards and fortune-tellers. Accordingly, happening once to cast his eye upon Galba, he turned to some particular friends about him, and exclam-ed, “ That man will be emperor of Rome.” Upon the whole, none of the emperors were so much addicted to divination as Tiberius. But nothing touched him so sensibly as this foreboding encounter of the two competitors, which wrought upon him in such a manner, that he gave up his grandson for lost, abandoned himself to a kind of despair, and involved himself in perplexed researches into the designs of Providence, that are wisely concealed from mortals, when he might have lived happily in a patient resignation to the will of heaven. Though he was much disordered by this unexpected resolution of the government for those to whom he did not intend it, yet deeming it a point of expediency to speak upon the occasion, he delivered himself to the following effect:

“ I need not tell you, Caius, that Tiberius is “ nearest to me in blood; yet, upon consulting the “ will of the immortal gods, and my own reason, I “ do hereby transfer the government of the Roman “ empire to your hands. I do likewise adjure you, “ that, in the exercise of this power, you never for“ get the obligation you have to him from whom “ you received it; and that you shew your gratitude “ to your patron, by every demonstration of love “ and friendship to your brother Tiberius. I ask “ nothing more in return for the dignity I have now “ conferred upon you (for next to the gods you “ owe it all to me) than that you be not wanting “ in any thing to him, whom nature itself hath “ made almost inseparable from me. I am farther “ to remind you, that it is as much your in“ terest as your duty to follow my injunction: for “ the security and splendor of your own fortune de“ pends, in a great measure, upon the life and wel“ fare of your brother; and the day of his death
 “ will be the eve of your misery. Sovereignty is a “ giddy, slippery height, and a dangerous ascent for “ a man to stand upon alone; because sins against “ the ties of consanguinity and nature, never fail “ of being followed by Divine vengeance.” These were the last words of Tiberius to Caius, who promised punctual obedience in every point; though it was evident, from the result, he never intended it; for he no sooner possessed the command, than he put his brother to death; and he himself, according to the presage of Tiberius, was assassinated some years after.

Tiberius, having declared Caius his successor, within a few days after departed this life, having reigned twenty-two years, five months, and thirteen days. Caius was now the fourth in the roll of the emperors. The rumour of the death of Tiberius was grateful to the Romans, though they durst not venture too much upon the truth of it, being fearful lest, through their credulity, they might discover a satisfaction that would subject them to the information of spies, and be attended with certain death. Tiberius was, in disposition, fierce and in-exorable to the highest degree; his passion was easily inflamed, and his resentment was implacable. He conceived aversion without cause, and executed vengeance without demerit; pronouncing the rigorous sentence of death for the slightest offences. It therefore concerned the people to be cautious, as to the discovery of their joy for the tidings, considering the mortal danger of being found in a mistake.

Mariyas, Agrippa's freeman, no sooner heard of the death of Tiberius, than he posted with the glad tidings to his patron, whom he found going into a bath, and whispered in the Hebrew tongue, "The lion is dead." Agrippa understood the meaning, and burst forth into a kind of extacy, "How shall I requite thee for this, and many other good offices that thou hast rendered me, if it be as thou sayest? The officer, who had Agrippa in custody, observing the haste with which Mariyas delivered the message, and the rapture with which Agrippa received it, and concluding that the words implied some great innovation, desired Agrippa to give him an explanation. He, at first, declined it; but, upon being pressed, told him, in confidence, the whole story. The officer congratulated him on the good news, and treated him with a sumptuous regale; but, as they were in the midst of their conviviality, a messenger arrived with intelligence, that Tiberius was past danger, and would speedily come to town. These words threw the officer into the greatest consternation, from a consciousness that he had forfeited his head, by regaling with a state prisoner upon the news of Cæsar's death. He therefore pushed Agrippa, in a rage, from his seat, and exclaimed, "Dost thou think to impose upon me with a lie, concerning the death of the emperor, without punishment? Be assured, that thine head shall be the price of this malicious report." He then ordered him into chains again, and a stronger guard to be kept over him than before.

When Agrippa had passed the night in this aggravated state of misery, the rumour of the death of Tiberius revived the next day, insomuch that it was publicly spoken of, and sacrifices were offered up as tokens of general joy. Letters arrived from Caius, one to the senate, to inform them, that Tiberius had declared him his successor, and the other to Piso, governor of the city, to the same purpose; giving orders also, that Agrippa should be discharged the prison, and allowed the liberty of the house in which he had been before his commitment; so that he was now out of all danger and apprehension, and, though in custody, in all other respects in a state of freedom.

Upon the return of Caius to Rome with the body of Tiberius, the funeral obsequies were performed with the utmost pomp and solemnity. The emperor would have discharged Agrippa the same day, but Antonia objected to it; not from any motive of ill-will, but because it would be deemed an instance of disrespect to the memory of Tiberius, to set free his prisoner so hastily. However, in the course of a few days, Caius took him home, caused him to be arrayed in royal habiliments, put a diadem upon his head, and made him successor to Philip's tetrarchy. He also gave him the tetrarchy of Lysanias; and changed his iron chain for a golden one of the same weight. Marcellus at the same time was sent governor into Judæa.

In the second year of the reign of Caius Cæsar, Agrippa requested permission to go home, in order to settle the affairs of his government, with a promise of returning at a stated time. The people, on his arrival, were astonished to see him with a crown upon his head, though it demonstrated to them the vicissitude of human events, in the sudden change from the extreme of one condition to that of another. Some looked upon him as the happiest of men; whilst others were so amazed at the circumstances of the revolution, that they could scarcely believe even what they saw.

CHAP IX.

The envy of Herodias. She presses her husband to apply to Caius in his own behalf. Herod, with much reluctance, consents. Fortunatus is sent by Agrippa as a spy. Articles of accusation exhibited against Herod. Conspiracy of Sejanus and Artabanus against Caius. Herod confesses, and is condemned to perpetual exile. Caius rules well at first, but afterwards presumptuously arrogates to himself Divine honours.

HERODIAS, the sister of Agrippa, and wife of Herod, the tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa, the country beyond Jordan, became fraught with envy at the present condition of her brother, who, from a state of penury and dejection, was now advanced to splendor, dignity, and power, above her husband. Her haughty spirit was particularly raised in seeing him appear in all the pomp and magnificence of royalty, and exhibit himself as a public spectacle to the multitude. In the violence of her passion, she urged her husband to go immediately to Rome, and intreat Cæsar to confer on him the same honours. In order to incite him to compliance, she represented, "that it would be death to her to see her husband, who was the son of a king, and stood fair in the affections of the people, as well as in his pretensions to the succession, stand tamely by, and behold the son of Aristobulus, a bankrupt and criminal, that had suffered under the hands of justice, advanced to a throne." She also observed, "that if Herod had hitherto patience to live beneath the dignity of his father's son, it was now time to exert himself in vindication of the honour of his family, without suffering himself to own the superiority of a wretch who had been a dependant on his bounty." She therefore insisted on their going immediately to Rome at any expence, as money could not possibly be applied to a better use than that of obtaining a kingdom.

Herod, from a natural love of ease, and an unfavourable opinion of the court of Rome, used every means to divert his wife from her design; but the more he receded, the more she pressed him, having formed an uncontrollable resolution to pursue her point at all events. In fine, she was so urgent, that he seemed under a necessity, in his own defence, of complying with her importunities; so that they set off for Rome together, with an equipage suitable to the dignity and importance of the occasion.

Agrippa, having intelligence of every thing that passed, resolved on the means of counteracting their designs. He kept his freeman, Fortunatus, in readiness with letters and presents for the emperor; and as soon as Herod should sail for Rome, he was to put to sea after him, with particular instructions as to his mode of proceeding on his arrival. Fortunatus had a quick voyage, and arrived at Puteoli at the same time with Herod: but Caius happened at that time to be at the Baia, a small town in Compagne, about five furlongs from Puteoli, a place famous for grand apartments in the royal palace; the emperors, that frequented the hot baths there, striving to outdo each other in the magnificence and convenience of their buildings.

Herod, on coming to this place, paid his dutiful obedience to the emperor; and Fortunatus immediately after presented him his letters. The emperor, on perusal, found them to contain a direct charge against Herod: first, for being a party in the confederacy of Sejanus against Tiberius; and now for joining with Artabanus, king of Parthia, against the government of Caius; as a demonstration of which he alledged, that he had then a magazine of arms sufficient for seventy thousand men. Caius, moved at this information, demanded of Herod, whether he had such a store of arms or not? The fact was so clear that he could not deny it: so that the emperor, deeming this sufficient ground of evidence for treason, took away his government, and gave it to Agrippa, with his money also, as a reward for his discovery. He sentenced Herod to exile during life; and fixed Lyons, a city of Gaul, for the place of his residence. As for Herodias, whom he knew to be the sister of Agrippa, he gave her the full command of whatever belonged to her; and, without making her a sharer of her husband's calamity, promised to treat her with lenity for the sake of her brother. But Herodias spurned his offered favours; declared she was not in a condition to enjoy the benefit of his bounty; nor could she, after having shared in her husband's better fortunes, now abandon him in adversity. This greatness of mind, laudable as it was, gave such offence to Caius, that, through an idea of its being an indignity offered him, he banished and confined Herodias together with her husband. This seems to have been a judgment

The reign of Caius, during the two first years of his government, was prudent and moderate, and his conduct gained exceedingly on the people both at Rome itself, and in the provinces. A tumult at Alexandria between the Jews and the Greeks. They send an embassy to Caius. Apion maintains the cause of the Greeks: Philo that of the Jews.

Ambassadors sent to Caius from the Greeks and Jews.

Philo treated with ignominy by Caius.

A TUMULT having arisen at Alexandria, betwixt the Jews and the Greeks, three ambassadors were chosen from each party at variance, and sent to Caius to decide the matter. Apion was the chief on the part of the Greeks; as was Philo on the part of the Jews. The principal allegation of Apion against the Jews was, "that whereas temples and altars were erected by all the subjects of the Roman empire elsewhere in honour of Caius; and the same adoration paid to the emperor as to the rest of the gods: the Jews alone refused either to dedicate images to Cæsar, or to swear by his name." Apion began with this invective, and used his utmost efforts to inflame Caius against the Jews. But Philo, the brother of Alexander, chief officer of the revenue, and a man of eminent literary abilities, standing up in defence of the Jews against the allegations of Apion, Caius, in a violent rage, commanded him to depart. Philo, on this choleric repulse, turned to the Jews, who were about him, and bade them be of good courage, adding laconically, "Now Caius is against us, God will be for us."

CHAP. XI.

Caius, in resentment of a supposed indignity offered him by the Jews, orders Petronius to set up his standard in their temple. The Jews expostulate with Petronius, and collect themselves into a body. They are supported by Aristobulus, and other men of rank, who desire Petronius to lay the case before Cæsar. Petronius deliberates upon it; and summons the Jews to Tiberias. Caius sends Petronius to set up his statue in the temple of the Jews.

CAIUS was so highly offended at the imagined insult of the Jews in standing in defiance of his orders, that he sent Petronius to take upon him the government of Syria instead of Vitellius, directing him to enter Judæa with a powerful army, and set up his statue in the temple. He was farther instructed, if they refused compliance with his commands, to enforce compulsion by dint of arms. Petronius accordingly took upon himself the government, and hastened, with all possible expedition, to execute the commands of Cæsar. To this end he collected a body of auxiliaries, which, with two Roman legions, he put into winter quarters in Ptolemais, to be ready to march early in the ensuing spring. He wrote an account of his proceedings, from time to time, to Caius, who commended his zeal and attention, and encouraged him for his conduct; being resolved, as he declared, to punish the contumacy of those stubborn people.

There came at this time multitudes of Jews to Petronius at Ptolemais, to present him their petitions not to compel them to transgress and violate the laws of their forefathers; assuring him, that if he was determined to erect a statue in their temple, he must first take away their lives; for that, as long as they had breath, they would not suffer such things to be done as were directly prohibited by their great and much revered legislator. Petronius sternly replied, "that if he were at his own liberty, their petitions might have an effect; but that being under Cæsar's command, he must at his peril obey Cæsar's orders." The Jews, in answer, said, "that if he could not depart from his master's orders, neither could they from theirs; and that, through Divine assistance, they were resolved to tread in the steps of their forefathers as they had hitherto done; that they preferred the consideration of eternity to that of time; and the preservation of their religion and laws, to that of their lives and fortunes; that their trust was in the providence and protection of the Almighty; and that, in fine, they submitted it to his determination, whether they should obey the voice of heaven, or the voice of Caius."

Petronius gathering from his discourse, that they were inflexible in their resolution, and that, without a profusion of blood, he could not be subservient to Caius in the dedication of his statue, took some friends and attendants with him, and hastened to Tiberias, to be within distance of being more particularly informed of the manners, customs, and affairs of the people with whom he had to deal. The Jews were alarmed at the approach of the Romans; not so much from the apprehension of a war, as an invasion upon their religion and laws; so that many thousands went in a body to Petronius, most passionately requesting him, not to drive the multitude to acts of desperation, by offering to profane the temple with forbidden images. Petronius then exclaimed, "Will you wage war with Cæsar, without considering his mighty preparations, and your own weakness?" They replied, "We will not, by any means, wage war with him; but are still determined to die, rather than live to see the violation of our laws. Upon this they cast themselves upon the ground, laid bare their necks, intimating thereby that they were resigned to death. In this manner they passed forty days, without attending to the business of husbandry, though the season of the year required it. Indeed, the common offices of life were wholly neglected; as they were unanimously resolved rather to die than be spectators of the dedication of the statue."

While matters were in this state, Aristobulus, the brother of king Agrippa, and Elcias, surnamed the Great, with several of the first rank amongst the Jews, applied themselves to Petronius, desiring him, "as he saw the resolution of the multitude, not to proceed to such measures as would drive them to despair; but rather to inform Caius of the difficulty of the undertaking, and the inflexible resolution of the party, who had neglected all the offices of life, not from the least principle of disloyalty, but a determination rather to die, than suffer the violation of their religion and laws." They suggested also, "that a consideration that this neglect of their husbandry must of necessity expose the country to rapine, and disable the inhabitants from paying their taxes, might induce Cæsar to relent, and consequently remove all colour for a rebellion; or that, if nothing could divert him from carrying on a war, he must use his pleasure." This was the purport of their address, as delivered by Aristobulus.

Petronius was no stranger to the revengeful temper of Caius, especially upon any delay in the execution of his commands; but such were the horrors of his conscience, when he thought of sacrificing so many lives to his frantic fury, that, from this consideration, together with the rank and credit of the intercessors, the importance of the affair, and the danger of driving an obstinate people into desperation, he came to a resolution, at all hazards, of laying the state of the case plainly before Cæsar; reflecting, that, though he might incur his hatred and resentment thereby, it was a duty he owed to humanity, to save so many thousands from destruction, even at the expence of his own life.

*Calls the

berais.*

Petronius, upon this deliberation, summoned a meeting of the Jews at Tiberais, where they attended in great numbers; and he thus addressed them upon the occasion: "It is not through my own will and desire that I have undertaken this expedition, but by the command of Cæsar. I need not tell you the danger of deferring the execution of my orders, (for sovereign powers will not be trifled with,) to say nothing of the duty incumbent in me to fulfill the pleasure of a prince to whom I owe my preferment. But after all this, as the case now stands, I do not so much regard my own personal safety, or my credit with my master, as I do the preservation of a people, in the justifiable defence of their religion and laws. I shall therefore send express to Caius, and acquaint him with your final resolution concerning the statue; nor shall any thing be wanting in me, that can induce him to comply with every thing you can reasonably desire. May the Divine Providence, that overrules all human powers and purposes, preserve your religion sacred and inviolate; and avert from the emperor those judgments that may be due to his present design. With respect to myself, if it should be my lot to fall under his displeasure, I am prepared to submit to the loss of fortune, or of life, so that I may not see the destruction of so many good men for well-doing. Let every man, therefore, betake himself to his own home and occupation. Return to your lands and tillage, and leave me to manage the business with the emperor, and you may depend on my utmost exertion to give you all possible satisfaction." With these words he dismissed the assembly.

Petronius had no sooner finished this agreeable address to the Jews, than an extraordinary accident seemed to indicate the approbation of heaven: for there fell a shower, contrary to all human expectation as the day was clear, the sky serene, and there was not a cloud to be seen. This happened after so long a drought, that they almost despaired of having more rain; and if they rarely saw a flying cloud, it blew over without any effect. This wonderful and seasonable relief, beyond all expectation, was looked upon, by the Jews, as a blessing upon the prayers of Petronius in their behalf. Nor was Petronius less sensible of it himself; as it appeared so convincing an evidence from heaven in favour of the Jews, that it would not bear the least doubt or contradiction. He was very minute in his report to the emperor, and laid the necessary points before him, representing the consequences of pursuing such a multitude of resolute people to extremities, and rendering so many thousand men desperate, as nothing but absolute force would ever compel them to desist: beside, that, in the violent prosecution of them, he would but sink his own revenue, and inflict a punishment on himself, that would turn to his reproach; and subjoining likewise, that the Jews were a people acceptable to God, who had given them many wonderful tokens of his peculiar favour.

King Agrippa happened to be at Rome at this time, and was insinuating himself daily more and more into the graces of the emperor, to conciliate whose esteem was his whole study and application. To that end he prepared an entertainment for Caius, which, for variety, curiosity, delicacy, order, and expence, exceeded every thing of the kind that went before, not excepting the most sumptuous regalia of Cæsar himself. Caius was so charmed with the magnificence of the treat, and the hearty welcome of the donor, that he determined to enter into a kind of competition, and vie with him in good offices. When his spirits were cheered with generous wine, he frankly disclosed his mind in terms to this import: "This is not the first proof, Agrippa, I have had of your friendship and affection. In the days of Tiberius, I had many evidences of it to your hazard, as you have now obliged me to your cost; and to so excessive a degree, that you have consulted my honour and pleasure more than your own convenience. It would be unworthy of my character to suffer myself to be overcome by benefits. I am therefore resolved to make compensation by the advancement of your station in life, as well as your fortune. Upon this frank and unlimited promise, Cæsar imagined that Agrippa would have mentioned commissions, provinces, and ample revenues. But Agrippa, having pre-determined the subject of his boon, suspended the declaration of it till he could introduce it with a better grace, and contented himself with this answer: "As I had no private views, Sire, in the little services I did you in the time of Tiberius, so I propose nothing more to myself at present, than the honour and happiness of your favour and protection. You have done more for me already than I could reasonably expect; and though I am persuaded you have greater things in your power, permit me to make this profession with grateful acknowledgments for what I have received, that I neither deserve nor seek for any thing farther."

proposals.*

Caius was so amazed at the modesty of Agrippa, that he urged him to prefer his request, assuring him that nothing should be denied him. Agrippa then thus addressed him: "Since, Sire, you are so generous as to lay this kind command upon me, I shall presume to offer you one request. It will be neither riches, nor honours; for, through your bounty, I enjoy a plenitude of these. The grant of my request will recommend you to the favour both of God and man; and it will redound to my immortal fame, if I can obtain this concession, after so many others to crown all the rest. My desire is that you will be pleased to revoke your order to Petronius for setting up your statue in the temple of the Jews." Agrippa was conscious that he preferred this request at the hazard of his life. Caius, however, through the complacent influence of the entertainment, and the shame of refusing a request he had himself extorted, together with the deference he paid to the modesty and humanity of the petitioner, immediately complied; and wrote to Petronius, approving his general conduct; and instructing him, if the statue was erected, to let it remain; if not, to trouble himself no farther about it, but disband his army, and return to Syria; assuring him, at the same time, that he remitted the punishment due to a most flagrant contempt of his orders, at the instance of Agrippa; for whom he entertained so great a respect, that he could deny him nothing.

This was the substance of the emperor's letter to Petronius, which was written before he had the least intimation of an insurrection intended amongst the Jews: but, upon receiving intelligence that they were ready to revolt, he fell into such a burst of passion, to find his authority trampled on by that obstinate people, that he immediately changed his style, and wrote a second letter to Petronius to this effect: "Since you appear to prefer the Jews' money to my commands, (from your neglecting the one to obtain the other,) judge yourself what you are to expect from my indignation and justice. I am resolved to make an example of you, both to the present age and to posterity, that all the world may know that sovereign power is not to be defied." This letter was sent to Petronius by Cæsar: but he did not receive it while Caius was living; for the bearer of it having a lingering passage, he received letters in the mean time, with intelligence of the death of the emperor. It seems to have been a kind interposition of Providence in favour of Petronius for the zeal he had shewn, and the dangers he had undergone, for the sake of his own honour, and the religion of the Jews. But Caius being cut off in the career of his blasphemous vanity, in arrogating to himself Divine honours, Petronius had the thanks of the Romans, as well as of the Jews, for his eminent services to the public upon that occasion; and more especially the acknowledgment of the senate, whom Caius had treated, in many instances, with most scornful contempt. He died soon after after he had written the letter to Petronius, denouncing his death. But the ground of the conspiracy, and the manner of executing it, we ſhall treat of upon a future occaſion. The news of the emperor's death to Petronius, was followed by the letter that contained the menace of his own: and as he could not, under thoſe circumſtances, but rejoice at the former, ſo neither could he but admire the Divine Providence, that, in the ſame inſtant, rewarded the veneration he had paid to the holy temple, and his deliverance of the Jews out of their diſtreſs. Thus was the life of Petronius wonderfully preſerved.

CHAP. XII.

Origin of the calamity of the Jews in Babylon and Meſopotamia. Their ſacred treaſure depoſited in Nearda and Niſſibis, two ſtrong places upon the Euphrates. Aſinæus and Anilæus deſert the ſervice of their maſters, form a ſtrong party, and build an impregnable fort, at which the king of Parthia takes alarm. Scouts bring advice of the approach of the enemy. The law of neceſſity a diſpenſation for the ſabbath. Aſinæus totally routs the enemy. Artabanus courts the alliance of the two brothers. The Parthian general aſks the king's permiſſion to put Aſinæus to death, but is reſuſed. Artabanus adviſes Aſinæus to withdraw, and gives him the command of Babylon. The brothers acquire great renown, but loſe it by falling from the religion and cuſtom of their country. Anilæus becomes enamoured with a Parthian woman, ſlays her huſband, and takes her to his bed. The deſection degenerates to idolatry; and a general clamour is raiſed againſt Aſinæus, who is at length poiſoned by the woman. Anilæus breaks in upon Mithridates, and carries off vaſt a booty. Mithridates draws out his army upon Anilæus, but deſers fighting till the ſabbath. Anilæus takes Mithridates priſoner, and routs his army. The latter then gives the former a total defeat. The Jews and Babylonians treat about an alliance, but cannot come to an agreement. The Greeks and Syrians in a league againſt the Jews, of whom upwards of fifty thouſand are ſlain.

THE Jews of Meſopotamia and Babylon were now in a more calamitous ſtate than had ever been known heretofore: it is therefore neceſſary to trace the origin of the various evils that beſet them.

There is, in the province of Babylon, a city, called Nearda, very populous, and fruitful in ſoil, as well as fortified and encompassed by the river Euphrates. Near it is another ſtrong city, called Niſſibis, upon the ſame river. The Jews, depending on the ſtrength of theſe two places, depoſited the common ſtock of their ſacred treaſure, as it was brought in and dedicated, from time to time, according to cuſtom. From hence it was tranſmitted to Jeruſalem, in the proper ſeaſon, under ſtrong convoys, for fear of the ravages of the Parthians, to whom the Babylonians were then ſubject. There were among the Jews of Nearda two brothers, Aſinæus and Anilæus. Their father being dead, they were put out by their mother, to learn the art of weaving and making ſail-cloth, which, amongſt the inhabitants of that place, was accounted no diſparagement. Having been remiſs in their attention to buſineſs, they were puniſhed by the ſuperintendant, which they reſented very highly; armed themſelves with the weapons that were kept in the ſactory, and went to a certain place upon the partition of the river, where was great plenty of corn, graſs, fruit, and all manner of proviſion for a winter ſtore. While they continued in this retreat, a neceſſitous band of youthful, daring adventurers enliſted themſelves under their command, ſo that they acted without controul. By the aſſiſtance of this party, they built an impregnable fort; and then ſent their emiſſaries to raiſe contributions through- out the adjacent country, with ample aſſurances of friendſhip and protection to thoſe who complied, and the ſevereſt menaces againſt thoſe who reſuſed. The inhabitants being, as it were, compelled to compliance with their requiſition, they became, in a ſhort time, ſo numerous and powerful, as to defy oppoſition, inſomuch that the king of Parthia was alarmed at this commotion.

The governor of Babylon receiving intelligence of theſe proceedings, determined to ſuppreſs them in their riſe; and, to that end, collected his troops, both out of Parthia and Babylon, and marched with all expedition, in order to ſurprize them. When he had advanced thro' bye-ways to the ſkirts of a lake, he made an halt, and depending that (the next day being the ſabbath) they would not dare to fight, proceeded gradually, thinking to fall upon them ſuddenly, and make them priſoners without reſiſtance.

But Aſinæus, who was at that time ſitting upon a bank, with his companions and arms about him, imagining he heard the neighing of horſes, and the champing of their bits, in order to obviate the circumvention of an enemy, propoſed that ſcouts ſhould be diſpatched to make diſcovery. They were accordingly ſent out, and, in a ſhort time, haſtily returned, with aſſurance, that the apprehenſion of Aſinæus was well founded, as the enemy was at hand, and upon the very point of executing their revenge. The ſcouts added, that they had cavalry enough to over-run and trample them under-foot; while many urged, that they were reſtrained by their religion from making reſiſtance on the ſabbath-day. But Aſinæus was of a different opinion, and repreſented the folly and puſillanimity of ſuffering themſelves to be tamely butchered to gratify a barbarous enemy. He then propounded to them the law of neceſſity and ſelf-preſervation, as the moſt powerful of all motives; encouraged them to follow his example, that, at all events, they might not fall unrevenged; and ſo commit the reſt to Providence. Animated by the exhortation of their leaders, the party of Aſinæus boldly advanced to the combat, and finding the enemy in a careleſs ſupine poſture, as if ready to take poſſeſſion of victory, rather than diſpute it, they fell upon them, ſlew great numbers, and put the reſt to flight.

The intrepidity of the two brothers, upon the news of this defeat, alarmed the king of Parthia to that degree, that he became deſirous of an interview with them; and, to that end, diſpatched one of his guards, in whom he moſt confided, with a meſſage, purporting, “that he had a commiſſion from Artabanus, king of Parthia, to inform Aſinæus and Anilæus, that, although he had been unjuſtly treated by them, in making inroads upon his territories, he was ready to bury paſt injuries in oblivion, from the character he had heard of their perſonal bravery: that, in the name of his maſter, and without any fraud or indirec[t meaning, he deſired to enter into a league of friendſhip with them: that he had to offer them, upon his faith and honour, all aſſurances they could poſſibly deſire of ſecurity in their journey, backwards and forwards: and laſtly, that they would find the king a munificent and generous prince, ready, upon all occaſions, to give them farther proofs of his gracious intentions.”

Notwithſtanding the frankneſs of the invitation, Aſinæus, from cauſes of ſuſpicion, declined the viſit himſelf, but ſent his brother Anilæus with ſuch preſents as he could procure. Upon his arrival, he was admitted to the preſence of the king, who, finding that he came alone, enquired wherefore his brother did not accompany him: and Anilæus giving the king to underſtand, that he remained in his ſtation near the lake, from apprehenſion of danger, he ſwore by the gods of his country, that neither of them ſhould ſuſtain the leaſt injury, in perſon or property; and, as a ratification of his oath, gave Anilæus his right hand, which, with theſe barbarians, is the moſt ſacred tie of good faith that can be given. After that ceremony is paſt, they are free from all ſuſpicion.

suspicion of false dealing. Artabanus, upon his assurance, sent Anilæus back again, to persuade his brother to pay him a visit, in contemplation of the services they might render him conjunctively, by keeping those provinces in awe, that seemed inclined to a revolt in his absence. Nor could he be certain, that while he himself was employed in the suppression of a rebellion on the one hand, Asinæus was not fortifying himself, and doing mischief about Babylon, on the other.

The brothers go to the king together.

He admires Anilæus.

Takes care of his preservation.

Asinæus, understanding, by the report of his brother, how well disposed Artabanus was towards them both, and with what oaths and protestations he had confirmed the sincerity of his professions, was prevailed upon to visit him, which he accordingly did, accompanied by Anilæus. The king received them courteously; and could not but admire the greatness of Asinæus's mind, especially when placed in comparison with the diminutive figure of his person, which then appeared so disproportionate, that he passed as a remark to his friends, "That the soul of that man was never made for his body." Taking occasion one day, at table, to mention the martial character, and feats of arms, achieved by Asinæus, to Abdagatus, his general, in terms of the highest commendation, the general made no other reply than that of requesting permission to put him to the sword for the indignity he had offered the Parthians. The king returned, "that he would never consent to the massacre of a man, who had committed himself to his honour, and whom he was bound by solemn oath to protect: but that if the general was inclined to signalize his valour, he might find a means of taking revenge for the indignity offered the Parthians, without involving him in the guilt of perjury, and this by attacking him on his return, without making him privy to his purpose."

Give him the command of Babylon, and dismiss him with presents.

He exert power and influence.

Origin of the calamities that befel the brothers.

The king next morning sent for Asinæus, and thus addressed him: "Return home, gallant youth, left, through the indignation and resentment of my officers, you sustain mischiefs which I cannot prevent. Let me commend Babylon to your care; exert your utmost efforts to maintain the peace, and preserve the province from rapine. You have committed your life into my hands, and your safety shall be as dear to me as my own." With these words, and a profusion of presents, the king dismissed Asinæus to take charge of his command. He no sooner arrived, than he applied himself most assiduously to the duties of his commission, building forts, repairing and fortifying as he saw occasion, and acquitting himself to such universal satisfaction, that none of his predecessors ever acquired so much power and fame, from so slender a beginning; and this not only among the people of Babylon, but the Parthian governors and commanders, who, holding him in the highest esteem, his authority increased to that degree, that Mesopotamia might be said to be under his direction.

The brothers went on in a most flourishing state for the space of fifteen years, to their own honour, and the approbation of all around them. But when once they deviated from those principles and manners, by which they had obtained both their power and fame, and abandoned the precepts and discipline of their forefathers, to the addicting themselves to sensual pleasures, and foreign innovations, they sunk in their credit, and experienced the punishment of their declension, as will appear from examples in the sequel.

Asinæus becomes enamoured of a Parthian woman.

There came into those provinces a Parthian governor, accompanied by his wife, a woman of exquisite beauty, and most engaging qualities. Anilæus became passionately enamoured with her; and having no other means of compassing his inordinate desire, provoked her husband to single combat, killed him in the first encounter, and took the woman to his bed.

This adventure was the source of all the terrible calamities that befel them afterwards. The woman, whether at home or abroad, had constantly with her images of Barbarian gods. She was now a widow and in custody; and having privately concealed some of these idols, she took an opportunity of worshipping them, for a while, by stealth: but, upon Anilæus taking her to himself, and owning her publicly for his wife, she worshipped them in her accustomed manner, and with the same appointed ceremonies as she had done in the days of her former husband. The most esteemed friends of the two brothers were highly offended at this licentious practice, in open violation of the religion, rites, and laws of the Jews. But neither the good counsel, or reproof of friends, had any effect in reclaiming him: on the contrary, he was so infatuated by his attachment to the idolatress, and so incensed at the liberty his advisers had taken, that he stabbed one of them upon the spot, for discharging his conscience, in telling him plain truths. In his expiring moments, he imprecated vengeance upon this murderer Anilæus, Asinæus, and their companions also: upon the two first, as the examples and abettors of this violation of religion and friendship; and upon the rest, as they were accessory to the massacre of the patron of their laws and liberties, whom they ought to have defended.

Though these companions were greatly affected by the death of their associate, the past kindnesses of the brothers, and the sense they retained of their obligations to them for their advancement, induced them to avoid any interference in the matter. But at length the flagrant and bare-faced profession of idolatry became intolerable, inasmuch, that the people thronged, in tumultuous crowds, to Asinæus, with complaints against his brother, representing to him the absolute necessity of adopting proper measures, in due time, to prevent further mischief, as the commotion would become universal. They added, that the marriage with this woman was a violation of their ancient laws, and her idolatrous practices a reproach to the worship of the true God. Asinæus acknowledged that he was fully convinced of the dangerous tendency both to himself and people, of his brother's iniquitous conduct; yet, from the impulse of affection for him, as so near a relation, and an allowance for human frailty in so invincible an attachment, he palliated the matter, without proceeding to an exemplary severity. But being persecuted with daily clamour, more and more, he took upon him to reprove his brother for his past conduct, and to caution him as to his future state, charging him withal to put away the woman, and send her home to her relations. But this had no effect with him; and the woman finding the mutinous disposition of the people increase, and fearing that some mischief might befall Anilæus for her sake, poisoned Asinæus, not doubting of the security of her life, as her husband was to be her judge.

Anilæus now took the government upon himself alone, and made an incursion, with his arms, into the territories of Mithridates, a man of the first rank in Parthia, and husband to the daughter of king Artabanus. He found money, slaves, and cattle there in great abundance; besides other rich booty, that he carried away, to an immense value. Mithridates was not far off at that time; and hearing of this incursion and rapine, without any kind of provocation, collected a body of his choicest troops, and marched at the head of them to give Anilæus battle. The next day being the Jews sabbath, which they observe most religiously as a day of rest, he halted at a village that night, with an intent of falling upon them by surprize the ensuing morning. A Syrian, who lived in the neighbourhood, gave Anilæus intelligence of the design, and particularly where Mithridates was to be that night at an entertainment.

Anilæus upon this advice ordered his men refreshment; and they marched, by night, to anticipate the design, and take them by surprize. He succeeded to his utmost wish; for, about the fourth watch, he fell into their quarters, and took some asleep, whilst others, in consternation, were put to flight in the dark. Mithridates was taken prisoner, and mounted naked upon an ass, which, amongst the Parthians, is deemed the highest indignity. When they had carried ried him into a wood, several of the friends of Anilæus were for putting him instantly to death; but he warmly opposed it, and urged as his reason, "That, as Mithridates was one of the greatest men in Parthia, and allied to the royal family, if they spared his life, it would ultimately redound to their advantage, as the obligation would never be forgotten; besides, it would preserve an interest that, in case of the worst, might procure an accommodation. That, on the other hand, if they proceeded to extremities with Mithridates, they might be assured the king would never rest till he had avenged his blood upon all the Jews in Babylon: and lastly, that, for these obvious causes, as the chance of war is uncertain, it would be prudent, in case of any disaster, to make sure of a retreat."

He is discharged.

He renews the war.

Makes depredations in Babylonia.

The whole multitude unanimously accorded with Anilæus, so that Mithridates was set at liberty by common consent. But his wife, upon his return, finding out the terms of his release, reproached him, for neglecting, as son-in-law to the king, to avenge himself on those that injured him, and suffering himself to hold a life owing to their mercy. She then enjoined him to go back, and redeem his honour, vowing, upon failure, to dissolve the marriage. Terrified by the taunts of this woman, and dreading a repetition of them, he put himself, though reluctantly, at the head of an army; but with this conviction, that the Parthian did not deserve to live who would submit to a Jew. As soon as Anilæus had intelligence that Mithridates was marching towards him, he made it a point of honour not to take advantage of the fastnesses he was possessed of, but to put the dispute to the issue of a battle in the open plain; so that he advanced to meet him at the head of a body of men flushed with former conquests; and, over and above the veteran troops, they were joined by several reinforcements, that fell in with them for the booty. In the utmost confidence of victory, therefore, they marched four score furlongs into a dry, sandy country; and when they were spent with the drought of the place, the fatigue of the march, and the heat of the day, Mithridates fell in upon them with fresh men, put them to a total rout, and cut off several thousands in the pursuit. Anilæus, with those that escaped, made to a forest in the greatest consternation; leaving Mithridates in the happy possession of an absolute victory.

There came over to Anilæus, after this defeat, such multitudes of loose desperadoes, that his army was not long recruiting to its former number; but they were raw, undisciplined men, and by no means comparable to those that fell in the late action. With these recruits, however, he marched into the territories of the Babylonians, and laid all waste. Upon this the Babylonians sent to the Jews at Nearda, to deliver up Anilæus to justice: but this could not be obtained, for it was not in their power so to do. The next proposal from them was to invite him to a treaty, in order to accommodate matters upon terms. To this they agreed; and sent commissioners on both sides, Jews as well as Babylonians, to conduct the treaty. But the Babylonians strictly observing the spot where Anilæus and his men lay, surprized them in the dead of the night, and finding them intoxicated and drowsy, slew all before them without opposition, and Anilæus himself was slain amongst the rest.

Anilæus and his party go to the sword.

The Babylonians and Jews were perpetually at variance, by reason of their contrariety of laws and customs, and waged war with each other with different success. But the Babylonians, who were kept in awe during the life of Anilæus, took opportunity, on his demise, to renew their depredations on the Jews, inasmuch, that they compelled them to quit their habitations, and withdraw themselves to Seleucia, the capital of that province, and so called from Seleucus Nicanor, the founder of it, being a place of liberty, where Macedonians, Greeks, and Syrians lived promiscuously together. The Jews lived quietly here during the space of five years; but the plague breaking out in Babylon in the sixth, the inhabitants were forced to withdraw more and more to Seleucia, which proved the occasion of the greatest calamities.

The Jews are forced into Seleucia.

The Greeks and Syrians in this city were at perpetual discord; but, in their contentions, the Greeks ever had the advantage; till, upon the coming in of the Jews, being a bold and warlike people, with their assistance the Syrians prevailed. The Greeks finding their power decline, and their situation desperate, unless they could disunite the Syrians and Jews, tampered with their particular friends amongst the former, to interest themselves in bringing about an accommodation. The proposal was well received, and the consideration of it referred to some leading men on both sides, to advise upon the expedient. These interposed, and put an end to the contention upon this condition, that the Greeks and Syrians should join in a league offensive and defensive against the Jews. Pursuant to this agreement, they fell upon the Jews by surprize, and slew upwards of fifty thousand; not an individual escaping, unless protected by some neighbour or friend. The miserable remainder retired to Chesiphon, near Seleucia, where the king of Parthia generally resides in the winter. In this place they took up their abode, not doubting of their security in the verge of the place: but they soon had cause to entertain such apprehensions from both Babylonians and Seleucians, that the greater part betook themselves to Nearda and Nilibis, depending on the strength of those cities, and the martial disposition of the inhabitants. This was the then state of the Jews in Babylon.

THE virulent outrages and barbarous cruelties of Caius, called, by the Romans, Caligula, were not confined to Jerusalem alone, and the neighbouring provinces, but extended over sea and land throughout the whole Roman empire, and that to a degree unheard of before. Nor did any place feel the effects of his savage brutalities more sensibly than the city of Rome itself, whose senators, patricians, and nobility in general, were treated with all manner of indignities, such as contumely, banishment, confiscation, and murder. He had the vanity and presumption to arrogate to himself the majesty, appellation, and honours of a god, and to salute Jupiter in the capitol itself, which is the most celebrated of all the temples in Rome, with respect to its dedication, by the name of brother, together with other actions equally frantic. Having a design to pass from Puteoli, a city of Campania, to Misenum, a sea-port on the other side of the water, and deeming it a derogation to his dignity to cross it in a galley, he laid a bridge over it, from one promontory to the other, and so passed and repassed in his chariot, triumphing that he had subjected the sea as well as the land, as became the power and dignity of a god.

There was not so much as one temple throughout Greece, which he did not rifle of all the curious paintings, sculpture, ornaments, and donations in general; giving orders for the transportation of the spoil to his palaces, gardens, and retirements of pleasure; and observing that the most glorious city in the universe was the most proper cabinet for the deposit of the choicest rarities which the universe afforded. He had the confidence to send to Memmius Regulus for the statue of Jupiter Olympius, that admirable piece of Phidias, the famous Athenian statuary, and so called from the place in Greece where it is so highly honoured, in order to have it brought to Rome. But in this instance he did not compass his end; for the architects told Regulus, to whom the care of it was committed, that the workmanship would be defaced by the removal. It is reported, that while Memmius had it under consideration, he was alarmed by a prodigy, which caused him to delay it, as he gave Caius to understand in a letter, by way of excuse; but that apology would have cost him his life, if the death of the emperor had not prevented it. His frantic pride came to such a pitch, that, upon the birth of a daughter, he had the child carried into the capitol, and placed upon the knee of the statue of Jupiter, as if there had been an alliance between Caius and the supreme of the gods.

As he prophaned the religion, so he violated the laws of his country, not only in permitting, but encouraging slaves to accuse their masters, and signifying his pleasure at their so doing. As an instance, Claudius was charged by his bond-man, Pollux; and

Secret plots

Caius.

Josephus appears an excellent moralist.

By this licence, which he gave to calumniators, sycophants, and informers, in the advancement of slaves above their patrons, he provoked the same practices against himself that he had countenanced against others. Plots were laid for him on all hands: some in revenge for injuries received, and some by way of precaution to avert mischiefs apprehended. Justice and law were dormant; corruption and power bore universal sway; and so critical was the situation of affairs, that either Caius must have sunk, or the commonwealth been annihilated. The Jews, in particular, by the seasonable exit of this tyrant, were rescued from impending destruction. It may tend equally to instruction and entertainment, to be very minute and particular in this part of our history; as the concurrence of so many providences in the disposal of events, must serve as a lesson to good men, not to despair, in the greatest extremity, of the infinite power and mercy of the Almighty; and also as a caution to the great men of the earth, how they build their hopes on sandy foundations, or set their affections on transitory enjoyments, which, in the end, lead to disappointment and misery.

Three conspiracies against Caius
by Emilius Regulus,
by Annius Minucianus and by Cas-sius Chæ-reas.

There were three several conspiracies laid against Caius, and each of them conducted by a person of eminence. Emilius Regulus, a Spaniard of Corduba, conducted one party, and had a troop of resolute to assist in the enterprize: Cassius Chæreas, the tribune, had another detachment; and Annius Minucianus a third. These were all determined on the destruction of this tyrant, as they deemed him a monster of abomination. Minucianus was inimical to him partly in revenge for the death of Lepidus, his singular friend, a citizen of unsullied honour, whom Caius most barbarously put to death, and partly through apprehension of the tyrant's design upon his own life. Regulus detested him from a natural aversion to iniquity, being himself a man of genuine probity. Chæreas was piqued at the reproaches he had received from Caius, with effeminacy and cowardice, and alarmed for the imminent danger under which he laid in the service of so outrageous a master.

Different as the causes might be, they all agreed in this one common end, of delivering their country, and the world, from the outrages of so inhuman a tyrant; esteeming the success of their design the salvation of the public, and persuaded it was the duty of a patriot to lay down his life for his country. But Chæreas was more zealous than the rest; partly through ambition of acquiring a name, and partly through the advantage he had above others, (being tribune,) of executing his design from freedom of access to the person of his master.

Caius
causes many to be slain in the circus.

It was the season of the Circensian Games, an entertainment with which the people of Rome were highly delighted. It had formerly been the custom for the multitude to crowd into the palace, and petition the emperor for what they required; and as they rarely met with a denial, their request, on the present occasion, was, an abatement of their tributes and taxes. Caius was so enraged at their petition and their clamour, that he ordered his guards immediately to seize those that made the outcry, and put them to death; in consequence of which numbers were slain on the spot. The people then ceased their importunities, taking warning by the fate of those who had suffered.

These horrid barbarities excited Chæreas to hasten the attempt, who had it in contemplation to dispatch the tyrant as he sat at table. He deferred it, however, from time to time, not from any change of mind, but to wait an opportunity of giving a decisive stroke. He had commanded the guards a long time, and being now in commission for collecting the revenues, he incurred the displeasure of Cæsar for not proceeding with rigour against those that were in arrears, (poor and insolent as they might be,) inasmuch that he upbraided him with cowardice in not enforcing the payment, and cast a number of reflections on him; which no man of spirit and honour could possibly bear without resentment. To engage him the more, Chæreas never brought the word from Cæsar to the rest of the officers, but it suggested some idea that excited either their laughter or contempt: indeed he was rendered the very butt of their derision.

conspiracy.

This was so unpardonable a provocation, and so compulsive an incitement to revenge; that, to forward the design, he communicated it to some confidential friends, and among the rest to Popedius, a man of senatorial dignity, but in principle an epicurean. Popedius had been accused by Timidius, a professed enemy, of uttering reproachful expressions against Caius; and the charge was founded on the pretended testimony of Quintilia, a very beautiful woman, who belonged to the theatre. Quintilia being generally beloved, had the good fortune to stand in the favour of Popedius among the rest. The accusation being groundless, and Quintilia refusing to take away the life of a man by a false evidence, Timidius called for her being put to the torture, and Caius commanded Chæreas to see it executed, as if he reserved those offices of cruelty for him whom he had so frequently upbraided with effeminacy. As they were conducting Quintilia to the rack, she trod upon the foot of the associate, giving him thereby to understand that he was safe, for she would not confess any thing. It was much against the inclination of Chæreas to execute that office, but he was compelled to torment her with the greatest severity. Not being able, however, to extort confession, he conducted her into the presence of Caius, miserably torn and disfigured, even to such a degree that the emperor himself took compassion on her, and discharged Popedius, presenting the woman with a considerable sum of money, as a small compensation for the excruciating pains she had undergone with manly fortitude.

The tenderness of the emperor aggravated the concern of Chæreas, when he reflected on the disgrace brought upon him, in being the appointed instrument of so merciless a cruelty as even Caius himself relented at. Thus enraged, he disclosed his design to Clemens and Papinius; the former of whom was an officer in the army, and the latter a tribune as well as himself. He represented to Clemens, "that neither of them had been wanting in their duty to the emperor; that it had been their care and business to discover and defeat several conspirators against him, some of whom they had put to death, and others to torture, till they had even excited his pity, which proved they were commissions fit for savages, not for soldiers and men of honour."

Clemens made no reply, but indicated, by his countenance, the aversion he had to be employed in so infamous a work, though he durst not utter a word against the majesty of Cæsar. Chæreas, however, having disclosed the matter, thus continued his discourse: "I need not recount the calamities either of the city or empire; they are too notorious to be concealed; and Caius is the reputed author of them. But if I speak truth, I must confess myself the effectual cause; nay, I must include both you, Papinius, and Clemens: we are the men who have brought this ruin upon Rome, and upon mankind, in executing the orders of others. When we might put an end to these outrages daily committed on the citizens and subjects in general, we prostitute ourselves to the vilest offices: we assert the cause not of the Roman empire, not of glorious freedom, but of those who enslave both our bodies and minds. In fine, what do we but execute the commission of an inhuman tyrant, in perpetrating horrid murders, and inflicting execrable tortures upon others, till the same offices shall be executed upon us. The tyrant is so accustomed to the effusion of human blood, that he never consults the reason of things, but acts according to his humour and caprice. We seem all destined to destruction, one after another; and our turn will probably be the next, if we do not, in time, provide for the security both of our own lives and the common liberty."

Clemens

Clemens, though he could not but approve the opinion and resolution of Chæreas, charged him yet to secrecy; as the least intimation of the design, before it came to execution, would prove fatal to every one concerned. He observed, that "time would bring forth opportunity; that his age would not permit him to make any attempt; though, perhaps, he might suggest safer means than those prescribed by Chæreas." Clemens having spoken thus briefly, departed, revolving in his mind both what he had heard and said.

The coldness of Clemens raised in the mind of Chæreas a suspicion of the sincerity of his attachment to the cause: he therefore immediately repaired to Sabinus, another of the tribunes, whom he knew to be a man of honour, an asserter of the liberty of his country, and totally averse to the present system of government. He neither doubted his integrity or judgment, and determined to consult him upon the whole affair. When he found that Sabinus coincided in opinion with him as to the main point, only that he had kept the secret to himself, he observed that there was no need of deliberating with a man who had already formed his resolution; inasmuch that Sabinus promised him both his good faith and assistance, which confirmed Chæreas the more in his purpose.

As they were both for bringing the matter to a speedy issue, they applied to Minucianus, a man of a similar disposition, and equally zealous in the cause of liberty. Caius had a jealousy of Minucianus, on account of the murder of Lepidus, his most intimate friend, besides the aversion he had to him as a man of rank and honour, a character that ever incurred his hatred. They were perfectly acquainted with each others mind from some hints they dropped respecting the mode of government, though they had not been absolutely explicit: however, they seemed to be actuated by the same common instinct in the same common cause.

Such was the respect that Chæreas and Sabinus had for the virtue and dignity of Minucianus, that as they formerly paid him all deference upon other occasions, so they desired to have his opinion upon the present business. Minucianus then enquired of Chæreas, what was the word the emperor had given him that day? for the insults which Caius had offered him in his office were notorious throughout the city. Chæreas took the hint, and relying on the honour of Minucianus, replied, "Whatever the emperor's word was, let your's be LIBERTY; and I return you a thousand thanks for encouraging me to attempt what I had long resolved. I rejoice to find that we coincide in opinion. My single sword will serve us both: do you lead the way, and be assured, that whatever you command shall be obeyed. To a mind resolved, to a brave soul, arms are never wanting: it is not the weapon, but the will, that does the execution. Time is lost till we are in action; and as to the event, whether I stand or fall, I am little solicitous. My own personal safety or fortune are no objects, when the laws of my country, and the laws and liberties of so many worthy men, are in danger of being swallowed up by this merciless tyrant. I hope you will not envy Chæreas the honour of a part at least, if not of striking the blow, in an exploit that must merit universal approbation." Upon this generous declaration, Minucianus embraced him, wishing him success in the undertaking; and, after an interchange of mutual assurances, they parted. It was rumoured that, to confirm the conspirators in their design, there was a voice heard among the people, calling out to Chæreas, as he entered the palace, to go on and prosper in his undertaking. He, at first, suspected that he was betrayed; but afterwards found it to be either an animating hint from some of the accomplices, or a declaration from heaven in favour of his design.

There was at this time assembled a number of persons, of all ranks and degrees, that were well affected towards the purpose, as senators, knights, soldiers, and commonalty: for it was universally agreed that either Caius or the commonwealth must fall; so that a competition prevailed who should do most, either by word or deed, towards the saving of his country, or, which was one and the same thing, towards the destruction of Caius: nay, Callistus himself, the emperor's freeman and favourite, made one of the party. This man had vast influence with Caius, which he perverted to such a degree, that he was equally hated and dreaded: indeed, he behaved himself more like a partner in the government than a subject. He had amassed great wealth by corruption; notwithstanding which, he could not think himself safe under a prince of so fickle and implacable a disposition. He was in danger from many causes, but more especially for his wealth, which, in those days, was a temptation hardly to be resisted. Callistus finding the situation of Caius very precarious, thought he could not do better than secure the friendship of the next successor; and, with that view, to ingratiate himself with Claudius, he went over privately to that interest, telling him in confidence, that Caius had frequently put him on to poison him, but that he had ever found out some device to evade it. This rather appears to me an invention of Callistus to obtain the favour of his new patron, than a matter of fact; for if Caius had been disposed to murder his uncle, it could not have been in the power of Callistus to evade it; nor could he have eluded himself, if he had been remiss in the execution of the emperor's commands. Claudius, however, looked upon him as the instrument of Providence for his deliverance; so that the insinuation subserved his purpose.

In the mean time, through the deliberation of the confederacy, the main design was put off from day to day, though much against the will of Chæreas, who was ever of opinion, that no opportunity should be lost for the execution of so necessary a purpose. Nay, he did not hesitate to declare, that he could not have wished for a better time or place, than the capitol itself, when Caius went up to sacrifice for his daughter; or when he stood on the battlements of his palace, scattering his donations amongst the people; or upon any solemnity at his own private ceremonies: for Caius seemed careless, and free from suspicion of danger; though most of his attendants were traitors in their hearts. Chæreas was at length so impatient of these delays, that he reproached the confederates with want of activity and resolution; and declared that, if they persisted in making obstacles, he would undertake to dispatch the business himself, and be answerable for doing it, even without a weapon. His associates commended his zeal for the common cause; but they were yet for deferring the design till the celebration of the games instituted in honour of Augustus, who first took the sovereign power from the people into his own hands.

There was a theatre erected before the palace for the Roman nobility, with their families, in the presence of the emperor himself. As, upon this occasion, thousands of spectators crowded into so narrow a compass, it was concluded, that the design might be executed with the greatest ease, because the guards could not come up in time to a rescue; whereas, upon an attempt at a venture, there would be danger of miscarriage, and a tumult in the city, which, through searchers and soldiers, might expose the party to detection, and frustrate the whole contrivance.

Chæreas having given his consent, a resolution was formed to do the deed on the first day of the exhibition of the public shews: but fate seems to have over-ruled in the case, and put it off to the third and last day. Indeed it would have been further delayed, if Chæreas had not called his associates together, and animated them with a speech to this effect: "We are here assembled in a righteous cause, and upon a just and honourable design, but, to our shame be it spoken, through sloth and cowardice, without advancing one step in the business. Not only has much time been lost, but our lives, liberties, and fortunes, are in imminent danger, while Caius rides triumphant. What is the consequence of this pusillanimity, but loss of liberty, and increase of tyranny? Whereas we should "attend

"attend to our own security in the first place, the welfare of the public in the next, and, in fine, acquire for ourselves immortal glory."

Having thus spoken, he gave them some time to deliberate; but finding they stood mute, he rejoined, "My brave comrades, wherefore these delays? Do you not know that the games are upon the point of breaking up, and that Caius is going for Alexandria, to take the tour of Egypt? Would it redound to our honour to part with this scandal to humanity out of our hands, as if we had sent him to proclaim to the world the servility of the Romans, and to afford occasion for some free-spirited Egyptian to do that justice to mankind, upon this bloody thirsty tyrant, which we were afraid to do ourselves? Away then, my friends, with deliberation: I will assist the man, and put the point to immediate issue; nor will I suffer mortal to contend with me for the glory of so noble an action."

A final resolution formed.

This zealous address fired the conspirators with resolution; and Chæreas put on his equestrian sword, and went to the palace as the tribunes usually did; it being his turn that day in course, as commanding officer of the guard, to go to the emperor for the word. The people were pressing in great multitudes towards the palace, crowding to get places; and Caius himself seemed not a little pleased with this scene of confusion: for there were no seats set apart for senators, knights, or other degrees of people, according to their quality, but men, women, masters, and slaves, were all promiscuously huddled together.

Description of the theatre.

This solemnity being dedicated to the honour of Augustus, Caius advanced, and offered up sacrifice to the imperial patron. It so happened that, upon the fate of the victim, some of the blood flowing out, fell upon the robe of Asprenas, one of the senators. Caius sported at the omen; but it proved fatal to the senator, for he was slain at the same time with Caius. It was much noticed, that Caius was in better humour this day than usual. When the sacrifice was over, he went with his friends to the theatre, which was only a frame of wood-work, so constructed as to be taken to pieces and put together again, as it was annually upon this occasion. It had two gates, one towards the open court, and the other over against the passage, for the actors to enter without incommoding the audience; and near at hand was an orchestra for the musicians.

When the multitude had taken their places, and Chæreas, with the other tribunes, were seated near Cæsar, upon the right wing of the theatre, Bathynius, a senator and military man, in a whisper, asked Cluvitus, a person of consular dignity, who sat next to him, if he had heard any news? Upon the reply of Cluvitus in the negative, the other informed him that the tragedy of the death of the tyrant was to be performed that day. Cluvitus, in a quotation of a verse out of Homer's Iliad, cautioned him to beware that none of the Grecians overheard him. The vulgar then proceeded to their usual clamour and outrage, with which Cæsar seemed highly delighted. Two circumstances then followed that had an ominous appearance. One was the representation of a corrupt judge brought to public justice: the other was the tragedy of Cinyra, wherein she and her daughter were slain with great fictitious effusion of blood. It is said that this was the anniversary of the day upon which Philip, the son of Amyntas, king of Macedonia, was killed by his friend Paulanius, upon entering the theatre.

This being the last day of exhibition, Caius was undetermined whether he should sit it out, or whether he should go first to the bath, then to dinner, and return. Minucianus taking his place near the emperor, and observing him disposed to move, rose from his seat to encourage him in his resolution, lest the present opportunity should be lost: but Caius, taking him gently by the skirt, asked him, with a friendly smile, whither he was going? Upon this Minucianus, with affected reverence to Cæsar, sat down; but, in a short time, from the former apprehension, he rose again; and Caius did not oppose his exit, imagining some necessary business might call him aside. Asprenas, one of the confederates, then persuaded him to go out, bathe, dine as he was used to do, and so return.

Chæreas having by this time placed his associates in their proper stations, and given them their necessary instructions, was impatient of longer delay. He at first resolved to assault him on his seat, though he knew this could not be done without much bloodshed both of the senatorial and equestrian orders, preferring the deliverance of his country to the loss of the lives of a few dignified individuals. As Chæreas was going towards the theatre, word was given in the crowd that Cæsar was up, and returning to his palace. The conspirators called to the multitude to make way for the emperor, as if by his order and direction; but, in reality, to afford them scope for the execution of their design. Claudius, the uncle, went first; then Marcus Minucianus, the husband of his sister, and Valerius Asiaticus, persons whose rank entitled them to precedence. Caius himself, with Paulus Aruntius, followed them. When he entered the palace, he left the ordinary way, which Claudius and the rest had taken before him, and turned off to a bye-path, leading to the paths, to see some boys that were sent him out of Asia for their skill in singing hymns, and in the Pyrric way of dancing. In this passage Chæreas met him, and asked for the word, which being given according to former ridicule and insult, the tribune returned the indignity with a stroke of his sword, but the wound was not mortal. Some were of opinion it was contrived by Chæreas, to render his death more painful by a repetition of strokes; but this to me seems improbable, as it was not a business to be protracted. The wound, in short, was between the neck and the shoulder, where it struck upon a bone that prevented its going farther. He made no outcry, nor called to any around him for help, conscious, perhaps, he did not deserve protection. He uttered a groan, however, and made an attempt to escape; but Cornelius Sabinus prevented it by a stroke that brought him on his knees, which being followed by an unanimous outcry of "Down with him, dispatch him," they fell upon him together, and executed their purpose. It is said that Aquila gave him the finishing stroke, but the generality of the people ascribed the glory of the action to Chæreas. Though many concurred in it, he was the original proposer, and most essentially conducive to the execution of it. He formed and united the confederacy, animated and supported his associates, and, when it came to the decisive point, struck the first blow, and, by his personal bravery, laid the pride of this haughty tyrant in the dust. So that this laudable exploit must be attributed to the virtue and resolution of Chæreas. Thus fell the emperor Caius, by many hands, and by many wounds.

The conspirators prepare themselves for the execution of the design.

The manner of the execution.

Chæreas principal author of the death of Caius.

Chæreas and his associates were not a little embarrassed as to the manner of getting off after the accomplishment of their design. They had to contend with the outrage of a wild and seditious multitude, and the fury and revenge of the soldiery for the death of their prince. The avenues were narrow where the fact was committed, and filled with guards then upon duty. Finding it impossible to return the way they came, they struck off to the palace of Germanicus, the father of Caius, whom they had lately slaughtered. These apartments bordered on the palace royal; and the whole pile is as uniform as the efforts of the several emperors, from time to time, could make it. Being now freed from the rabble, they were secure, so long at least as the death of Cæsar could be concealed.

Retirement of his associates to the palace of Germanicus.

The German body guards, known by the name of the Celtic Legion, were the first that got intelligence of it. These were men naturally fierce and choleric, in common with other barbarians, without any degree of reason or reflection. They were enraged at the news of the emperor's death, not so much from personal regard to him, as to their own inte-interest; for he had been bountiful to them, and conciliated their attachment by force of frequent donations. This corps, under the command of Sabinus, (originally a gladiator, and preferred merely on account of his bodily strength,) marched, with drawn swords, from house to house, in quest of the murderers of Caius. The first man they met was Asprenas, whose robe was stained with the blood of the emperor; a most unfortunate token for him, as they immediately cut him to pieces. The next they seized was Norbanus, a man of the first rank, and descended from some of the most eminent commanders. Finding the dignity of his extraction availed nothing with those barbarians, he disarmed the first man that assaulted him; and being a person of extraordinary strength and courage, would not have fallen unrevenged, had he not been oppressed by numbers. The third that fell into the hands of these Germans was Anteius, who was drawn out from curiosity to see the dead body of Caius, as he had banished his father of the same name with himself, and afterwards put him to death. Anteius came to gratify himself with this spectacle; but, as he was endeavouring to avoid the tumult, the Germans found him out, and involved him in the common massacre. This was the fate of these unhappy men.

When the news of Cæsar's death was brought to the theatre, the multitude were astonished, though they could not believe it; for, though it would have given them pleasure, they were fearful of disappointment, and therefore would not entertain an hope precariously founded. There were others who greatly distrusted it, because they were unwilling that so fatal an accident should befall Caius. These, for the most part, were women, children, slaves, and some of the soldiery, who, taking a double advantage of their services, both by pay and oppression, as the ministers of pride and tyranny, assisted in the persecution of good men, and became sharers in the booty. The women, children, and common people were cajoled with spectacles, drolls, prizes, and other amusements, under pretext of making them easy, but, in reality, to gratify the vanity of the oppressor.

Bondmen, who were indulged in the licence of insulting their patrons, under the sanction of Caius, also lamented his death, as they found no difficulty, during his reign, of making good any accusation against them, and were assured of advantage in discovering where their masters money was deposited, since the law entitled the informer to one eighth part of the value of the confiscation.

With respect to persons of condition, to whom the report might appear credible, as either privy to the design, or well-wishers to it, they were so far from appearing to rejoice at it, that they affected absolute ignorance of it. Those, indeed, who were deepest in the conspiracy, disclaimed all knowledge of it; conscious that death, without mercy, would be the result of the slightest suspicion.

The story, in the mean time, was represented in various lights. Some had it that Caius was wounded, and under the care of the faculty. It was by no means prudent for people, under these circumstances, to declare themselves one way or the other; for either the authors of the report were partizans of Caius, and consequently under a suspicion of partiality on that hand, or, if they were enemies, it was dangerous to publish ill news. There started, at the same time, another report, that alarmed the higher class more than all the rest. This was that Cæsar, upon receiving of his wounds, ran into the marketplace, and, without staying to be dressed, all bloody as he was, made his appeal, by way of declamation, to the people. This variety and uncertainty of reports put people in general upon their guard; but they durst not stir for fear of calumny and misconstruction; for the point was not so much what they intended, as the face the judges and informers would put upon it.

In this distracted state of affairs the Germans, sword in hand, beset the theatre; every man giving himself up for lost upon the sight of them, expecting nothing but immediate death. While they stood trembling, with anxious suspense, whether to go or stay, as there was danger both ways, the soldiers breaking in upon them, put the whole theatre into an alarm; and the people, with supplications, deprecations, and protestations, accompanied with tears, groans, and invocations upon all the gods, attested their innocence. This dismal spectacle drew compassion from the obdurate hearts even of the Germans themselves, and put a stop to the further progress of their fury, and caused them, in some measure, to repent of their inhumanity in the massacre of Asprenas, and his companions, and carrying their heads up and down by way of ostentation, till, in the end, they were deposited upon the altar. What could be more afflicting to their friends, considering the dignity of their characters, and the insolent barbarity of their triumph, than this horrid action? Indeed, the greatest enemies that Caius left behind him could not now rejoice at his death, from the danger they were in of sharing his fate.

While things were in this confusion, one Aruncius, a public cryer, a man of property, and of great credit and influence with the people, came to the theatre, dressed in deep mourning like a senator of Rome, and, with all the formalities of sorrow and lamentation, that were customary upon the loss of the nearest relations, made proclamation of the death of Cæsar. Upon this the Germans relented, and the officer commanded the soldiers to put up their swords, so that the uproar entirely ceased. To this the people that were pent up in the theatre solely owed their lives, as did all those in general that might have fallen into the hands of the Germans; for so long as they could have flattered themselves with any hope of the emperor's being alive, they would have proceeded in their outrage. They had so great an affection for Caius, that they would have redeemed his life even with the loss of their own, and without any regard to the distracted state of the commonwealth. But now, upon the certainty of the event, the desire of revenge ceased of itself, as there could be no longer any occasion for conferring obligations on one side, or returning acknowledgements on the other. Besides, they had apprehension from the power of the senate, if the democratical form of government should be revived. Thus was the rage of the Celtic legion appeased.

Chæreas, in the mean time, being very anxious lest Minucianus should fall into the hands of the Germans, enquired of as many of the soldiers as he could trust, one by one, if they could give any account of him, recommending him, with earnest intreaties, to their especial care and protection. By this means he had an interview with Clemens and Minucianus; the latter of whom told him, that he could not but infinitely honour him for so noble a resolution; and that he would take upon himself to return him thanks in the name of the commonwealth, for so public a service, as well for his conduct in the undertaking, as his courage in the execution of it. This, he observed, might serve to shew the fate of tyranny, which seldom fails, after the short-lived pleasure of lawless usurpation, to terminate in an untimely death, or such a conclusion as exposes the oppressor to an universal odium. This was the case of Cæsar, who laid the foundation of this conspiracy by a violation of the laws of his country, and acts of intolerable insolence and injustice towards the very best of his subjects, who, upon these provocations, became his enemies, and then the instruments of his destruction: but it must be allowed, on all hands, that he was the author and first moving cause of his own ruin. The guards being now withdrawn, the people in the theatre were all rising to shift for themselves. The occasion of it was this. Arcyon, a physician, was called away to attend some wounded men, and dispatched several about him, under pretence of going for remedies, but, in truth, to secure them from danger.

The senate, in the mean time, met in the palace, where the multitude pressed in upon them in throngs, to demand justice for the murder of the emperor; but the senate, from prudential motives, held fair with them in appearance. While the rabble were in quest of the assassins, Valerius Asiaticus, a man a man of consular dignity, in the midst of these clamorous outcries, to know what was become of the murderers of Caius, exclaimed, "Would I had been the man," and so departed.

The senate then proceeded to a decree in condemnation of Caius; and passed an order for both people and soldiers to depart quietly to their own habitations and quarters, with promises of certain exemptions and privileges to the one, and of rewards and gratuities to the other, if they demeaned themselves peaceably as they ought to do. By this means there was a seasonable step put to the uproar, which otherwise might have broken out into fresh tumults, sacrilegious violences, rapine, and all manner of confusion. The whole bench of senators being now met, and those especially that were of the plot, began to deliberate on assuming the power themselves, and re-establishing the democratic form of government.

Division of the senators and soldiers in the form of government.

WHILE the senate were debating on one hand, the soldiers were deliberating in a council of war on the other, upon the grand point in dispute, whether a popular or imperial government should now take place. The latter came at length to these resolutions: that a democracy was incapable of conducting the weighty affairs of state: that, if it should be set up, it would not redound to their interest: that if any of those, already in administration, should obtain the supreme power, it would tend to their disadvantage, unless they afforded him their countenance and protection: and that, therefore, in the present unsettled condition of things, it would be most expedient to chuse Claudius emperor, being the uncle of the deceased, and much superior, as to birth, qualities, and education, to any of those who were assembled in senate; not doubting but he would reward those according to their deserts, who had promoted his advancement. This being the sense of the whole council, Claudius was immediately brought from his house by the soldiers, and declared emperor. The news of this event being carried to the senate-house, Anæus Sentius Saturninus, finding matters come to a crisis, rose, and delivered his sentiments, upon the important occasion, in terms worthy of an orator and a patriot. This was the tenor of his speech:

Oration of Saturninus in favour of a popular government

"Who would have thought, my noble countrymen and fellow-citizens, after so long an interruption of our natural freedom, that we should ever have lived to draw one breath of liberty after it! and yet, through the goodness of the Divine Providence, in whose power it is to give, or to take, we are at this very day and hour, freemen, in some degree, once again. How long it will last we know not:

"But let the event be what it will,

"A comfort short is yet a comfort still.

"Shall we account it as nothing for a freeman to live free in a free country, and to have some relish of the sweets of our ancient liberties in the flourishing condition of our once free commonwealth, even though we were to enjoy the satisfaction of it but for one single hour? I can say little, it is true, to the liberty of former times, before I came into the world; but I have a great desire, I must confess, for the preserving and improving of that liberty which we enjoy at present.

"I cannot but esteem those men to have been exceedingly happy, whose lot it was to fall in an age that asserted the common liberty of mankind, and the study of virtue. But the persons of all others, that, in my opinion, deserve most to be honoured, next to the immortal gods themselves, are those heroic spirits that have had the courage to give us yet some taste of it, how late soever, even in this abandoned state of the world; a blessing which I fervently wish may be perpetuated. As to what concerns ourselves, one day's experience is abundantly sufficient for our comfort and instruction, both young and old. Those that are in years will leave the world with less regret, when they shall better understand the advantages that attend liberty; and for those that are growing up, the very example will inflame them with a virtuous emulation of treading in the steps of their famous ancestors. Virtue, in short, is the main business of human life, and so it ought to be; for, in truth, virtue is liberty itself; that is to say, the liberty of the mind, whatever becomes of the body. Now I do not take upon me all this while to speak of things before my time, any further than upon the grounds of tradition; but when I come to the subject of tyranny, and the calamitous consequences that attend it, I shall say no more upon that topic than I can make good from what I have seen and felt, and upon the infallible certainty of woeful and miserable experience. It confounds the order of government, and of all civil communities. Great minds, generous dispositions, and glorious actions, are discountenanced and suppressed. It makes men's souls as servile as their bodies, quenches all honourable emulations, and accommodates all rules of law and equity, by fear and flattery, to the arbitrary caprice of ambitious and fantastical princes. If we look back to the usurpation of Julius Cæsar upon the power of the people, and the trampling of their laws, liberties, and government under foot, in the erecting of a tyrannical monarchy upon the ruins of the commonwealth, and all this only to gratify ambition, what a train of miseries has that insatiable affectation of dominion drawn after it, both upon the government and the nation? What has the succession been, but a kind of violent competition, betwixt the predecessor and the successor, who should do most mischief, either in the subverting of the laws, or depopulating of the city, by the suppressing of all men of honour and virtue in it, and by all sorts of persecution, even to the degree of death itself? for they could not be safe but in the hands of wicked instruments, that had abandoned themselves to all sorts of iniquity, without either shame or conscience. There was not one individual in the number of these imperious masters, that had not acted the part of a most barbarous oppressor. But the tyrant Caius, who hath this day received his fate, perhaps has outdone all the rest in the licentious rage of a brutal and an ungovernable fury; sparing neither citizens, friends, or relations, in a defiance, at the same time, both of humanity and justice, and of all the laws both of God and man. It is not enough for tyrants to give themselves up to their vanity, and their pleasures, rapines, adulteries, and extravagant appetites, (for these are only human frailties,) but their satisfaction lies in the diabolical practices of rooting out whole families, and involving children and infants in their father's quarrel. Being conscious, to themselves, of the indignities they multiply upon their subjects, they find no security at last, but in the deaths of those they have wronged, and in the seasonable removal of them out of the way. But since so it is, that we have now shaken off the yoke, and recovered the possession of our primitive freedom, all that we have to do for the preserving of unity among ourselves, and providing for our future safety, is to join in repairing the ruins of our ancient glory, and restoring the commonwealth to its original state of union and integrity. We are now at liberty to propose and to debate, and to like or dislike at pleasure, without any superior power over our heads to con-

“troul, and call us to an account. For what was it that gave birth and growth to the unbounded progress of the late tyranny, but the dull patience of a besotted people, that had not spirit to make head against it? Men that were slaves to their pleasures, and men that otherwise acted and lived like slaves, were the people that, chusing rather to lead a mean inglorious life, than venture an honourable death, cast the city into those insupportable miseries, of which we ourselves have been both ear and eye-witnesses. But let me recommend it to you, in the first place, to do right to Chæreas, in conferring upon him the honours he deserves, for ridding the world, and the commonwealth, of this abominable monster. For it was his counsel, and his hand, by the impulse of a Divine assistance, that wrought our liberty; and it is but reasonable that he that procured us our freedom with the hazard of his life, should receive acknowledgements and rewards from the persons he redeemed, answerable to the nature of the obligation. It is the part and duty of an honest man to be thankful to his benefactor, especially to such a benefactor as this, who has involved us all in one common debt. The action of Brutus and Cassius upon Julius Cæsar was great and glorious; but Chæreas, over and above the emulation of their bravery, hath, in this respect, gone much beyond it. Their exploit was followed with a civil war, that ran through and ravaged the whole Roman empire; but Chæreas cut off the tyranny itself, together with the tyrant, and delivered the whole world at one blow.”

This speech of Saturninus obtained the approbation of the whole body of the senate: but he was so intent upon the point under immediate consideration, that he forgot he had, at that very time, a ring upon his finger, with a head of Caius engraved upon it. Trebellius Maximus observing it, rose up hastily, and took it off his finger; and it was ordered to be broken.

The consuls give the watch-word Liberty.

As night approached, Chæreas went to the consuls for the watch-word, and they gave him LIBERTY. The face of things were so strangely changed on a sudden as appeared almost incredible, this being the first act of authority in which the senate had appeared since the time they were deposed; for the soldiers had their orders from the consuls till the Cæsars took it out of their hands. Chæreas, upon receiving the word, delivered it, of course, to the troops which espoused the cause of the senate; that is, to four companies, which stood well affected to lawful government, and declared themselves against the usurpation. These men went away with their officers, and soon after them the people, rejoicing at the thought of the present change, and hoping that the ancient glory of the commonwealth was about to be restored, while, with shouts and acclamations, they hailed Chæreas as their deliverer.

Chæreas, apprehending it might be dangerous, after the death of Caius, to suffer his wife and daughters to survive him, sent Julius Lupus, one of the tribunes, with a command to kill them; chusing him the rather for that commission, both as the kinsman of Clemens, and as it seemed proper for a man who was so deep in the conspiracy to have his part in the execution. But several of the confederates were of opinion, that it was an unmanly action to commit so barbarous an outrage upon the person of a woman, as she had no concern in the execrable cruelties perpetrated on the flower of the nobility, which was the sole effect of her husband's malignity. Others imputed his horrid deeds to her suggestion, and the administration of a potion that turned his brain, and from thence considered her as the principal cause of the ruin of the state. The latter opinion prevailing, Julius Lupus hastened to the execution of his commission, in order to demonstrate his zealous attachment to the interest of his country.

When he came into the palace, he found Ceconia stretched upon the ground with her daughters by the body of her husband, besmeared with the blood of his wounds, and, in bitterest accents, exclaiming against Caius for not attending to the advice of so affectionate a wife, who had repeatedly told him what would be the consequences of his wild proceedings. These words were taken in a different sense, esteemed equally ambiguous by those that heard them, and are still interpreted according to the various inclinations of various people. Those who took them in a more favourable sense, intimated that she advised him to restrain his outrageous fury, and keep himself within the bounds of moderation; assuring him that, if he persisted in these acts of cruelty and oppression, he would incur the hatred of his people, and draw the blood of his subjects on his own head. Those who put another construction upon them, insinuated, that she pressed him to consult his own security in due time, and rid himself of all suspected persons, since, where the life of a prince was at stake, a just ground of suspicion would have been sufficient to proceed upon. Thus was the matter differently interpreted.

Lupus approaching Ceconia, who was bewailing her forlorn condition in all the bitterness of anguish and distress, she intreated him, with tears and lamentations, to draw near, and behold the horrid spectacle of her mangled husband. But reading his design in his countenance then, and assured of it from his words, after a short ejaculation, she presented her bare throat to the execution, pressing him to dispatch what he had undertaken, and finish the tragedy his companions had begun. She encountered the stroke with wonderful constancy of mind; and her daughters died by the same hand with her; and the tidings were sent to Chæreas as soon as the business was accomplished.

Ceconia dies with great resolution.

This was the end of Caius, after he had reigned four years within four months. He was a man of a savage, malicious disposition, even in a private state; sensual in his appetite, a patron of calumniators and informers, timid in cases of danger, and consequently bloody in his revenge. He enjoined exorbitant power to oppress the innocent, and make way to confiscations and forfeitures by rapine and murder. He was charmed with the servile adulations of the common people; nor would any thing short of temples and altars satisfy his frantic ambition. He was neither restrained by law or virtue; nor would spare the best friend upon the least pique, or a supposed cause for revenge. He was an enemy to all good men; impatient of contradiction; nor would bear reproof even in the case of incest with his own sister. This, indeed, was a vice so abominable, in those days, that it was scarcely credible, and such a scandal as had not so much as been heard of among them for many ages. It does not appear that he ever did, or so much as attempted, one action truly magnificent and royal for the honour of the empire, or the common good of mankind, excepting the harbours and store-houses he built about Rhegium, near Sicily, for the convenience of the ships that brought corn out of Egypt. This design was laudable, though it was not brought to perfection, partly through the inactivity and neglect of his agents, and partly through the instability of his own temper; for his mind was diverted by unprofitable pursuits; and he thought his money better employed upon his own private pleasures, than upon those undertakings that might conduce to the honour or interest in the state. He was an excellent orator, and a great proficient in the Latin and Greek languages; had a wonderful presence of mind, and an admirable faculty in speaking extempore; to which was added a peculiar talent for gaining upon the judgment, as well as affections, of mankind in affairs of the greatest moment. Being trained up in the emulation both of his father Germanicus, and his uncle Tiberius, his predecessor, two persons so illustrious for their literary accomplishments, he seems to have made it a point of honour not to degenerate from the dignity either of his birth or education. But what avails a virtuous education, unless its influence is diffused throughout life? What a train of ill consequences ensue when it is perverted to ignoble purposes! How hard a task it is for men possessed of power, and, in some degree, above law, to act virtuously tuously for virtue's sake! At his first entrance on the government, he made an excellent choice of men of integrity and abilities for his friends and ministers, by which he gained a deserved reputation with the people. But in a short time he took another bias, turned them off with insolence and scorn, and, by intolerable provocations, forced his subjects to those outrageous extremities of despair and revenge, that afterwards brought on his own destruction.

Claudius retires.

Brief character of Claudius.

Claudius, as before observed, hearing of the death of Caius, and the tumult occasioned by it, betook himself to an obscure retreat; though he had no reason to apprehend danger, unless it might arise from the dignity of his birth. In private life he conducted himself with moderation, and seemed content with his fortune, applying himself to literature, especially the cultivation of the Greek language, and avoiding, as much as possible, scenes of hurry and confusion.

The multitude were now in a state of distraction; the palace thronged with soldiers, hurrying from one part to another in furious consternation; and the common people running from place to place at a venture, without any regard to the order or authority of government; so that the guards, being men of the best credit among the soldiers, in this tumultuous confusion, began to deliberate on the most expedient measures of proceeding. They were not so much troubled at the death of the emperor, who they thought suffered according to his desert, as at the difficulty of settling their own affairs. Indeed, the rage of the Germans against the assassins, rather proceeded from a regard to private interest than good will to the public. These circumstances weighed together, increased the apprehensions of Claudius, especially when he beheld the heads of Asprenas and his companions, that were carried up and down in triumph. Having concealed himself in a dark retreat, Gratus, one of the emperor's guards, espied him in a corner; but not being able to identify his person, advanced towards him (though the other requested him to retire,) and, upon drawing near, finding he knew him, he called aloud to those that followed him, "This is Germanicus; and no man fitter to fill up the vacancy of the empire." Upon these words the soldiers were ready to lay hold of him; and Claudius, for fear they should put him to death for the sake of Caius, earnestly intreated them to spare him, solemnly protesting his innocence of the whole matter. Gratus, upon this, took him by the right hand, assumed a pleasing countenance, and desired him not to entertain the least apprehension for his safety, but rather dispose his mind for receiving the empire, which the gods, he said, had taken from Caius, and now offered to Claudius by the hands of Gratus, for the relief and preservation of mankind, who had been long groaning under the weight of numerous oppressions. He added, "Rise therefore, and take possession of the throne of your ancestors." They then took him up and carried him, as, through the effect of the surprize, between joy and apprehension, he was hardly able to stand.

Claudius discovered by Gratus.

Gratus puts him into possession of the empire.

The soldiers are unanimously for Claudius.

During these transactions between Gratus and Claudius, the guards gathered about the former in great numbers, lamenting the fate of the innocent Claudius, whom they imagined to be carrying to execution, while others were for appealing to the consuls. As the soldiers crowded in more and more, the people, that had no arms, consulted their safety, and departed different ways. This put a stop to the progress of Claudius; for he was not in a condition to walk; and his bearers had withdrawn themselves for fear of sharing his expected fate. The military corps being now possessed of the palace, their numbers increasing, and having none to oppose them, took into consideration, at this juncture, in what manner they should proceed in order to settle the commonwealth. They rejoiced at the presence of Claudius, and were unanimous for advancing him to the empire; partly in honour to his brother Germanicus, whose memory was held in universal esteem, and partly to exclude ambitious pretenders from among the senators, who, having heretofore embroiled the state, would probably do as much mischief if they had it in their power. They looked upon the republican form of government as lost beyond recovery; and therefore, since an emperor was of necessity to be chosen, they inferred the expediency of taking the utmost care that no person should be advanced to that dignity without owing his preferment to them. From this consideration they concluded that they could not do better than make choice of Claudius, and by that means engross the merit of the obligation entirely to themselves. The whole body of the soldiery were so well satisfied with this mode of reasoning, that, upon conferring with one another, they all joined in the same resolution; so that taking up Claudius, they carried him away to the camp, there to finish what they had begun; and he was attended by the whole army as his guards.

They carry him away to the camp.

In the mean time there fell out a misunderstanding between the senate and the populace. The former were for re-establishing the commonwealth in all its ancient glory, and vindicating their authority from tyrannical usurpations. The latter, envious of the power of the senate, desired nothing more than an imperial check upon their pride and avarice, and a secure appeal for themselves to an higher court from republican oppressions: so that the people were overjoyed at the elevation of Claudius; hoping that, under his protection, they might be preserved from civil wars, and the renewal of those horrid scenes that took place during the contest between Pompey and Cæsar.

The senate and populace divided in opinion.

The senate were no sooner informed of the soldiers conducting Claudius to the army, than they dispatched a certain number of chosen men of their own order, with instructions to admonish him "not to attempt to assume the government to himself by violence, but rather content himself in the station of one of the senators, and leave the care of the public to that body who were qualified by the laws to manage by themselves, and, by their direction, all the offices of administration." They then reminded him how tyrannically the people had been treated by former emperors, and particularly by Caius; and also of the danger in which himself stood from the wanton cruelty of that tyrant. They then assured him, that, if he would submit to the senate, and re-adopt his former principles, he should be crowned with honour by a free and powerful people, and gain the reputation of a wise and good man, by contenting himself to take his lot in the course of things in this world, whether it be higher or lower, as Providence should appoint: but that, if he was determined to follow the example of the late emperor, they must certainly oppose him in his design, as they wanted neither soldiers or arms, nor any other necessities for such an undertaking; and that, after all, their dependence was upon the justice and power of the gods in favour of so righteous a cause as the defence of their country.

The senate send an embassy to Claudius.

When the deputies, Veranius and Brouchus, who were both tribunes of the people, had acquitted themselves of their commission to Claudius in words to this effect, they cast themselves at his feet, with the most earnest supplications to avoid any proceeding that had a tendency to bring the people into a civil war. But finding him beset with the soldiers, and that the power of the consuls was far inferior to that of the army, they briefly added this request; that if he was resolved upon the sovereignty, he would rather accept it from the senate, and take it upon him without violence; as it would be much more auspicious to receive it with the good-will of the people, than to take it from them by force. They concluded with observing, that, if he received the sovereignty from the hands of the senate, it would indicate a disposition to govern with that mildness and serenity that should be the characteristic of royalty: but that, if he refused to accept it from them, it would indicate a design of his wishing to tyrannize over the people, instead of governing them in a manner consistent with the principles of a prudent man, and a good sovereign.

CHAP. III.

Claudius, at the instance of Agrippa, asserts his claim to the imperial dignity. Upon a report afterwards, that Caius was not dead, is disposed to decline all pretensions. Artful proceedings of Agrippa. Claudius puts the soldiers to their oath of allegiance. The soldiers are vociferous to the senate for an emperor. Chæreas a professed enemy to Claudius. Protest of Sabines against Claudius. The populace pay court to him. Chæreas and Lupus put to death: The former dies bravely, the latter ignobly. Claudius pardons Sabines, and he lays violent hands on himself.

CLAUDIUS, being well acquainted with the haughty disposition of the senate, gave their deputies as courteous an answer, for the present, as he could discreetly do, without laying himself at their mercy. But, through the advice and importunity of the soldiery, the instigation of Agrippa, and their promises to stand by him in asserting his pretensions, he was prevailed upon not to decline his claim to the dignity which they had conferred upon him.

Claudius asserts his pretensions to the empire.

When Agrippa had decently disposed of the remains of the late emperor Caius, to whom he owed his crown, and put every thing in as good order as circumstances would admit, he went to his guards, and gave it out that Caius was not dead, but desperately wounded, and that therefore he had sent for assistance to him. Being informed soon after, that Claudius was taken up and carried away by the soldiers, Agrippa immediately pressed after him through the crowd, and, with much difficulty, found him out, involved in the utmost perplexity, and just upon the point of delivering up all to the senate: but Agrippa encouraged him to persist in his resolution of maintaining his right.

Being soon after this invited to take his place in the senate, he attended in most superb attire, and enquired of the bench, what was become of Claudius? They related to him every particular concerning him, and then required his opinion of the present state of things. Agrippa replied, "that there was nothing dear to him, in this world, that he was not ready to sacrifice to the honour of the senate; and yet he could wish that people would rather attend to the substantial good and service of the commonwealth, than the speaking of pleasing things to tickle the ears of the vulgar; as it was most certain, that, without a competent provision of arms, men, and money, for a foundation to proceed upon, it would be fruitless to contend for dominion and power." They replied, "that they had abundance of the articles he mentioned; and that, as to numbers, they had slaves enough to execute their purpose, who would be glad of their freedom for their wages." Agrippa rejoined, with all deference to their sage opinions, "that the partizans of Claudius were veterans in discipline and experience; whereas, on the other hand, their party was composed of a raw and untractable rabble; and therefore he would humbly propose, with their concurrence, to send a deputation to Claudius, to endeavour to prevail with him to relinquish his claim; and that, with their approbation, he would be one to go upon the business."

Agrippa gives the senate his opinion of the present state of things.

Agrippa and others sent as deputies to Claudius from the senate.

His reply.

The senate, coming to a resolution, that the proposal was reasonable, dispatched Agrippa, with some others, upon the commission. But Agrippa, having previously found means of acquainting Claudius of the consternation that prevailed in the senate, and suggesting to him an answer to the deputies becoming the majesty of an imperial prince, Claudius thus addressed them: "I do not wonder to find the senators so averse to the government of a single person, considering what they have suffered under the tyranny of some late princes. For my own part, I propose nothing more to myself than to make my subjects easy and happy in their persons, liberties, and fortunes, and in the impartial "administration of justice. My desire is only, under the name of a prince, to rule with the common advice and consent of my people. For the good faith of my intentions I refer to the proof I have given the senate of my moderation and integrity, even in the worst of times." With this speech he dismissed the deputies; then harangued his soldiers; gave them the oath of allegiance, and five hundred drachmæ a man, as a gratuity; and in proportion to the officers; with promises of the like to the soldiers that were absent.

He gives the soldiers the oath of allegiance.

Upon this the senators summoned a court, who met the next morning early in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. Some, that discerned the impending mischief, absented themselves on various pretences, so that the number of those who attended upon the occasion, did not amount to more than an hundred.

A council of the senate summoned.

While they were in the midst of their debate, a clamour of the soldiers were heard at the door, desiring the senators to appoint some one man to govern them, as many heads they found bred confusion. With respect to the ability of that one man, they submitted it entirely to the senate. This overture embarrassed them much, as, instead of the liberty they promised themselves from Claudius, they now found him to be the person they had most reason to fear; not that there was men wanting among themselves, who, for the honour of their extraction, and their relation to Cæsar, might well pretend to set up for that dignity. For instance, there was Marcus Minucianus, a man of the first rank, and married into the family of the Cæsars, to Julia, the sister of Caius. This person offered himself for one; but the consuls were willing to wave it, and so put it off, as they did one proposal after another. Valerius Asiaticus would have offered himself for another, if Minucianus, one of the conspirators against Caius, had not interposed, and prevented it; observing, that if any man stood up in competition with Claudius, it would be attended with a horrid scene of bloodshed, as his party had at hand whole troops of gladiators, and military men of all sorts, who were ready to exert themselves when occasion required. This diverted several from their intention of standing forth, as they foresaw the mischief that would certainly ensue, both to the public and themselves.

The soldiers require an emperor.

Certain of the senators desire that dignity.

About break of day Chæreas, with his party, came into the senate-house, and having made a signal for silence, desired to be heard. But the soldiers immediately exclaimed, that they demanded the choice of an emperor without further delay, and, by their clamour, prevented him from speaking. The senate now found that all their attempts to settle the government would be ineffectual, as their authority was totally over-ruled by the power of the sword, and the dignity of their rank subjected to the insolence, scorn, and mockery of the vulgar. These considerations put Chæreas out of all patience, inso-much, that he told them, in the conclusion, "If nothing but an emperor would serve their turn, he would give them one, if they would bring him an order from Eutyclus." This Eutyclus was one of the charioteers of Caius, an infamous wretch, that had been subservient to his master's basest purposes. Chæreas followed this taunt with many reproaches, declaring, "that he would rather bring them the head of Claudius, than ever acknowledge him as emperor; as it would be the greatest absurdity, after having had a lunatic to rule them, to make choice of a fool." But all that he could say was of no effect; for the soldiers immediately drew their swords, and marched with flying colours to find out Claudius, and join in the same oath they had taken before.

The soldiers still press for an emperor.

Chæreas reproaches them.

Thus was the senate abandoned by those that should have defended it, and the consuls reduced to the condition of private persons. An universal consternation prevailed amongst the people for having offered so many indignities to Claudius, inso-much, that they reproached one another; and each endeavoured

CHAP. IV.

Liberality of Claudius to Agrippa. Commotions amongst the Jews and Greeks. Edicts of Claudius in behalf of the Jews.

THE first precaution taken by Claudius, after his establishment, was to discharge from the army all those persons whom he suspected, whether in an official or private capacity. He then published an edict, confirming Agrippa in the possession of the kingdom conferred upon him by Caius, as an acknowledgment of his late services. He added, moreover, to his dominions, Judæa and Samaria; over which countries his grandfather Herod had reigned, restoring them to him as the right of his family. But Abela, and the bordering lands upon Mount Libanus, that formerly belonged to Lysanias, were bestowed upon him as an act of bounty out of his own territories. The articles of alliance between king Agrippa, and the people of Rome, were set up in the middle of the forum, as a memorial to posterity. He also took away from Antiochus the kingdom of which he was possessed, but gave him a certain part of Cilicia and Comagena. He set at liberty Alexander Lysimachus, his old friend, and superintendant of the affairs of his mother Antonia, who had been imprisoned by Caius. He gave Bernice, the daughter of Agrippa, in contract to his son Marcus; who dying before the consummation of the marriage, Agrippa married her to his brother Herod, and obtained for him, of Claudius, the kingdom of Chalcis.

About this time there was a tumult between the Jews and the Greeks, in the city of Alexandria. Upon the death of Caius, during whose reign the Jews of Alexandria had been greatly oppressed, they took up arms in vindication of their rights. Claudius immediately sent an order to the governor of Egypt to use his utmost endeavours to suppress the tumult; and, at the request of the kings Agrippa and Herod, sent an edict to Alexandria and Syria, according to the following contents.

“Whereas we are given to understand that the Jews of Alexandria have ever, from time to time, enjoyed the same freedoms and privileges, from former kings of Ægypt, in common with the rest of the inhabitants, as appears by several royal decrees, and instruments of record, at this day extant, in confirmation thereof; and likewise that those rights and benefits have been continued to them ever since the annexing of that city by Augustus to our empire; and so transmitted uncontroverted through Aquila's days, and all the governors of Alexandria successively, that have been sent thither; having liberty granted them also by the same Augustus, upon the death of their ethnarch, to substitute another in his stead; enjoying the free exercise of their religion and discipline, without any molestation or controul:

“Now, for as much as Caius Cæsar, in a blasphemous excess of madness, hath rigorously pressed upon the Jews to worship him as a god, contrary to the good faith and honour of the imperial grant, and in a manifest violence upon their consciences, and breaking into outrages against the refusers, irritated a party of his own faction in Alexandria against the Jews, their fellow-citizens; this is to declare all those proceedings of Caius null and void, and the said privileges of the Jews to remain still in full force and virtue; requiring and commanding, both the one and the other, by this our sovereign authority, to live, as far as possible, in a right understanding together, without troubling the public peace. These are the contents of the edict; and after this, in particular for Alexandria, there was another sent abroad by the same prince, in favour of the Jews all over the empire, in the following terms:

“Tiberius

Sabinus protests against Claudius.

voured to transfer the blame from himself to his neighbour. At this juncture Sabinus, one of the confederates, stood forth, and solemnly protested, that he would sheath his sword in the bosom of every man before him, rather than submit to acknowledge the imperial authority of Claudius, and by that means confess himself a slave. He reproached Chæreas, on having been the principal asserter of the common liberty against Caius, and now abating in his resolution from a dastardly fear of death, as if a brave man could exist without freedom. Chæreas declared his unchangeable resolution not to survive liberty, but that he wished to know in the mean time how Claudius stood affected.

Claudius excited by the people.

During these altercations in the senate, people flocked to the camp, from all quarters, to pay their court to Claudius, and, amongst the rest, one of the consuls, Quintus Pompeius, who had incurred the hatred of the soldiers for encouraging the senate to stand up in defence of their liberties. Upon his advancing, they assaulted him with their drawn swords, and had certainly slain him, had not Claudius taken him into his protection, and placed him by his own side. But the senators, in general, were not only treated with insult, but many of them repulsed by blows as they pressed forward to salute him. Aponius was wounded; and every one of them subject to imminent danger. At the instance, however, of king Agrippa, who represented to him the ignominy that would attend the total extirpation of the nobility, Claudius was prevailed on to treat the senators, as well as persons of condition in general, with courtesy and respect; so that he desired the senate to meet him at the palace, whither he was conducted by a guard of soldiers.

Agrippa recommends moderation to Claudius.

At the same time Chæreas and Sabinus presented themselves in public, expressly against the order of Pollio, whom Claudius a little before had appointed to the command of his guards. Claudius, being now brought into the palace, and surrounded by his partizans, pronounced sentence of death upon Chæreas for disobedience of orders. It was pretended that the sentence did not proceed from any personal pique, but the expediency of making such examples as might tend to the future security of princes. He was led to the place of execution with Lupus, and several other of the conspirators. According to report, Chæreas sustained the parting stroke with amazing constancy, indicating, neither by countenance or action, the smallest degree of fear, or an affection derogatory to the dignity of an exalted mind. Lupus, on the contrary, betrayed every token of pusillanimity: nor could Chæreas avoid passing a contemptuous sarcasm upon the occasion; for Lupus, when stripping, complaining of cold, his intrepid fellow-sufferer remarked, that “Wolves felt no cold,” alluding to the import of his name Lupus, which, in the Roman language, signifies wolf. When the executioner was prepared, he asked him whether he was accustomed to the office, or only a novice? and desired him to use that very weapon with which he slew Caius. He did his duty, and dispatched him at one stroke. But Lupus, through fear, changing the position of his body, was mangled by repeated strokes, before the officer could execute his business. Some few days after, on the festival of the people's expiatory oblations to the ghosts of their departed friends, by casting their offerings into the fire, according to the usual ceremony, they paid the same honour to Chæreas as to the rest, begging forgiveness for their late ingratitude to so singular a patriot. Thus died Chæreas in the glorious cause of liberty. He was a man who possessed magnanimity of soul rarely to be found among elevated characters. His being the instrumental cause of the death of that abominable tyrant Caius, was justly applauded by the people in general, who lamented the death of so distinguished patriot for the cause of liberty and his country.

Contrast between Chæreas and Lupus at the critical moment

Sabinus, though pardoned, falls upon his sword.

Claudius not only pardoned Sabinus, but continued him in his command. The noble Roman, however, made no further use of his clemency, than to rid himself of a loathsome life, by falling upon his own sword.

“ Upon the request of the kings, Agrippa and Herod, our singular good friends, for the same liberty to the Jews all over the empire, in their ways and worship, that we have already granted them in Alexandria, we do heartily comply with them in their desire; not only for the sake of the advocates, but out of a respect also to the merits of the people, in acknowledgement of the friendship and good offices they have ever rendered to the state of Rome. Wherefore we judge it reasonable to have them admitted to a share of the common rights and benefits of all our cities, as well Greek as other, and to enjoy them in as ample a manner as they did in the reign of Augustus of blessed memory: And we do likewise ordain, for the future, that, wherever they shall happen to be dispersed within the dominion of our empire, they shall be allowed to govern themselves by their own laws, without any lett or interruption, provided that they make a modest use of this our grace and favour, without envying other people the free exercise of their opinion, so long as they themselves are allowed to enjoy the liberty of their own.

“ This is what we have thought fit to declare: And it is our will and command that this our proclamation may be duly notified in all our cities, plantations, towns corporate, and all other parts respectively of our dominions, as well within Italy as without; and copies thereof transmitted to all kings, princes, and governors under our jurisdiction; and to stand posted up and exposed for the space of thirty days to the view of all people.”

CHAP. V.

Claudius sends Agrippa to his government. Agrippa deposes Theophilus from the high priesthood, and confers that dignity upon Simon. Complains to Petronius, governor of Syria, of a statue dedicated to Cæsar in the synagogue of the Jews.

CLAUDIUS Cæsar, by these edicts, having made known to the whole world the opinion he entertained of the Jews, sent away Agrippa to take possession of his government, after he had advanced him to a greater dignity than before, and given him letters of special recommendation to the governors and intendants of the provinces through which he was to pass. Having dispatched all previous business, with expedition and accuracy, he hastened to Jerusalem, where he acquitted himself of all his holy vows, and offered sacrifices according to the strictest injunctions of the law. In compensation for the sufferings inflicted upon Agrippa by Tiberius, who had formerly commanded him to be manacled with an iron chain, Caius had presented him with a golden chain of equal weight. This chain Agrippa caused to be suspended within the limits of the temple, over the receptacle of the sacred treasure, as a memorial of the severity of his punishment, and the interposition of Providence in his behalf, as well as a lesson to mankind, that the same Divine Power can exalt those whom it dejects. The chain represented, at one and the same view, a prince made the sport of fortune, and a prisoner in irons, with his deliverance and exaltation to greater dignity than ever; circumstances exactly corresponding with the vicissitudes of human affairs.

When Agrippa had attended to the duties of Divine worship, he deposed Theophilus from the high priesthood, and conferred that dignity on Simon, the son of Boethus, whose surname was Canthara, and whose daughter king Herod had married. Simon, therefore, held the pontificate with his brethren, and with his father, in like manner as the sons of Simon, the son of Onias, which were three, who held it under the Macedonian government, as we have already shewn.

When the king had settled the office of the high-priesthood; he made it his next care to acknowledge the respect and honour he had received from the inhabitants of Jerusalem, by omitting the tax upon houses which they had formerly paid. He also made Silas general of his forces, a man who had shared with him in many of his troubles.

Agrippa's bounty to the citizen of Jerusalem.

Soon after this, a set of rash, daring, and inconsiderate youths, inhabitants of Doris, under colour of religion, had the hardiness to set up a statue to Cæsar in the synagogue of the Jews. This proceeding highly incensed Agrippa, as it evidently tended to the dissolution of the religion and laws of his country. He therefore, without delay, applied in person to Publius Petronius, then governor of Syria, accusing the people of Doris with an offence of the most heinous nature. Petronius resenting the offence as much as Agrippa, as it tended to violate those laws which should regulate the conduct of mankind, expressed his displeasure in a letter to the people of Doris, couched in terms as follow in the next chapter.

An insolent action of the inhabitants of Doris.

CHAP. VI.

Petronius, in a letter, reproves the conduct of the inhabitants of Doris. Upon the removal of Simon from the high-priesthood, it is offered to Jonathan, who refusing it, and recommending his brother Matthias, he is appointed. Marcus succeeds Petronius as governor of Syria.

“ Publius Petronius, governor of Syria, by the appointment of Tiberius Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, to the magistrates of Doris, greeting:

“ WHEREAS I have received certain information, that, notwithstanding a full liberty granted to the Jews, by an edict of Claudius Cæsar Augustus Germanicus, to live according to the rules and prescriptions of their own laws, some of your people have been so audacious as, in contempt of the said imperial edict, to prophane their synagogue, by setting up Cæsar's statue there, to the scandal and affront of their religion; being not only an usurpation upon the freedom Cæsar hath permitted them, and a violence upon their consciences, but an indignity also to the dignity of Cæsar himself: for his image should have been rather set up in his own temple, than in another, especially in the synagogue, since the emperor himself hath found it meet and just to leave every man master within himself. I shall say nothing of my own orders in this affair, after such an affront put upon the authority of my master, who has not only indulged the Jews in the matter of their religion, but granted them all the privileges of freemen likewise, in the cities where they inhabit, in common with the Greeks. Now, since so it is, that this outrage hath most certainly been committed, and the majesty of Cæsar insolently despised, and that you yourselves disown any hand in the thing, and so turn it off to the licence of a riotous rabble, this is to will and require you, that you send by my officer, Vitellius Proculus, some of the guilty persons, to answer before me for what they have done; or at least to tell him who they are; for you yourselves will be otherwise suspected for parties to the fact. In the mean time, have a care of the public peace, and of those seditious spirits that would put all into a flame. But as for my dear master and myself, there is nothing we lay so much to heart, as to keep clear of giving the Jews any occasion or pretext of being troublesome in their own defence. And now for your better satisfaction, what opinion the emperor himself hath of this matter, I send you hereunto annexed, a copy of his edict to the Alexandrians, which my dearest prince Agrippa shewed Claudius to Agrippa, to his king, &c.

Agrippa's letter upon Jerusalem.

"shewed me (though every body knew it already)
 "as I was sitting upon the tribunal, positively re"quiring that all Cæsar's concessions to the Jews
 "should be made good. Wherefore I do now "charge and require it of you, for the future, to "forbear all manner of seditious controversies, and "leave them to worship their God quietly in their "own way."

Petronius, by these means, removed the grievance complained of by the Jews, and rendered the Greeks cautious of attempting the like infringements for the future.

On the removal of Simon from the pontificate, it is offered to Jonathan, and, at his recommendation, transferred to Matthias.

Soon after this king Agrippa removed Simon from the high-priesthood, with an intent to transfer it to Jonathan, the son of Ananus, as a person more deserving of that dignity. But he declined it, with due acknowledgment of the favour designed him; observing, "that, since God had been pleased to judge him unworthy of holding it, he should content himself with the honour of having once worn the sacred habit belonging to it, as he could better justify his entrance upon that holy function at first, than he could now in re-assuming it; begging permission to recommend a brother, a man uncorrupt in his morals, inoffensive before God and man, and consequently better qualified for the important office." The king was so pleased with the candour and modesty of Jonathan, that, with his advice, he transferred the pontificate to his brother Matthias. Much about the same time Petronius was dismissed from the government of Syria, and Marcus appointed to succeed him.

CHAP. VII.

The ambition of Silas is punished by Agrippa, who, at the command of Claudius, desists from repairing the walls of Jerusalem. Instances of the liberality and magnificence of Agrippa. The pontificate taken from Matthias, and transferred to Elionæus. Games and spectacles instituted at Cesarea in honour of Claudius Cæsar. Vanity of Agrippa, and adulation of the vulgar. He is reclaimed from his folly by severe judgments, and reproves his flatterers. His death, revenue, and offspring. The inhabitants of Cesarea and Sebaste revile his memory. Claudius proposes his son as successor, but, at the instance of his favourites, confers the government on Gusprius Fadus.

Vanity of Silas.

SILAS, the king's generalissimo, presuming on his fidelity to his master, and the very singular personal services he had rendered him, as well as the great familiarity that had subsisted between them, began to aspire at equality with him, and dictate to him on the most important occasions, as if he absolutely thought himself entitled to a share in the government. He took upon him to behave not only with unlimited freedom, but frequently with manifest intolence; boasting of his own merit, reminding the king of his former low estate, and ostentatiously representing the good offices he had done him.

He offends Agrippa, and is sent in bonds to his own country.

An endless repetition of these circumstances could not fail to disgust the king, as it is disagreeable to human nature to be reminded of unpleasing events; nor can any thing be more disingenuous than a perpetual intimation of obligations. Silas persisted in this arrogant behaviour so long as to incur the king's displeasure to such a degree, that he not only deprived him of his commission, but sent him in bonds to his own country. When his resentment, however began to subside, and he reflected on his severity towards a man who had undergone so many dangers and difficulties in his service, the anniversary of his nativity approaching, he sent for Silas to be present at the royal banquet. The general, being a man of a frank disposition, and one that could not disguise his sentiments, especially where he thought he had reason on his side, observed to the messengers that brought the invitation, "that, notwithstanding the apparent honour the king did him, his fit of complacency, as he had often experienced, would not last long: that, after he had taken away not only his commission, but, as far as he could, his reputation, he could not imagine that, aggrieved as he was, he could conceal such flagrant injustice: that the world should know the distresses from which he had delivered him, and the difficulties and dangers he had encountered for his sake, as well as the rewards he had received for his services; a dungeon and a chain." He then dismissed the messengers with advice, or rather orders, that they would carry back that answer to the king. This being done, and Agrippa finding his petulance incurable, commanded him to continue in prison.

Silas reproaches him.

Silas is recommended to prison.

Agrippa now turned his thoughts towards the concerns of the city, and repaired the walls of that part which was called the New Town at the public charge, making them much stronger and higher than they were before. Such were his zeal and assiduity, that, in the end, he would have rendered Jerusalem impregnable, had not Marcus, the governor of Syria, given Claudius Cæsar cautionary notice of it; and the emperor, from suspicion of attempts at innovation, laid a peremptory command on Agrippa, by letter, to desist from the work.

Claudius puts a stop to the fortifying of Jerusalem.

The king of the Jews was of so affable and generous disposition, that his greatest delight was to display his munificence, and acquire fame by the extent of his bounty. He was a character in contrast with that of Herod who reigned before him; the one being inflexibly rigid, implacably cruel, and notoriously partial to the Greeks in preference to the Jews, as appears from his profusion of treasure upon foreign works, both in structure and ornament, as baths, theatres, temples, galleries, promenades, and the like; whereas he was never known to have put himself to any extraordinary expence to aggrandize the nation of the Jews. Agrippa, on the contrary, was gentle and beneficent, the common father of mankind; but particularly attached to the welfare and interest of his country. He made Jerusalem his constant residence, strictly conformed to the rites and ceremonies of his religion, without the corruption of a prophane and superstitious mixture; nor did he suffer a day to pass without its appointed sacrifice.

Liberality of Agrippa.

Character of Agrippa and Herod contrasted.

Notwithstanding the very respectable character Agrippa had justly acquired, one Simon, a professor of the law, endeavoured to vilify him. The king being absent at Cesarea, this man took occasion, in a public assembly, to reflect on him, as not living according to the maxims and precepts of the Jewish religion, and therefore deserving of exclusion from the temple. One of Agrippa's principal officers sent him information of the charge alledged against him by Simon, who was immediately cited to appear before the king. At the time of his arrival, Agrippa happening to be in the theatre, called to him, and asked him, in a gentle tone, "if he knew of any thing he had done contrary to the laws of his country." Simon, having no reply to make in justification of his charge, with confusion of face implored his pardon, which the king granted beyond all expectations; and, to confirm his character, added to this singular proof of his clemency as remarkable an instance of his bounty, valuing himself more upon the exercise of mercy than power, and esteeming it more worthy a king to be humane than imperious.

Agrippa is calumniated by one Simon.

He pardons him.

All the different places through which he passed had some traits of his bounty and magnificence; but Berytus far above the rest: for there he erected, at an immense charge, a stately theatre, an amphitheatre, with several baths and porticos, sparing no cost to render the respective edifices finished models of perfection. The pomp of the dedication of these eminent buildings was equal to the stateliness of them, as the entertainments of the theatre were composed of most pleasing variety. In the amphitheatre were exposed the combats of gladiators; first man to man; and after that whole troops of condemned malefactors, to the number of seven hundred on each side. This might be deemed an execution of justice in the form of a battle, as they were all destroyed, to the very last man.

Agrippa's peculiar liberality to the inhabitants of Berytus.

Agrippa

Agrippa magnificently entertained four kings at Tiberias.

Agrippa, having displayed these signal proofs of generosity and magnificence at Berytus, passed to Tiberias, a city of Galilee, where he received honours from several kings. There was Antiochus, king of Comagena; Samphigeran, king of Emala; Cotys, king of the Lesser Armenia; Polemon, a petty prince; and Herod, brother of Agrippa, and king of Chalcis. These were treated with a magnificent hospitality, becoming the dignity of the host and the guests; while it redounded to the honour of Agrippa, to be held worthy of so many royal visits. During the abode of these kings with him, Marcus, the governor of Syria, came over to him; and Agrippa, to preserve the respect due to the sovereignty of the empire, went seven furlongs out of the city to meet him. But this proved eventually the occasion of a misunderstanding between him and the governor; for as the kings accompanied him, Marcus, observing such apparent friendship amongst them, began to think the public safety might be in danger from the association of so many potentates, and therefore sent messengers to each of them, enjoining them to depart without delay, which gave Agrippa such offence, that he was never after reconciled to him. The pontificate was now taken from Matthias, and conferred upon Elionæus, the son of Cithæus.

Marcus, governor of Syria, incensed the displeasure of Agrippa.

Elionæus made himself great.

Agrippa exhibited games at Cæsarea.

Agrippa, in the third year of his reign over all Judæa, came to the city of Cæsarea, formerly called the Tower of Straton, where he exhibited games and shews in honour of Cæsar. This festival drew together great numbers of persons, of the first rank, from all parts of the province. On the second day the king went to the theatre in most sumptuous and magnificent apparel; his vestment being of the most curious contexture, and so interwoven with gold and silver, as well as ornamented with jewels of such brilliant refulgence, that it dazzled the eyes of the spectators to such a degree, as to inspire them with veneration. Some fawning flatterers, indeed, addressed him as a god, imploring him to pardon the sins of their ignorance, in thinking him a mere mortal, whereas they were now convinced there was an excellency in his nature more than human. The king neither rebuked them nor spurned their impious adulation; but while he was gratifying his vanity to this excess, he espied an owl perched on a rope over his head, which he soon found to be a presage of ill to him now, as it had been of good heretofore. He fell into an extremity of internal pains, and turning to many about him, thus addressed them: "Behold your god is condemned to die, and thereby prove the fallacy of profligate flatterers, and convince the world that he is not immortal. I have had no reason to envy the happiness of any prince upon the face of the earth, but yet have aspired beyond the sphere of human nature. The will of heaven, however, be done."

He is revered by the multitude as a god.

From an omen, he apprehends his dissolution.

The multitude solicited for his recovery.

Death of Agrippa.

At these words, his pains increasing, he was removed to the palace; and it was rumoured throughout the city, that the king was at the point of death. The multitude was so affected thereby, that men, women, and children, put on sackcloth, according to custom, and joined in fervent supplications for the recovery of the king, who, looking down from his apartment in the palace, could not forbear weeping at the sighs of the mourners prostrate upon the pavement below. After struggling with the acutest pains, without an interval of ease, for five successive days, he departed this life in the fifty-fourth year of his age, and seventh of his reign. He ruled the first four years under the emperor Caius; (the three former of them under the tetrarchy of Philip, and the fourth under that of Herod;) the three last under that of Claudius, who, to the government of Judæa, added those of Samaria and Cæsarea. His yearly revenue was computed at twelve millions of drachmæ; yet he was so profusely liberal, that his income, not being adequate to his expences, he frequently borrowed great sums. Before his death was made public, Chelcias, one of his generals, and Herod, prince of Chalcis, both of them mortal foes to Silas, set Ariston to slay him in prison, as if it had been done by the king's command.

His revenue

Silas is slain at the instance of Herod and Chelcias.

His offspring.

This was the end of king Agrippa, who left behind him a son of his own name, a youth in the seventeenth year of his age, and three daughters. Berenice, the eldest, at the age of sixteen, was married to Herod, his father's brother. Mariamne was contracted to Julius Archelaus, the son of Chelcias; and Drusilla to Epiphanes, the son of Antiochus, king of Comagena.

Ingratitude of the people of Cæsarea and Sebaste to the memory of Agrippa.

When the death of king Agrippa was publicly known, the people of Cæsarea and Sebaste, forgetting the obligations he had laid upon them by so many instances of his liberality, vilified his memory with the foulest aspersions. A band of soldiers carried away the statues of his daughters out of the palace into the public brothels, and reviled and ridiculed their characters in a manner too indecent to be related. They also celebrated festivals, with garlands on their heads, ointments and libations, to Charon; and drank to one another in token of their joy for the death of the king. Nay, they were not only unmindful of Agrippa, who had so abundantly extended his liberality to them, but of his grandfather Herod also, who had himself rebuilt their cities, and raised them temples and harbours at a vast expence.

Agrippa, the son of the deceased, was at this time at Rome, and trained up in the court of Claudius, who no sooner had intelligence of the death of his father, and the indignities offered to his memory, by the inhabitants of Cæsarea and Sebaste, than he expressed great sorrow for the loss of Agrippa, and resentment of the ingratitude. He then determined to send away the son to succeed his father in the kingdom, pursuant to the oath he had taken, and agreeable to the laws of equity and reason. But his friends representing to him the danger of reposing a trust in the hands of an inexperienced youth, that was equal to the best abilities in the empire, he was diverted from his purpose, and, through their insinuations, gave the whole government to Cuspius Fadus, with this deference to the memory of the deceased, that he should by no means introduce Marcus, who had been at variance with him, into any office within his jurisdiction. He also gave Fadus express charge to chastise the inhabitants of Cæsarea and Sebaste most severely for the indignities they had offered to the memory of the deceased, and the disgrace they had put upon the characters of his daughters. He gave orders that he should send away the troops which were in those two cities to Pontus, and detach a body of chosen men out of the Roman legions in Syria to supply their places. But this last order was not obeyed; for Claudius was prevailed upon, with humble supplication, to continue those troops still in Judæa. These very men became the source of the great calamities that afterwards befel the Jews, and sowed those seeds of dissension, from which sprang the war under the government of Florus, insomuch that Vespasian, though conqueror, was obliged to transport them out of that country.

Claudius is disposed to appoint the son of Agrippa to succeed his father.

Claudius appoints Cassius Longinus to the government of Syria. Dissentions between the Jews and Philadelphians. Tholomæus, leader of a band of robbers, put to death. Agrippa, son of the late king, moves Claudius in favour of the Jews. Joseph appointed high-priest.

Cassius Longinus made governor of Syria.

UPON the death of king Agrippa, Claudius Cæsar appointed Cassius Longinus successor to Marcus in the government of Syria, out of respect to the memory of his deceased friend, who, in his life time, had often requested, by letters, that he would remove Marcus from his office.

Quarrel between the Jews and Philadelphians.

When Cuspius Fadus entered upon his command in Judæa, he found great contentions prevail between the Jews beyond Jordan, and the Philadelphians, about the bounds of a small village, called Mais, the inhabitants of which were a brave and warlike people. The Jews of Perea had taken up arms, without any colour of authority from their superiors, and killed several of the Philadelphians. Fadus was so incensed at this seditious intolence, that he caused three of the ringleaders to be put in chains, Annibas, Amaram, and Eleazar. The first was afterwards put to death, and the other two were banished.

Three of the ringleaders punished.

Tholomæus, chief of the robbers, put to death.

Soon after this Tholomæus, the notorious leader of a band of robbers, who had committed ravages in Idumæa and Arabia, was brought to him in chains, and sentenced to death; nor was any thing wanting on the part of Fadus to clear the country of these plunderers. He sent after this to the priests and rulers of Jerusalem, and shewed them Cæsar's mandate, requiring that the vestments peculiarly belonging to the high-priest should be deposited in the castle of Antonia, and there remain in the custody of the Romans, as they had done in former times. The Jews durst not dispute the commands of the emperor, and therefore chose to make respectful application to Fadus and Longinus (who had his troops about him by way of security) for permission to move Claudius upon that point, and respite the proceeding till they might receive the emperor's answer. This request was granted, upon condition of delivering up their sons for hostages in the mean time, to which they readily agreed, and the deputies proceeded on their embassy.

Agrippa, being then in Rome at the court of Cæsar, and having timely notice of their arrival and business, petitioned Cæsar in behalf of the Jews, that the sacred vestments might remain in their own possession, and that he would vouchsafe to signify his pleasure to Fadus by an order to that purpose. Claudius, upon this, sent for the deputies into his presence, and having told them that he had granted their request, and called upon them to thank Agrippa for his interposition in their behalf, gave them the following letter.

Agrippa petitions Cæsar in favour of the Jews.

“ Claudius Cæsar Germanicus, tribune of the people, the fifth time consul elect, the fourth time emperor, and the father of his country the tenth time, to the senate, the people of Jerusalem, and the whole nation of the Jews, greeting:

“ Whereas we are given to understand by our dearly beloved Agrippa, whom we have trained up as tender as our own child, that you have sent us your deputies (which deputies he hath also presented to us) with acknowledgment of our constant cares for the good of your people, and likewise with your earnest desire of having the pontifical robes and ornaments in your own custody; we do freely grant ye your request, in such manner as was formerly allowed you in the days of that excellent person Vitellius, our very dear friend. And be it further known unto you, that we have descended to these concessions, partly out of a motive of piety, it seeming unto us a reasonable thing for all men freely to enjoy the religion

Herod, brother of the deceased Agrippa, and prince of Chalcis, petitioned Claudius Cæsar for the charge of the temple and holy treasure, with the privilege of appointing the high-priest. All this was granted him, and the power continued in the family till the end of the Jewish war. This prince removed Canthara from the pontificate, and appointed Joseph, the son of Canæus, to succeed him.

Queen Helen and Izates become Jews.

ABOUT this time Helen, queen of Adiabena, and Izates, her son, embraced the Jewish religion upon the following occasion. Monobasus, king of Adiabena, became enamoured of his sister, and took her to wife. As he was reposing one night in the term of her pregnancy, he fancied he heard a voice admonishing him to be cautious, lest, by any pressure, he might hurt the infant, which was designed by Providence as a blessing to mankind. The voice startled him; and when he awoke, he related the circumstance to his queen. The child, at the birth, proved to be a male; and the father gave him the name of Izates. He had another son by the same princess, whom he called after his own name, as well as several children by other wives; but his affection concentrated in Izates.

Queen Sa-machas.

This partial preference in the king, excited the jealousy and envy of the rest of the brothers. The king at first took no notice of it, hoping that, through his own prudent conduct, these passions, by degrees, would subside; but finding them, on the contrary, rather increase, he thought it expedient, by way of security, to remove Izates from the palace, and indeed the kingdom. He therefore dispatched him, with a particular recommendation, and sumptuous presents, to Abennerigus, at the fort of Spasinus, who esteemed him so highly, that he gave him his daughter Samachas in marriage, with a very extensive portion of land as her dowry.

Monobasus being advanced in years, and apprehending the approach of his dissolution, had a great desire to see his darling son, and therefore sent for him to that purpose. Upon his arrival he embraced him with the tenderest affection, and bestowed upon him the province of Cæron, a spot famous for aromatic plants; and particularly for the remains of Noah's ark that escaped the deluge, and were there exposed to view. Izates took up his residence in this place during the life of his father. But upon the very day of the king's decease, queen Helen called her great officers of state and commanders together, and thus addressed them: “ I need not inform you “ that the late king, my husband, designed Izates “ for his successor, as esteeming him or all his sons

“ most worthy of that honour. However, I wait
“ your determination, as the happiness of a prince “ depends not on the approbation of an individual, “ but the suffrages of the people in general.” This courteous address was delivered to sound their opinion. It had a very good effect; for the council had no sooner heard of it, than, with the profoundest reverence, according to the custom of the country, they declared themselves unanimously disposed to advance Izates to the throne, being fully satisfied that it was agreeable to his father that it should be so, as the person of his family he accounted best qualified for that dignity. They assured her that the people were in his interest; and that themselves were not only ready to acknowledge him for their sovereign, but, in case of any danger from the pretensions of brothers, to obviate such obstacles, and pave him a safe and easy passage to the throne.

Death of Monobasus.

His brother Monobasus appointed viceroy.

The queen most gratefully acknowledged this zeal and affection; but could by no means consent to the effusion of any blood, till Izates should be consulted upon that point. When the council found the queen thus disposed, they urged, however, that, for the better security of the new king, they might be kept in safe custody, and some other persons, that the queen should best approve of, entrusted with the administration in his absence. The queen approved the proposal, and made choice of Monobasus, the elder brother, for the viceroy, set the crown upon his head, gave him his father's signet, and committed the care of the government into his hands, till his brother should come to take it himself. Izates did not long delay after he heard of his father's death, and immediately on his arrival Monobasus resigned his charge.

While Izates resided at the fort of Spasinus, a certain Jewish merchant, by name Ananias, having introduced himself to some of the female attendants belonging to the court, instructed them in the knowledge of the true God, and the rites and customs of the Jewish religion. By these means he became acquainted with Izates, whom he converted to the same religion, and attended in his journey to Adiabena, whither his father sent to see him a short time before his death. Queen Helen was also converted to our profession by another Jew. Izates, upon his return to Adiabena, was much concerned to find his brothers, and others of his kindred, prisoners there. His conscience recoiled at the idea of either putting them to death, or keeping them in chains. On the other hand he thought it might be dangerous to set them at liberty under provocation to revenge; so that he prudently steered a middle course, and sent them away for hostages; part, with their children, to Rome, to Claudius Cæsar; others to Artabanus, king of Parthia.

When Izates began to find how highly his mother approved of the Jewish mode of worship, he thought it an incumbent duty to make public profession of his religion; and supposing he could not be in reality a Jew, without undergoing the form of circumcision, determined to perfect the work, by initiating himself with that ceremony. His mother endeavoured to divert him from it, apprehending that it would be attended with dangerous consequences. To this end she suggested to him, “ that “ his subjects would renounce their allegiance, if “ they heard that their king had embraced another “ religion, and that they would never endure a Jew “ upon the throne.” This dissuasive suspended the execution of his purpose; and, in the mean time, he advised upon the point with Ananias, who assured him he entirely coincided in opinion with his mother, and threatened to leave him if he persisted in his resolution. Ananias very pertinently observed, “ that, if the matter should become public, he him“ self would be the greatest sufferer, as the author “ of this change, and incur the stigma of a seducer
“ and

"and public enemy: besides, that religion being an act of the heart, God might be worshipped in sincerity and truth, without the external ceremony or circumcision, upon principles of obedience to the precepts of Moses; and that God would dispense with the omission of the operation, when the peace and safety of his dominions would be endangered by the observance of it." This persuasive mode of argument prevailed with the king according to the desire of his mother.

Eleazar pre-sails with Izates to be circumcised

But the king soon wavering in his opinion, it happened in a short time, that there came a Jew out of Galilee, whose name was Eleazar, a man versed in the Mosaic laws. This Eleazar being introduced to Izates, as he was reading in the pentateuch, thus addressed him: "You do not consider, O king, how great an injury you do to the law, and how heinous an offence you offer to God, in knowing his will without obeying it. How long will you continue in a state of uncircumcision? If you have not yet met with the law that requires it, read on, that you may be convinced of the enormity of your crime in the omission of it." This address of Eleazar wrought so powerfully on the king, that he immediately retired to a drawing-room, and underwent the operation. He then sent for, and gave information of the transaction, to his mother and Ananias, who discovered the greatest astonishment and apprehension, lest the discovery should hazard the loss of his kingdom, or his subjects would not endure a prince of another religion; and also lest themselves should be subject to danger, or be the supposed abettors of the innovation. But Providence mercifully interposed in their behalf, by delivering Izates out of great perplexities, and, indeed, desperate extremities, in order to demonstrate that piety and virtue shall never go unrewarded, and that the great disposer of all events will never forsake those who put themselves under his care and protection.

When queen Helen had the happiness of seeing her son settled in the peaceable possession of his crown; and finding he had acquired the reputation, both at home and abroad, of a prince highly favoured of God and man, she was much inclined to visit the city of Jerusalem, in order to worship and sacrifice in that temple, which was so famous all over the world. Her son most cordially gave his consent, furnished her amply with money and every other necessary for her voyage, and conducted her some days upon her way.

She arrived at Jerusalem in an happy hour for the citizens, as so dreadful a famine prevailed at that time, that multitudes were perishing for want of bread. Their distress was no sooner made known to this benevolent princess, than she sent several of her train, some to one place, and some to another, to search for relief; insomuch that, in a short time, great quantities of wheat were brought from Alexandria, and dried figs from Cyprus, which she immediately caused to be distributed among the poor, and thereby acquired immortal honour throughout our nation. Her son Izates likewise, on receiving intelligence of the famine, sent great benefactions in money, to the rulers of Jerusalem, for the use of their poor: but a detail of these royal bounties will be more properly introduced in another place.

A conspiracy against Artabanus, who takes refuge with Izates.

Artabanus, king of Parthia, perceiving that a combined party of powerful and factious nobility had formed a plot against him, determined to apply to Izates for his advice, assistance, and protection, in his then embarrassed situation. Accordingly, having collected about a thousand of his kindred and servants, he proceeded, and met Izates by the way. He had no personal knowledge of him, but imagined him to be the prince to whom he was repairing, by the magnificence of his retinue. On advancing near, he saluted him with reverential awe, according to the custom of the country, and then made known his circumstances in words to this effect: "Behold, great prince, your humble suppliant, nor despise the object of your generous compassion. It has been my fortune to be cast

"down from the throne of majesty to a private and obscure state, which has compelled me to have recourse to your benevolence for succour. Of this I cannot despair from a prince so well acquainted with the vicissitudes of human affairs, and conscious that my case may be your own, as your present degree of elevation is as mine formerly was. I might observe, that it tends to the common interest of princes to aid each other, as the success of one rebellion becomes a precedent for another, by emboldening disaffected subjects." These words were accompanied with tears, and a dejected countenance.

Izates, by this time, perceived his petitioner was no less than Artabanus, king of Parthia; so that dismounting, he requested him to collect his scattered spirits, and console himself with this assurance, that the malady was not past relief, and that Providence would put a speedy end to his distress. He added, that he should find in him a more effectual assistant than he could possibly have expected, as it was his determined resolution to see him restored to his crown, or give up his own. After saying these words, Izates set Artabanus on his own horse, and walked on foot by his side, in honour of a king he owned to be greater than himself. But Artabanus blushed at the compliment, and swore by all the hopes he had of recovering his dignity and fortune, that he would dismount, unless the other would take an horse and go before him. Izates, in compliance with his resolution, ordered another horse, and conducted him to his palace, with all the deference and honour one prince could pay to another. He gave him the precedence in all places private and public, respecting his former glory and dignity, without the least degradation from his change of fortune; wisely considering it as the common lot of mortals to be exalted one day, and dejected another.

His mind being intent on rendering the promised services to Artabanus, Izates wrote a pressing letter to the Parthians to receive their king again, engaging his honour for their indemnity, and assuring them, that all past injuries should be forgiven and forgotten. The Parthians did not absolutely refuse, but pleaded, by way of excuse, that they had transferred the crown to Cinnamus, and thereby prevented themselves from receiving Artabanus again; adding, that the very attempt of such a revocation would lay the foundation of an intestine commotion. Cinnamus, being of a generous and grateful disposition, and having been educated under the immediate care and inspection of Artabanus, informed him in a letter, that if he would return, he would himself be answerable for his reception and security. Artabanus, upon this assurance, returned. Cinnamus met him on the way, paid him reverence in form, saluted him in the style of king, took the crown from off his own head, and placed it upon the head of Artabanus. This was the manner in which he was restored to the kingdom, through the means of Izates, after he had been expelled from it by a faction of his own people. Artabanus expressed his gratitude to his benefactor, by a return of all honourable duty and respect. He gave him the privilege of wearing the Tiara upright, and to sleep upon a golden bed, which are marks of honour peculiar to the king of Parthia. He bestowed upon him the country of Nisibis, formerly belonging to the king of Armenia, a large and fruitful territory, and famous for the ancient city of Antioch, afterwards called Mygdonia, that the Macedonians had erected there. These were the acknowledgments which Izates received from Artabanus, in consideration of the good offices he had rendered him.

Artabanus dying soon after, appointed his son Vardanes to succeed him in his kingdom, who immediately tampered with Izates to draw him into a war with the Romans. But Izates was too well acquainted with the strength and conduct of those people to be drawn into a league against so powerful an enemy. Besides, having five sons trained up among them, to learn their language and discipline, he had some tie of honour upon him, as well as discretion, to reject such a proposal. As he was himself convinced of the impropriety of this undertaking, he endeavoured to divert Vardanes from it, by representing the extraordinary strength and prowess of the Romans. But so far was the Parthian from being discouraged by the pomp of words, that he made war immediately upon Izates. Providence, however, so ordered matters for the humbling his vanity, that he was convinced of the advantages he would hence derive from giving up the enterprize. When the Parthians found Vardanes bent upon a war with the Romans, they took their opportunity to cut him off, and committed the government to his brother Gatarza, who was after taken off by treachery too, and his brother Vologeses succeeded him. He divided the government between his two brothers by the father's side. Pacorus, the elder, had Media; and Tiridates, the younger, had Armenia.

Monobasus, the brother of the king, observing his exemplary piety and virtue, the blessings that attended his general conduct, and the universal esteem he acquired thereby, became desirous of renouncing the religion of their country, and embracing that of the Jews. When this was made known to the grandees of the kingdom, they were not a little displeased, but stifled their resentment till a proper opportunity for shewing it. To this end they wrote to Abias, king of Arabia, and tempted him, with large promises of money, to make war upon their prince, with a solemn assurance that, upon the very first encounter, they would desert him, because they were determined to punish him for having abandoned the religion of his country. They entered into a league with the Arabian king, and pressed him to prosecute the design without delay. Abias complied with their desire, and forthwith marched with a considerable army against Izates. At the first onset, before they came to a close engagement, the army of Izates, according to former assurance, deserted the field as in a panic of consternation, without so much as striking an effective blow. Izates, by this time, found himself evidently betrayed, but retreated without disorder to his camp, where, upon strict enquiry into the cause of this desertion, he discovered it to be a manifest treason betwixt his people and the enemy, detected some of the conspirators, and punished them according to their deserts. The day following he went in pursuit of Abias, routed him, made a great slaughter of part of his army, put the rest to flight, and drove their king to the castle of Arsanus, which he took by storm, rifled, and carried off vast booty, and returned in triumph to Adiabena. Abias, finding himself encompassed on every side, fell by his own sword.

The grandees of Adiabena, however, though they failed in their first attempt, and were now at the mercy of the king, would not desist; but in a supplicatory letter to Vologeses, then king of Parthia, requested him to take them under his protection, rid them of Izates, and appoint some potentate of his own nation to rule over them; observing, that their king had incurred an universal odium, by apostatizing from the religion of his country.

The Parthian king, upon this application, commenced hostilities against Izates, without any colourable pretence. His first step was a revocation of all the honours and privileges which his father had conferred upon him, together with a menace of immediate war, if he dared to dispute his pleasure. This at first alarmed Izates, who deemed it reproachful to be terrified into a resignation of those privileges he so honourably possessed and deserved. Persuaded that submission to the Parthian would avail him nothing, he came to a determinate resolution of committing his cause to Providence, and, in full dependance on the Divine aid, of setting life, honour, and fortune, upon the issue of a battle. Thus resolved, he secured his wives and children in a strong castle, laid up stores of corn in his magazine, burnt and destroyed all the forage about him, and put himself in a posture to receive the enemy. The king of Parthia had raised a formidable army of horse and foot, with great expedition, and pitched his camp upon the bank of a river that parts Adiabena from Media. Izates encamping also not far from thence with a body of six thousand horse, Vologeses gave him to understand by a messenger, that he was now advancing against him with the whole force of the empire, from Bactria to Euphrates, to chastise him for his ingratitude to his master, impiously observing, that the god whom he adored could not deliver him out of his hands. Izates replied to the messenger, that he was sensible of the superiority of the king of Parthia in point of numbers, and as sensible that he was under the protection of an omnipotent God, who was infinitely above all the controul of human power.

With this declaration he dismissed the messenger, and prostrating himself, with his wives and children, in a suppliant posture, thus offered up his prayer to the Father of mercies to this effect:

“Great God, and Governor of the universe, whom none of thy creatures ever served in vain, vouchsafe in mercy to look down upon thy servant, who hath now wholly cast himself upon thy Almighty power and infinite goodness. Deliver him out of the hands of his enemies, repress their presumptuous boldness, for the vindication of thine own honour, and avenge thyself upon them, for their blasphemous defiance of thine omnipotence.”

The prayer and humiliation of this pious prince appeared so effectual, that, upon intelligence, the very same night, of the Dahæ and Sacæ (people of Scythia) falling into Parthia with a strong army, Vologeses drew off his forces, without carrying his menaces into execution, which was an indication of the interposition of Divine Providence in favour of Izates.

This pious prince died soon after, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and twenty-fourth of his reign. He left four sons behind him, but appointed his brother Monobasus for his successor, as a due acknowledgment of the integrity of his conduct, in delivering up the crown which he held in trust, in the absence of Izates, upon the death of their father. Queen Helen, the mother, could not but be greatly afflicted for the loss of so dear and dutiful a son, but it was some alleviation to her grief, to find that the elder brother succeeded to the government. She therefore immediately repaired to him at Adiabena, but did not long survive her favourite son Izates. Monobasus sent the bones of his brother and mother away to Jerusalem, to be deposited in the pyramids which she had built there. They were three in number, and about three furlongs distant from the city. The history of Monobasus will be given in another place.

While Fadus was governor of Judæa, there was a certain magician, called Theredas, who, by his arts, wrought the common people into a belief, that if they would follow him to the river Jordan, and take their effects along with them, he would but give the word, and the waters should divide, and afford them an easy passage over it on foot. This impostor drew after him a numerous train of followers; but they suffered for their presumption and folly; for Fadus, sending a troop of horse among them, before they were aware, many of them were slain, and many taken alive, and among the rest their deluder Theredas, whose head was carried as a spectacle to Jerusalem.

Under these procurators, the great famine happened in Judæa as before mentioned, when the benevolent and humane queen Helen procured relief for the distressed out of Egypt at immense charge. It was at the same time also, that Alexander caused to be crucified James and Simon, the sons of Judas of Galilee, who, while Cyrenius was taxing Galilee, was inciting the Jews to revolt from the Romans. Herod, king of Chalcis, removed Joseph, the son of Camydæ, from the office of high-priest, and appointed Ananias, the son of Nebo-dæus, to the succession. Cumanus succeeded Tiberius. At the same time Herod, brother of Agrippa the Great, departed this life, in the eighth year of the reign of Claudius Cæsar, leaving behind him three sons, Aristobulus, whom he had by a former wife, and Bernicianus and Hyrcanus, whom he had by Berenice, his brother's daughter; but Claudius conferred the government upon Agrippa the younger.

CHAP. IV.

A tumult between the soldiery and populace, upon the feast of the passover, is productive of the most fatal consequences. The books of Moses found amongst the plunder, and destroyed by a soldier. The multitude apply to Cumanus for justice. He inflicts condign punishment on the offender.

WHILE Cumanus ruled in Judæa, a tumult happened at Jerusalem upon the following occasion, which proved fatal to many thousands of the inhabitants. The festival of the passover, or unleavened bread, now approaching, vast multitudes of people repaired to Jerusalem to be present at that solemnity. Cumanus, the governor, thought it expedient, for fear of any disturbance, to set a band of soldiers as a guard upon the temple, sufficient to suppress a tumult, if occasion might require it, as had frequently been done by his predecessors. Upon the fourth day of the festival, a soldier exposed himself naked to the people; an act at once so indecent and insolent, that they exclaimed most outrageously against it; not so much as an affront put upon them, as an indignity offered to God himself, to whose honour this feast was dedicated. Some of them reproached Cumanus, as if the soldier would not have had the hardiness to behave in this manner without his encouragement. Cumanus, though incensed at so foul an imputation, suppressed his resentment, and desired them, in fair words, to avoid any instance of behaviour that might look like sedition. But he soon found that gentle means would have no effect, as they tended to increase rather than suppress the outrage. He therefore commanded the whole army, compleatly accoutered, into the castle of Antonia, which, as before observed, overlooked the temple. The common people were so alarmed at the approach of the soldiery, that they betook themselves to flight with the utmost precipitation, and pressing one upon another, through several narrow avenues, many of them were thrown down and trodden under foot, insomuch that twenty thousand persons perished upon the occasion; a circumstance that turned that day of festival into a day of mourning, in which outcries and lamentations universally prevailed.

This calamity was attended by another equally fatal; for some of those, who had escaped the pressure of the crowd, and advanced an hundred furlongs from the town, meeting with a domestic of the emperor's on the highway, whose name was Stephanus, they assaulted and robbed him of all he had. Cumanus receiving intelligence of this outrage, dispatched a band of soldiers to the spot where it was committed, with orders to rife all the adjacent villages, and bring away some of the principal inhabitants prisoners. In the midst of the pillage, one of the soldiers seized upon the books of Moses amongst the other plunder, and presenting them to the populace, inveighed both against them and the whole nation of the Jews in the most opprobrious terms, and then tore them to pieces. This flagrant contempt of what they held most sacred was no sooner made known to the Jews, than they assembled in great numbers, preferred their complaint to Cumanus, who was then at Cæsarea, and desired him to do them right on the rioter, not as guilty of a private injury, but an heinous offence to the majesty of heaven. The governor durst not deny them justice, lest a popular revolt should ensue; so that, after consulting his friends, he ordered the criminal's head to be struck off for the violation of the law, and by that means put a stop to the progress of the tumult.

A dissention between the Jews and the Samaritans. The Jews chuse Eleazar for their leader. Cumanus puts the mutineers to the rout. Arts used to pacify the multitude. The Samaritans call upon the governor for justice on the Jews, who had sacked their villages. Several Jews put to death. Ananias and Ananus sent bound to Rome. Claudius hears the cause between the Samaritans and Jews. The former are condemned to die. Cumanus banished, and Celer, the tribune, dragged to death in the streets. Claudius Felix sent governor into Judæa. Does great honour to Agrippa. Agrippa and his wife burned under mount Vesuvius. Berenice suspected of incest. Confers the government of the Lesser Armenia on Aristobulus, and that of part of Galilee upon Agrippa.

AFTER this tumult a dissention arose between the Samaritans and the Jews upon the following occasion. It being usual for the Galileans to travel by the way of Samaria to Jerusalem, upon the celebration of their festivals, they happened to pass by a village called Nais, under the jurisdiction of Samaria, and situated on the great plain, where a dispute arose between the passengers and the villagers, and several of the Galileans were slain. Some of the chiefs resented this matter so highly, that they animated the Jews to take up arms, and assert their liberties at the point of the sword. Slavery, they observed, was, at best, base and disgraceful, but when accompanied with arbitrary justice, intolerable. The magistrates did all in their power to appease them, and undertook for Cumanus, that he should do them satisfaction upon the abettors of the tumult. But the multitude were deaf to all terms of pacification, were resolutely bent upon having recourse to arms, and made choice of Eleazar, the son of Dinæus, to head them. This Eleazar was a mountaineer, and one that made it his profession to live upon the spoil of ravaging up and down in Samaria with fire and sword. Cumanus, having intelligence of the present situation of affairs, drew out some squadrons of horse from Sebaste, and four companies of foot, with a body of the Samaritans in arms, advanced upon the Jews, slew many of them, and took more prisoners. The most eminent persons in Jerusalem, finding things in this hopeless and forlorn situation, betook themselves to prayer and humiliation in sackcloth and ashes, for the averting of those dreadful judgments they feared were impending; not omitting, at the same time, such popular arts and arguments, as appeared most conducive to bring the multitude to sober reason. They set before them the desolation of their country, the demolition of their temple, the enslaving their wives and children to prophane nations; and intreated them, upon the whole, as they loved their country, their lives, liberties, families, laws, and religion, to adopt more moderate counsels in future, return to their own habitations, and peaceably lay down their arms. This representation so far prevailed, that the common people dispersed, and the tumult subsided; but the free-booters betook themselves to their lurking places, so that Judæa was exposed to continual ravages.

The Samaritans accuse the Jews before the governor of Syria.

The heads of Samaria now went in a body to Numidius Quadratus, governor of Syria, who was at Tyre, with a charge against the Jews, of firing and plundering their villages, for which, they said, they were not so much concerned on their account, as for the encroachment on the sovereign authority of Rome, which had singly and solely the cognizance of cases of that nature. They observed, that they committed lawless depredations, and usurped a right of judgment, thereby setting the Roman legislature at open defiance.

The Jews vindicate themselves.

The Jews, on the other hand, affirmed that the Samaritans were the authors of this tumult, and of course the disasters which ensued. They laid the main stress of the charge upon Cumanus, who, they said, had been bribed into connivance at a most notorious murder. Quadratus, having attended to the allegations on both sides, adjourned the hearing, assuring the parties, that he would go himself into Judæa, and, upon a perfect investigation of the whole matter, pass judgment accordingly, so that they were dismissed for the present. Quadratus went soon after this into Samaria, where, upon hearing the cause, he concluded that the Samaritans were guilty of the riot. He was likewise informed, that many of the Jews had been accessory to commotions, and therefore caused several prisoners, whom Cumanus had taken into custody, to be put to death. From thence he went to Lydda, a place of considerable extent, where he heard the Samaritan cause a second time, and understanding that one Dortus, an eminent Jew, with four more of his own tribe, had incited the populace to an insurrection, he passed sentence of death upon them all. But Ananias, the high-priest, and Ananus, the principal officer, were sent bound to Rome, to answer for themselves before Cæsar. He likewise ordered into Italy the principal men both of the Samaritans and the Jews, with Cumanus, the governor, and Celer, the tribune, that the emperor might hear and determine upon the cause depending; but returned himself to Jerusalem, lest new tumults might require the exertion of his authority. Finding, however, every thing in a peaceable state, and the Jews wholly intent upon the celebration of one of their usual festivals, he would not interrupt them in the exercise of their profession, and so went back to Antioch.

A great contest between the Jews and Samaritans.

When Cumanus and the Samaritans arrived at Rome, they were ordered to appear at the time and place appointed for the trial, and having made very powerful interest beforehand, would most probably have carried the cause, had it not been for the interposition of Agrippa the younger, who finding the Jews in danger of being overpowered by numbers, importuned Agrippina, the wife of Claudius, to press her husband for a candid and impartial hearing, and an indiscriminate execution of justice upon the authors of this encroachment on the sovereignty of the Roman empire. Claudius was so prevailed upon by this intercession, that he gave both sides a fair hearing, and finding, upon the whole, that the Samaritans had been the authors of this tumult, passed sentence of death upon those who came up to him; of exile upon Cumanus; and commanded Celer, the tribune, to be carried to Jerusalem, and dragged to execution through the streets in the face of all the people. He then appointed Felix, the brother of Pallas, to the government of Judæa.

Felix made governor of Judæa.

Death of Claudius to Agrippa.

Claudius Cæsar, in the twelfth year of his reign, conferred upon Agrippa the tetrarchy of Philip, with Batanæa; and added to it Trachon and Abila, which had been the tetrarchy of Lysanias; but he took Chalcis from him, after it had been under his government four years. Agrippa, having received those bounties from Cæsar, gave his sister Drusilla in marriage to Azizus, king of Emesa, who was now become a Jew. She had before been promised to Epiphanes, the son of Antiochus, on condition of his embracing the Jewish religion; but, upon refusal, the match broke off. He married Mariamne, another of his sisters, to Archelaus, the son of Chelcias, to whom she had been contracted some time before by her father Agrippa, from which marriage was derived a daughter, whose name was Berenice.

Drusilla, sister of Agrippa, married Azizus, a Jew.

Soon after this Drusilla and Azizus were parted on the following occasion. Drusilla possessing great personal charms, Felix, the governor of Judæa, became passionately enamoured of her. To obtain his desire, he sent for Simon, his particular friend, (a Jew of Cyprus, who pretended to divination,) and enjoined him to use all his art with Drusilla to detach her from her husband, and persuade her to marry him, with full assurance that nothing should be wanting to compleat her happiness. Drusilla, to avoid the envy of her sister Berenice, on account of her beauty, imprudently acceded to the proposal, renounced her religion as well as her husband, and married the Roman governor, by whom she had a son, called Agrippa, who, in the days of Titus Cæsar, and in the prime of life, perished, with his wife, at a conflagration of the Mount Vesuvius.

Felix enamoured of Drusilla.

Drusilla is married to Felix.

Berenice lived in a state of widowhood a considerable time after the death of Herod, who was both her husband and her uncle, but lying under the disgraceful imputation of incestuous familiarity with her brother, in order to wipe off that stigma, she persuaded Polemon, king of Cilicia, to embrace the Jewish religion, and take her to wife, as it might pass for a confutation of the report. Polemon, lured by her fortune, came into the proposal; but Berenice, being a woman of a licentious disposition, soon parted with her husband, as he did with his new religion. Mariamne also put away Archelaus, and was married to Demetrius, the most eminent Jew of Alexandria, as well for birth as fortune, and at that time alabarcha of this place, by whom she had a son, called Agrippinus.

Claudius Cæsar, having reigned thirteen years, eight months, and twenty days, departed this life, not without a strong presumption of his having been poisoned by his wife Agrippina. She was the daughter of Germanicus, the emperor's brother. Her first husband was Domitius Ænobarbus, a man of eminence in the city of Rome, who leaving her a widow, she remained in that state till Claudius took her to wife. She had a son by Domitius, who was called by his father's name, which, upon his being adopted by Claudius, was changed for that of Nero. This emperor had a former wife, whose name was Messalina, by whom he had issue Britannicus and Octavia. He caused Messalina to be put to death, upon a suspicion of jealousy, and married Antonia, his eldest child, whom he had by Petronia, a former wife, to Nero, his adopted son.

Death of Claudius Cæsar.

His wives and children.

Agrippina being bent upon the advancement of her own son to the empire, it is reported that she consulted the death of Claudius and the securing the succession to Nero at the same time, lest Germanicus should interpose and supplant him. She had suborned Burrhus, commanding officer of the guards, with some tribunes, friends, and favorites, to be in immediate readiness, upon the demise of Claudius, to carry Nero into the camp, and proclaim him emperor. This they no sooner did, but his first exploit, after his elevation, was the poisoning of Britannicus, which was followed by the atrocious murder of his own mother, in requital for the life she had given him, and the empire she had procured him. He put his wife Octavia to death, and divers persons of the first eminence for integrity and honor. But the history of Nero is so well known, that it is needless to enlarge upon the subject. Some writers are as extravagant in their panegyric, as others have been in their defamation; so that truth, the chief excellence of an historian, is totally obscured. Nor do I much wonder at the palpable contradictions evident in the recital of the acts of Nero by different authors of his life, when I consider the partiality and prejudice that are as evident in the histories of his predecessors. With respect to myself, truth shall ever be my direct aim. Matters foreign and contingent shall be passed over with brevity; while particular attention shall be paid to the concerns of our own nation, which shall be related without the guise of exaggeration of our virtues, or palliation of our vices. But to return to the subject before us.

THE affairs of the Jews grew daily worse and worse, as the country was infested with robbers and impostors, who deluded the credulous multitude. A day scarcely passed in which Felix did not cause some of them to be apprehended, and brought to condign punishment. Eleazar, the son of Dinæus, a ring-leader of the party, was taken by stratagem. Felix gave him a solemn invitation to come over to him, with assurance of perfect security, which inducing Eleazar to compliance, he no sooner arrived, than the governor sent him in chains to Rome.

Felix averse to Jonathan, the high-priest,

Felix conceived a mortal aversion to Jonathan, the high-priest, because he frequently gave him wholesome advice, concerning the regulation of the affairs of Judæa, to prevent the murmurs of the people, and ensure the approbation of those friends who had recommended him to the government. Felix considered his counsel as reproach, and therefore concerted means for ridding himself of the ungrateful importunities of the high-priest, as men of depraved minds cannot bear to be chastised for their faults. To this end he tampered, by presents, with Dora, a citizen of Jerusalem, one of Jonathan's particular friends, to suborn a set of bravos to fall upon and assassinate him. Dora undertook and executed the commission. Matters were so concerted, that these ruffians went to Jerusalem on pretence of devotion, with daggers concealed under their garments, and intermixing with the promiscuous multitude, took an opportunity of stabbing the high-priest. As these miscreants came off with impunity, others were encouraged to perpetrate the same massacres, under the same disguise, upon such festive occasions; so that murders were frequently committed, from motives of revenge, or other execrable causes, not only in divers parts of the city, but in the very temple itself, as if that sacred spot could sanctify the foulest of crimes. Can it then be matter of wonder, that, for the practice and connivance of such abominable profanations, the Almighty, in his wrath and indignation, should deliver up his city, nay, his own house, into the hands of the Romans; and that the whole nation of the Jews, with their wives and children, should be condemned to misery and bondage, to bring them to a due and penitential sense of their enormous offences?

While plunderers and murderers were injuring the public in one quarter, magicians and impostors were preying upon them in another, and alluring the multitude by thousands, to see the signs and miracles they pretended to work. But they suffered severely for their credulity and curiosity, being apprehended, and many of them put to death, by order of Felix. There arrived, at that time, out of Egypt, a certain reported prophet, who invited the populace, and misled the common people to follow him to the top of mount Olivet, about five furlongs from the city, assuring them, that, when he came thither, he would but give command, and the walls of Jerusalem should be levelled with the ground, and open to them an entrance into the city through the ruins.

When Felix received intelligence of this adventure, he commanded his soldiers to take to their arms, so that breaking in upon them with horse and foot, they soon routed them, slew four hundred on the spot, and took two hundred alive; but the Egyptian impostor made his escape. Those who fled endeavoured to incite the people to a rebellion against the Romans, notwithstanding their late defeat, by insinuating that their yoke was intolerable, and should therefore be shaken off, and committed ravages upon all those who would not join them.

There happened, at this time, another dispute between the Jews of Cesarea and Syria, on a claim to some certain privileges. Those of Cesarea claimed a precedence in right of their king Herod, the founder of that city. When the report of this contest came to the knowledge of the neighbouring governors, they caused the incendiaries on both sides to be apprehended, and punished with stripes, in consequence of which the tumult for some time subsided. But the Jewish citizens, depending on their wealth, reproached the Syrians in the most vehement terms. The Syrians, though inferior in wealth, relying on the assistance of the soldiers, returned the opprobrious language of the Jews; so that they proceeded from words to stoning one another, and many were wounded and fell on each side; but the Jews came off conquerors. When Felix found this contest was brought to a kind of war, he urged the Jews to decline it; but when words proved ineffectual, he sent armed troops among them, who killed many, took more prisoners, and permitted the soldiers to plunder the houses of the opulent for their booty. The more respectable and moderate part of the Jews, dreading worse consequences, applied to Felix, and intreated him to call off the soldiers, and afford them time to repent of their rashness. Felix complied with their request.

King Agrippa, at the same time, gave the high-priesthood to Ismael, the son of Phabeus; and the high priests began to divide themselves from the other priests and the governors of Jerusalem, each of them taking a guard of the boldest and most seditious partizans, insomuch that all authority seemed to be set at defiance, as if there had been a total vacancy of administration. Such was the insolence of the high-priests, that they sent their emissaries up and down into Baras, to seize upon the tithes of the priests, so that the poorer sort of that holy order perished for want of bread. These were the dire effects of faction.

FELIX being removed from his government, and Portius Festus appointed, by the emperor, to succeed him, some of the principal Jewish inhabitants of Cesarea, went up to Rome to accuse Felix, and would certainly have brought him to condign punishment, had not Nero yielded to the solicitations of his brother Pallas, who at that time stood highly in his favour.

There were two eminent Syrians of Cesarea, who, by a vast sum of money, formed so powerful an interest with Beryllus, tutor and Greek secretary to Nero, that he obtained the emperor's letters mandatory to Cesarea, for the disfranchising of the Jews, and and abrogating all the privileges they enjoyed within that city, which had been hitherto common to Jews and Syrians. This grant was the source of all the calamities that afterwards betel our nation; for the Jews of Cesarea, after this mandate, would never rest till they waged war with their enemies.

When Fadus came into Judæa, he found the country desolate, the people forced from their habitations, their houses exposed to fire and pillage, and all at the mercy of a brutal clan of free-booters, who ravaged up and down, in great numbers, at pleasure. These robbers were denominated Sicarii, from Sica, alluding to the short sword they wore, a weapon bending towards the point, and formed in a manner betwixt a Persian scymetar and the Roman falchion. With these weapons they did great execution, by intermixing with the multitude at festivals, under colour of religion, and dispatching whom they pleased in that confusion, without difficulty, or danger of discovery.

About the same time king Agrippa caused to be erected, near the porch of the royal palace, at Jerusalem, belonging to the Armenian family, a stately, magnificent apartment, for the entertainment of guests. It stood upon an eminence, commanded a noble prospect of the city, and was so contrived, that the king could see every thing that was done in the temple, which afforded him very great satisfaction. This gave much offence to the principal men amongst the Jews, as it is contrary to our laws, that our rites and ceremonies, and especially our sacrifices in the temple, should be exposed to the view of others. They therefore erected a wall, by way of prevention, before the seats, that enclosed the inner part of the temple, towards the west, which not only intercepted the prospect from the king's apartment, but also the view of the galleries to the westward on the other side of the temple, where the Roman guards were placed upon days of festival. This proceeding highly displeased Agrippa, and more so Festus, who ordered the wall to be pulled down. The citizens, upon this, assured him, that they prized the temple above their lives, and therefore desired permission to send deputies to Cæsar, before they proceeded to the execution of his orders. Their request being granted, they sent to the emperor ten eminent citizens, with Imael, the high-priest, and Chelcias, the treasurer of the temple, as their commissioners. When Nero had heard their petition, he not only passed over what they had done, but gave them his grant for the continuance of the wall they had built. This indulgence they obtained on the intercession of the empress Poppea, a religious woman, who was greatly disposed to favour the Jews. The ten deputies were permitted to return; but Poppea detained Imael and Chelcias as hostages. When Agrippa heard of these transactions, he transferred the pontificate to Joseph, otherwise called Cabis, the son of Simon, formerly high-priest.

CÆSAR, upon hearing of the death of Festus, sent Albinus to take upon him the government of Judæa; and Agrippa, at the same time, deposed Joseph, and conferred the dignity of high-priest upon Ananus, the son of Ananus. Ananus, the father, was deemed singularly honoured, as he had five sons that came successively into the pontificate after him, a circumstance of which no other of an high-priest could boast. The younger Ananus, of whom we are now speaking, was naturally fierce and impetuous, and of the sect of the Sadducees, a very censorious and uncharitable people. Actuated by these principles, he took an opportunity, in the interval between the death of Festus and the arrival of his successor Albinus, to call a council, with the assistance of judges, and then to cite James, the brother of Jesus, together with some other persons, to appear before him, and answer to a charge brought against them; upon which they were all condemned, and delivered up to be stoned. The conscientious part of the citizens were so displeased at this proceeding, that they privately represented it to the king as highly unjust, requesting that Ananus might be so reprov'd for it, as to caution him not to act in the same manner for the future. Others were sent with an account of it to Albinus, who was then upon his journey to Alexandria, setting it forth as an usurpation upon his authority. Albinus was so offended, that he wrote a menacing letter to the high-priest upon it; and king Agrippa, at the expiration of three months, removed him from his office, and conferred it on Jesus, the son of Damneus.

Albinus no sooner arrived at Jerusalem, than he applied himself, with all possible diligence, to the maintaining of the public peace; and to that end brought many of the robbers, called Sicarii, to deserved punishment. Ananias, the high-priest, by his bounty and affability, greatly conciliated the esteem of the people; and also cultivated the friendship of Albinus, and the high-priest Jesus, by means of caresses and presents. But he had a number of abandoned servants, who, joining with others as profligate as themselves, went from barn to barn, and took away the tithes that belonged to the priests by violence, beating and maiming those that refused to deliver them. Many other high-priests acted in the same unjust manner, as they were subject to no controul, insomuch that the priests in ordinary were perishing for want of food, being deprived of their only means of support.

A band of these Sicarii entered the city by night, on the eve of a festival, and surprized the secretary of Eleazar, an officer of the first rank in the army, and son of Ananias, the high-priest, whom they bound, and carried away with them. They then sent information to Ananias, that they had the secretary in custody, and were ready to deliver him up, on condition of his prevailing with Albinus to release ten of their party, whom he held in prison. The department of the secretary was of such importance, that Albinus was under a kind of necessity of complying with the request of Ananias, though it was productive of disastrous events: for when the robbers had found out this mode of compounding their villainies, they were incessantly contriving means for surprizing some of the domestics of Ananias, in order to detain them, and thereby procure the release of any of their party who might be in custody; so that they were more and more emboldened, and infested the whole country with their ravages and depredations.

King Agrippa had now enlarged Cesarea Philippi, and gave it the name of Neronias, in honour of the emperor Nero. He also erected at Berytus a magnificent and sumptuous theatre, which he largely endowed, for the exhibition of annual shows, and distribution of corn and oil among the people in due proportions. He caused the city to be beautified,

fied, and adorned with curious statues and pictures, and a collection of antique originals, from the hands of the greatest masters in the several branches; so that this town might be deemed a repository for all that was rare and precious in the kingdom. But this munificence to strangers, to the impoverishing of his own people, of course incurred their ill will.

Jesus, the son of Gamaliel, made high-priest.

Agrippa soon took away the pontificate from Jesus, and gave it to another of the same name, who was the son of Gamaliel. This created such feuds between them, that they formed parties of abandoned followers, and reviled each other in the public streets in the most opprobrious terms. From words they sometimes proceeded to stones; but Ananias, by dint of money, had the strongest party.

Costobarus and Saul being of the blood royal, and nearly related to Agrippa, had great interest, and drew together a band of resolute ready to execute their commands. They were insolent and rapacious towards the lower class of people, who had no patronage or protection; so that from this juncture we may date the declension of the Jewish nation.

Gessius Florus succeeds Albinus.

When Albinus heard that Gessius Florus was appointed to succeed him, he thought the most effectual means of ingratiating himself with the Jews, was to do justice upon those whom he had in custody. He therefore caused all the prisoners to be brought before him, and, upon due examination, proceeded against them according to their demerits; putting to death those who were manifestly guilty of capital crimes, and discharging those who were only convicted of misdemeanors upon fine and ransom. These means might tend to clear the prisoners, but they let loose robbers upon the country.

Privileges granted to the Levites.

Those of the tribe of Levi, that officiated as choristers in the temple, prevailed on the king to call a council, and grant them the use of the linen vestments which had been peculiar to the priests, suggesting that such a concession would stand upon record as an act of grace to the king's eternal honour. This request was heard and granted in form and manner according to desire, and the choristers were permitted to wear the linen vestment. There was another class of Levites who officiated in the services of the temple, and were likewise allowed to serve promiscuously as choristers. But these licences were repugnant to our national laws and customs, which were never abandoned without a judgment upon the violation.

The temple finished.

The repairing of the temple being finished, and near eight thousand artificers and labourers destitute of employment, and consequently of the means of subsistence, the people, unwilling to stock their money as an easy prey to the Romans, and desirous of making some provision for them, proposed the repairing of a building on the east side of the temple, which overlooking a deep narrow valley, was supported by a wall four hundred cubits in height, and six in depth, being the work of Solomon, the first founder of the temple. But Agrippa, who was entrusted by the emperor with the repairing of this glorious structure, revolving in his mind how much easier it would be to destroy such a work than rebuild it, did not think it expedient to comply with the desire of the people, and therefore gave them to understand, that if they would rest content with beautifying the city by paving the streets with white stone, he would not oppose it. Agrippa also deprived Jesus, the son of Gamaliel, of the pontificate, and conferred it on Matthias, the son of Theophilus, in whose time commenced the war between the Jews and the Romans.

Matthias, the son of Theophilus, appointed high-priest.

Enumeration of the Jewish high-priests.

It appears to me necessary, as introductory to a work under contemplation, to give an account in this place of the origin of high-priests, the qualifications requisite for that sacred function, and the number of those who were admitted to such dignity, as far as to the end of the war.

The first of this order was Aaron, the brother of Moses; and after his death his children succeeded him, and so the honour descended in course to his family. This right of hereditary succession prevailed so far with our forefathers, that none but those of the blood of Aaron were accounted worthy of that holy office, kings themselves not excepted. From Aaron to Phanaius, who was declared high-priest by a faction in a time of war, there were eighty-three in number; thirteen of them officiating in the station from the time that Moses erected a tabernacle to God in the desert, to their entrance into Judaea, where king Solomon built and dedicated the holy temple. At first there was no succeeding to the pontificate, but by a vacancy upon death; though it became a practice afterwards, to appoint succession during the lives of predecessors. These thirteen persons descending from two of the sons of Aaron, succeeded in their turns to that dignity. The form of government was at first aristocratical, then monarchical, and lastly regal. The number of years from the time in which Moses carried our forefathers out of Egypt, to the building of the temple of Solomon, was six hundred and twelve.

Different forms of government.

After those thirteen high-priests abovementioned, there followed eighteen more, in the course of four hundred sixty-six years, six months, and ten days, in succession one to another under the government of kings. These are computed from king Solomon to the days of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, when he marched up to Jerusalem, and took it, burnt the temple, and carried away the whole nation, together with Jozedek, their high-priest, captives.

After a captivity of seventy years in Babylon, Cyrus, king of Persia, dismissed the Jews to their own country, with permission to rebuild their temple; Jesus, the son of Jozedek, exercising, at that time, the function of high-priest. Fifteen of his posterity succeeded him in the same dignity, but under a democratical form of government, till the time of king Antiochus Eupator, a term of four hundred and fourteen years, when this same Antiochus, with his general Lysias, took away both the dignity and life of Onias, otherwise called Menelaus, at Berytus, excluded his son from the succession, and, in his place, appointed Jasinus, one of the race of Aaron, but not of the pontifical family.

Upon this Onias, son of Onias deceased, went away into Egypt, and insinuating himself into the good opinion of Ptolemy Philometer, and Cleopatra his wife, prevailed upon them to build and dedicate a temple to God at Heliopolis, in imitation of that in Jerusalem, and to constitute him high-priest there. Jasinus died, at the expiration of three years, in the execution of the pontifical office, without a successor; so that there was a vacancy for seven years.

When the Jews revolted from the Macedonians, the dignity was transferred to the family of the Asmoneans, and Jonathan advanced to the pontificate, which he enjoyed for the space of seven years, and then being taken off by the treachery of Tryphon, his brother Simon was promoted to his place. Upon his being afterwards assassinated by his son-in-law at a public entertainment, his son Hyrcanus succeeded him, and held it for the space of one and thirty years. Upon his death it devolved on his son Judas, otherwise called Aristobulus, who was the first that took upon him the name and quality of king. After a reign of one year he left his brother Alexander heir and successor both to the kingdom and pontificate, in both which capacities he administered for twenty-seven years, and then departing this life, transmitted the regency to his wife Alexandra, with authority to dispose of the pontificate; in consequence of which she conferred it upon her brother Hyrcanus, who enjoyed it during the nine years of her reign. At her death Aristobulus, the younger brother, made war upon him, overcame him, and reduced him to the condition of a private man, assuming both the kingdom and the pontificate to himself, which he held for three years, and as many months. When Pompey, upon the taking of Jerusalem, carried away him and his children prisoners to Rome, Hyrcanus, being restored to the pontificate, accepted also of the principality, but not under the title of king, enjoying the high-priesthood twenty-three years more, besides besides the nine above-mentioned. At the expiration of this term, Barzapharnes and Pacorus, Parthian generals, passed the Euphrates, made war upon Hyrcanus, and carried him away prisoner, advancing Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, to the crown, who, in three years and three months after, was taken in Jerusalem by Herod and Sosius, and then, by command of Anthony, put to death at Antioch.

Herod having now received the kingdom from the Romans, made no scruple of chusing the high-priests out of the Asmonean race, but conferred the dignity indiscriminately upon persons of obscure birth, provided they were in holy orders; except in the instance of Aristobulus, of whom he made choice, being the grandson of Hyrcanus, that was taken by the Parthians, and brother of his wife Mariamne, to ingratiate himself with the people, who held the memory of Hyrcanus in great veneration. He was, in fine, so generally beloved, that Herod grew jealous of him, and caused him to be drowned in a fish pond at Jericho, as before related. After this time he would never vest any of the Asmonean family with that dignity. His son Archelaus took the same measures, and so did all the Romans after him, who were successively appointed governors of the province.

From the days of Herod to the burning of Jerusalem and the temple by Titus, there were, in all, twenty-eight high-priests, in the course of an hundred and seven years. Some of these were political governors under the reign of Herod, and of his son Archelaus; but, after their deaths, the government was changed to an aristocracy, and the high-priests held dominion over the nation.

CHAP. IX.

Gessius Florus succeeds Albinus, and causes the Jews to take up arms against the Romans. Conclusion of the Jewish Antiquities.

Florus made high-priest of the Jews.
GESSIUS Florus, appointed by Nero to succeed Albinus in the government of Judaea, entailed upon our nation the direst calamities. He was a native of the city of Clazomena, and the husband of Cleopatra, a character as infamous as himself. Through her interest with the empress Poppea, he obtained the dignity, which he abused to such a degree, that the Jews wished for the restoration of Albinus; as the latter endeavoured to conceal his vices, whereas the former openly gloried in his shame. He was rapacious to a degree, inexorably cruel, and so insatiably covetous, that he seemed disposed to universal depredation. He shared in the plunder of robbers, and thereby gave a sanction to rapine. Such, in fine, was the oppression under his government, that the wretched Jews were forced to abandon their habitations, their country, and their altars, and fly for sanctuary even to the most barbarous or foreign nations. Florus laid us under a necessity of taking up arms against the Romans, resolving rather to fall together, than perish ingloriously one by one. This was commenced in the second year of the government of Florus, and twelfth of the reign of Nero. The particulars of it may be accurately known, by perusing the books we have written upon that subject.

End of the Jewish Antiquities.

The Jewish Antiquities I have deduced from the creation of the world to the twelfth year of the reign of Nero, recounting, in historical progression, the several events which related to the Jewish nation throughout so many ages; as in Egypt, Syria, under the Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians, Macedonians, and lastly the Romans. I have enumerated the high-priests in regular order and succession for the space of two thousand years. I have faithfully extracted, according to promise, at the first entrance upon this work, from holy writ, the descent of our kings, and the course of other forms of government, as they succeeded one another, with their power, and administration of affairs.

Conclusion of the Jewish Antiquities.

I will be bold to affirm, that no man living could have written the Jewish Antiquities in a style and manner so accurate, or so acceptable to the Greeks, as myself; for those of my own nation acknowledge me to be perfectly versed in the learning of the Jews; and my proficiency in the language of the Greeks has been cultivated with unremitting assiduity. The knowledge of different languages, and the embellishment of discourse, by pointed accents, and turned periods, are not so highly estimated by our nation, as the knowledge of our laws and the holy scripture. This is an excellency to which two or three, of all that ever aspired to it, have attained, to their immortal honour, and to the essential benefit of succeeding ages.

It will not, I presume, be deemed amiss, to relate some memoirs of my own life, as there are living witnesses to expose fallhood, and confirm truths. Thus I close my Antiquities, which are here comprized in twenty books, intending, with the Divine permission, to draw up a concise narrative of the whole war, from the period of its commencement, to the present state, being the thirteenth year of Domitianus Cæsar, and the fifty-sixth of my own life. I also intend to write a treatise on the peculiar tenets and opinions, as held by the different Jewish sects, concerning the nature and essence of the Divine Being, and the particular licences and restrictions of our laws.

End of the Jewish Antiquities of FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS.

PREFACE of JOSEPHUS
TO THE HISTORY
OF THE WARS OF THE JEWS.

The Jewish wars the most memorable of all others.

AS the Wars between the Jews and Romans were, in point of events, the most memorable of all others, whether national or civil, many have been induced to present the public with a pretended history of them. But it has appeared, upon impartial examination, that their several productions have been deficient in the statement of facts; or that they have tended to veil truth by partial representation, either from a desire of conciliating the favour of the Romans, or manifesting their hatred to the Jews.

Actuated by these considerations, I, Josephus, the son of Matthias, an Hebrew by birth, and a priest of Jerusalem, have undertaken to translate those books, which I formerly composed in the language of our country, into the Greek tongue, for the common benefit of the subjects of the Roman empire; and having first borne arms, for the Jews, against the Romans, I find an irresistible impulse to prosecute my design.

These dreadful wars commenced at a very critical juncture, when the Roman state was embroiled by faction, and the affairs of the Jewish nation flourished in an eminent degree. Power and opulence incited sedition, which was inflamed into tumults that alarmed the whole eastern world; for the Jews, as well those beyond the Euphrates as the rest, seemed all in a confederacy to rise as one man. Commotions prevailed among the Gauls upon the borders of Italy, as also among the Germans. In a word, all was in disorder upon the death of Nero: some arrogating sovereignty to themselves, and some attempting innovations from motives of personal advantage.

Josephus alleges the reason of his undertaking.

In this situation of affairs I hold myself bound, in honour and conscience, to vindicate so many important truths from imposture and mistake; and, after having instructed the Parthians, the Babylonians, the most remote of the Arabians, the Jews on the farther side of the Euphrates, with the Adiabeni, in the particulars of the rise, progress, and event of the wars, not to suffer the Greeks, and so many of the Romans, to be imposed upon by fictions, and remain ignorant of most essential transactions.

Josephus censures other historians.

These writers, indeed, have the confidence to call their accounts histories, though they are destitute of sense, connection, and even truth itself. An evident partiality runs through the whole; and to vilify the Jews without cause, in order to aggrandize the Romans, seems to be their main and principal design. Where is the glory of triumphing over an enfeebled adversary? Why was not the conquest more speedily achieved, considering the mighty power of the Romans, and the valour of their commanders? All their honours are sullied, if they deny or misrepresent the bravery and resolution of the vanquished.

Professes impartiality

Far be it from me to exaggerate the exploits of the Jews, as others have done those of the Romans. I profess to do right indiscriminately to both parties, without addition to, or diminution from, plain matter of fact; to content myself with an affectionate concern for the ruin of my country; while I justly impute our unhappy divisions, and the very burning of the holy temple itself, to the tyranny of our own governors, who compelled the Romans to proceed to that extremity. As an instance of this I shall cite Titus Caesar, who compassionated our miseries, when we were rent by intestine factions, to that humane degree, as to suspend the final destruction of the city, (which he afterwards laid in ashes,) to give the authors of the war time for reflection and repentance. If it should be urged that, in the warmth of passion for the oppression of my country, I have transgressed the bounds of an historian, I have only to offer, by way of excuse, that I was impelled by an irresistible concern for the fate of my country. It is beyond a doubt, that of all the places that ever fell under the dominion of the Roman empire, none arrived to so great a degree of eminence, or was reduced to so abject a state, as the city of Jerusalem. As the calamities of our nation were brought on by our own countrymen, I could not but be particularly affected by them: nor can any candid reader censure me for the tragical stile in which I have related them.

The

The Greek historians have discovered a very reprehensible partiality, not only in the omission of the transactions of as memorable a war as ever occurred in the revolution of time, but in derogating from the merits of those who have undertaken so laudable a task. They have compiled the histories of the Medes and Assyrians from the productions of ancient writers, to whom they are greatly inferior both in style and manner.

The Greek historians partial and negligent.

It is the part of a judicious and faithful historian, to furnish himself, if possible, with such materials as have not been previously transmitted to the world. Pursuant to this maxim, I have, at great expence and labour, (being a stranger,) furnished both Greeks and Romans with a memorial of transactions worthy of being known. In points of controversy the Greeks have sufficiently displayed their abilities: but they seem to have neglected the province of history, or assigned it to men inadequate to the task. But the inattention of the Greeks does by no means depreciate the merit of the History.

I might here relate the origin of the Jews, the cause of their leaving Egypt, the countries through which they passed, and the vicissitudes of fortune they underwent. But all this would be superfluous, as those subjects have been amply treated by several of our own people, and faithfully translated by some of the Greeks into their own tongue. I shall begin my History where their writers and our prophets left off. With respect to the transactions of the wars, of which I was eye-witness, I shall be as copious and particular as possible; and, on the other hand, as concise and general, with respect to such events as preceded my own time.

Method and design of Josephus.

The method I propose shall be to set forth the cause of the expulsion of Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, after taking Jerusalem by force, and keeping possession of it three years and an half, by the sons of Antiochus. I shall then relate the contest betwixt the successors about the government, and the advantage the Romans, under the command of Pompey, took of that division; together with the manner in which Herod, the son of Antipater, with the assistance of Sosius, the general, put an end to the power of the Antiochian line.

The popular revolt under the government of Quintilius Varus, the war that commenced in the twelfth year of the reign of Nero, together with the exploits of the Jews upon their taking up arms under the command of Cestius, will comprize a part of my plan. In this narrative I shall endeavour to observe the strictest impartiality, and do justice to the merits of the Romans as well as our own countrymen. Nor will I suppress any part of the calamities that befell the Jews; as I have contemporaries ready to controvert whatever may be advanced contrary to the truth.

It will be also necessary to state the events which took place on the death of Nero, and succession of Vespasian, who was called back to assume the Imperial government as he was going to attack Jerusalem, with the presages he had of his future greatness, the changes that happened at Rome under his government, and his being declared Emperor against his will. To this will be added the sedition that arose amongst the Jews upon his going into Egypt to give necessary orders, the slavery they endured under tyrannical oppression, and the animosities that prevailed amongst them.

The acts of Titus will also be attended to; such as the inroads he made into Judaea, the number of his approaches, the strength of his works, the fortifications of the city and of the temple, and the model and dimensions of the altar. Nor shall I omit an account of our solemn festivals, the ceremonies that attend them, the seven sorts of purification, the offices of the sacerdotal function, the vestments of the priests, or whatever is sacred belonging to the holy temple.

I shall represent, with impartiality, the cruelty of our governors towards those of their own tribe and profession, the humanity of the Romans even towards strangers, and the candour and liberality of Titus, in inviting the Jews to come to an agreement amongst themselves, from an honourable design of saving both the temple and city. I shall enlarge upon the sufferings and calamities of the people, that arose from war, sedition, and famine, till, in the end, they were made prisoners; nor shall I pass over the destruction of the fugitives, or the torments inflicted upon those that were taken. I shall also advert to the conflagration of the temple against the will of Caesar, the consumption of the sacred treasure, the sacking of the city, the prodigies that preceded the captivating of our tyrannical masters, and the slavery of the people that were carried away. Lastly, I shall describe the progress of Titus through the city and country, together with his return into Italy, and his triumph.

These are the heads of the seven following books, which I have written in confirmation of truth, and to exempt myself from the censure of those who are well acquainted with the subjects.

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS

ON THE

WARS of the JEWS.

BOOK I.

CHAP. I.

Competition between Antiochus and Ptolemy. Antiochus enters Judæa, and takes Jerusalem. Persecutes the Jews, as does Bacchides. Matthias avenges their cause. Judas restores the worship of the true God. Death of Antiochus and Judas.

THE great men of the Jews being divided into factions amongst themselves, at a time that there was a competition between Antiochus Epiphanes and Ptolemy the Sixth, Onias, the high-priest, got the ascendancy, and drove the sons of Tobias out of the city, who applied themselves to Antiochus, with intreaties that he would make an inroad into Judæa, and use them for his guides. The king being easily persuaded to an exploit he had in contemplation before, marched into Judæa with a powerful army, took Jerusalem by assault, and put great numbers to the sword that were suspected to be friends to Ptolemy. The pillage, in general, he gave to the soldiers; rifled the temple himself; and, for three years and an half, discontinued the prayers that were there daily offered up to Almighty God. Onias, the high-priest, fled to Ptolemy, who gave him permission to build a temple and city near Heliopolis, after the model of that at Jerusalem, of which we shall have occasion to speak hereafter.

Antiochus takes Jerusalem.

Persecutes the Jews.

Antiochus was not satisfied with his unexpected taking of the city, or with its pillage, or with the great slaughter he had made there; but, being overcome with the violence of his passion, and remembering what he had suffered during the siege, compelled the Jews to renounce the laws of their country, keep their infants uncircumcised, and sacrifice swine's flesh upon the altar. These were violations dreadful to all good men; but none dared to oppose them without hazard of their lives.

As does Bacchides.

Bacchides had, at this time, the command of Judæa, under Antiochus, who could not have found out a fitter instrument for his purpose, being a man naturally fierce and merciless, and as ready to execute cruelties as the other to enjoin them. It was his common practice to treat men of quality with the greatest indignity; and Jerusalem was little more than a city in name, without privilege, and without commerce. Thus proceeded this insolent tyrant, till the sufferings of the people spurred them on to meditate revenge. Matthias, the son of Asmonæus, one of the priests, that lived at a village called Modin, drew up a band of his own domestics, who, arming themselves with daggers, slew Bacchides, and withdrew immediately to the mountains, out of the reach of the garrisons, for their safety. The people came flocking into Matthias, till he found himself strong enough to venture down into the plain, where he gave the enemy battle, and forced them out of the borders. This success gave him such reputation, that the people, in acknowledgment of their deliverance, chose him for their general, in which command he died, leaving the government to his eldest son Judas. Matth. becomes saviour of the Jews.

Judas, upon a presumption that Antiochus would renew his hostilities, levied a considerable army of his own countrymen, and entered into an alliance with the Romans. Antiochus, upon this, made another incursion into Judæa, where he met with a total repulse. Judas availed himself of this advantage, and assaulted the city garrison, in which action the soldiers were beaten out of the upper city (commonly called the holy place) into the lower. He then got possession of the temple, purified it thoroughly, ran up a wall about it, and furnished it with all sorts of vessels for Divine worship; the other being accounted polluted and prophane. He caused another altar also to be erected, and sacrifices to be offered upon it; but as soon as the true religion was restored, Antiochus died. Judas restores the temple.

This Antiochus was succeeded by a son of the same name, who bore as much enmity to the Jews as his father had done before him. He put himself at the head of an army of fifty thousand foot, near five hundred horse, and eighty elephants, and fell in upon Judæa by the way of the mountains. He took the the

the town of Bethfura, and passing through a narrow defile, in a place called Beth-zacharias, Judas engaged him in the pass; and, before the armies could join, his brother Eleazar, taking notice of one elephant, taller than the rest, with a castle upon his back, and arrayed with sumptuous trappings, he took it for granted, that the rider must be Antiochus. In this confidence he advanced upon the enemy, and made his way up to the elephant; but finding the person upon him, whom he took for the king, out of his reach, he stabbed the beast with a weapon, and was crushed to death under the weight of him upon his fall, giving those around him to understand, how much a brave man valued his honour above his life. But it seems that the rider of this elephant was only a private man; though, it had been Antiochus himself, Eleazar could have got no more by it, than the reputation of sacrificing his life to the very hope of achieving so heroic an exploit. This disappointment was looked upon by his brother as a presage to the fate of the battle; for, though the Jews maintained a long and obstinate engagement, they were, in the end, overpowered by numbers, and, after a great loss of men, Judas, with the remainder, retired into the toparchy of Gophnis, while Antiochus repaired to Jerusalem. After a few days stay, however, he was forced to withdraw through want of necessities, leaving behind him a competent garrison, and sending the rest to take up their winter quarters in Syria.

Judas, availing himself of the king's absence, and having obtained some reinforcements from his own countrymen, in addition to those who had escaped out of the late battle, encountered a party of Antiochus, at a place called Adasa, where he so signalized himself by his valour, that he was oppressed by multitudes, and fell in the action. His brother John did not survive him many days, being drawn into an ambush by the friends of Antiochus, that cost him his life.

C H A P. II.

Jonathan betrayed, and put to death, by Tryphon. Simon recovers Judaea, and falls by a plot of Ptolemy, his son-in-law. Hyrcanus made high priest, and attacks Ptolemy. Cruelty of Ptolemy to the relatives of Hyrcanus. Antiochus invests Jerusalem. Sebasie destroyed by Aristobulus and Antigonus.

JUDAS was succeeded, as prince of the Jews, by his brother Jonathan, who conducted himself with great caution and prudence towards those of his own nation, strengthening his interest, by making friends of the Romans, and coming to a better understanding with the son of Antiochus. But this did not subserve any essential purpose; for the tyrant Tryphon, the tutor of young Antiochus, had recourse to treachery, and, at the same time, to the means of depriving Jonathan of the assistance of his friends; so that upon Jonathan's coming to Antiochus, at Ptolemais, with a slender train, Tryphon seized him by surprise, and having made him prisoner, marched with his army against Judaea, when Simon, the brother of Jonathan, repulsed, and routed him. Upon this he wreaked his vengeance on Jonathan, and caused him to be put to death.

Simon pursued his success, took Gazara, Joppa, and Jamnia; made himself master of Accaron, and demolished it; assisted Antiochus against Tryphon, who, before his expedition into Media, laid siege to Dora. But such was the avarice of the king, that, though Simon had contributed to the death of Tryphon by the aid he had given him, Antiochus soon sent Cleodemus, with an army, to lay waste Judaea, and to enslave Simon himself. This prince of the Jews, though rather advanced in life, conducted the war with great spirit. He sent his sons before with a chosen band of troops, and took himself another way with the rest. Having planted several ambushes about the mountains, he met with great success, gained an important victory, and afterwards was declared high-priest. Thus was Judaea freed out of the hands of the Macedonians, after a subjection of 170 years.

Simon was afterwards taken off at a feast, thro' the treachery of his son-in-law Ptolemy, who had, at the same time, his wife and two of his sons prisoners. He also sent some bravoes to dispatch John, who was also called Hyrcanus. Having notice of their design, John hastened to the city, where he had many friends, partly through reverence for the memory of his father, and partly through aversion to Ptolemy, for his cruel disposition. Ptolemy endeavoured to get into the city by another post, but the people, having admitted Hyrcanus, repulsed him. Upon this Ptolemy betook himself to the castle of Dagon, beyond Jericho; and Hyrcanus, being at this time possessed of the sacerdotal dignity, in succession to his father, as soon as he discharged the duties of his function, speedily advanced to besiege Ptolemy in the castle, and set his mother and brothers at liberty. Hyrcanus invested the fortress, and had even a superiority over Ptolemy, but was overcome by the impulse of natural affection. When Ptolemy found himself pressed, he caused his mother and brothers to be brought out, and exposed on the battlements, with menaces to cast them down headlong, unless Hyrcanus immediately retired; and those menaces were accompanied with stripes. Hyrcanus, though transported with rage and resentment at such unworthy treatment, gave way to the tender emotions of filial duty and fraternal affection: but his mother, with heroic fortitude, defying torture, and even death itself, adjured her son to do justice upon the monster, without any regard to what she suffered; declaring, that to die by the hand of Ptolemy, would be more eligible to her than the longest life, provided that she and her family might have justice done them upon the inhuman wretch. Hyrcanus, through the resolution and authority of his mother, was prevailed upon to resume his courage, and prosecute the assault; but finding that, as he repeated the attack on the one side, Ptolemy repeated the stripes and indignities on the other, he became overwhelmed with compunction. These expostulatory deliberations and transactions protracted the siege to the sabbatic, or seventh, year of rest, which is observed by the Jews as strictly as the seventh day. Ptolemy finding that, upon this revolution, the siege was respite, put both mother and brothers to death, and then fled to Zeno, otherwise called Corylas, the governor of Philadelphia.

Antiochus, resenting the defeat he had sustained from Simon, marched with an army into Judaea, sat down before Jerusalem, and besieged Hyrcanus, who, in this distress, opened the sepulchre of David, (the most opulent of princes,) took upwards of three thousand talents out of it, and came to a composition with Antiochus, for three hundred talents, to raise the siege. This was the first prince of the Jews who ever entertained foreign mercenaries.

Antiochus having quitted Jerusalem, and being upon the march with all his troops into Media, Hyrcanus moved towards Syria, upon intelligence that their towns were neither manned nor fortified, which he found accordingly to be true, and took Medaba and Samara, with divers other places adjacent. He over-ran the country of the Chuthites, a people bordering upon a famous temple, erected there in imitation of that at Jerusalem. He likewise took Dorion and Marissa, with many other towns in Idumaea. He afterwards went to Samaria, a city re-built by Herod, now called Sebasie. He encompassed it with a wall, and committed the care of the siege to his sons Aristobulus and Antigonus, who brought the inhabitants to such distress, for want of provisions, that a great mortality ensued. In this distress they applied to Antiochus for succour, who came readily to their assistance, but to his own undoing; for the two brothers gave him a total overthrow, pursuing him as far as Scythopolis; but in the end he made his escape. The brothers, after this, returned to Samaria, shut the multitude again within the walls, forced the city, demolished it, and made slaves of the inhabitants. Every thing succeeding to their wish, they did not suffer their ardour to abate, but marched as far as Scythopolis, made an incursion upon it, and laid waste all the country that lay within Mount Carmel.

Hyrcaus dies, and is succeeded by his eldest son Aristobulus. His cruelty to his mother and brother Antigonus. Prediction of Judas, one of the sect of the Essenes. Death of Aristobulus caused by a judicial distemper. Alexander set at liberty, and declared king. After various successes, he is routed by Obodas. Demetrius assists the Jews. Eight hundred prisoners inhumanly crucified for a spectacle.

THE succession of John and his sons excited the envy of the adjacent country to that degree, that a sedition ensued, and terminated in an open war. After that decision, the remainder of John's life and government was easy and happy; and, at the end of thirty-three years, he departed this life, leaving five sons behind him. He was a man of so amiable a character, as to be universally respected; and was in possession of some advantages peculiar to himself, being, at the same time, a prince, an high-priest, and a prophet; so that, having Divine revelations, he seldom or never failed in his predictions. He foresaw, and foretold, that the dominion of his two eldest sons would not last long; and it will evidently appear, from a brief view of the transactions of their lives, how short they fell of the reputation and happiness of their father.

Death and character of Hyrcanus.

On the demise of Hyrcanus, Aristobulus, the eldest son, changed the government into a monarchy, and was the first that set a crown upon his own head. This was 481 years and three months after the return of the people into Judea, from the captivity of Babylon. Aristobulus was very partial to his brother Antigonus, inasmuch, that he admitted him to a share in the government; but he caused his mother, and the rest of his brethren, to be taken into custody: nay, he carried his cruelty towards his mother to such excess, that he caused her to perish with famine in prison, upon a suggestion that Hyrcanus had left the regency in her hands.

Cruelty of Aristobulus to his mother and brethren.

But Aristobulus was justly punished for these unnatural proceedings in the lots of Antigonus, whom he caused to be put to death upon the calumnies of a faction, whose business it was to render him odious. Aristobulus had so great an affection for his brother, and so fair an opinion of him, that, for a long time, he looked upon these reports as mere forgery and slander. But an unlucky circumstance at length raised his suspicion, and confirmed the insinuations of the enemies of his brother. Aristobulus happening to be seized with a malignant disease, during the celebration of the feast of tabernacles, Antigonus in the mean time returned from the camp to Jerusalem, in all the pomp of a conqueror. Towards the end of the solemnity he marched up, attended by a train of armed men; thinking that the more grandeur he assumed, the greater honour he did his brother; and all this upon an impulse principally of devotion. The courtiers immediately took advantage of the circumstance, suggesting to the king the ill effects that might arise from this parade of arms and guards, and that Antigonus could have no honest design in it, as from thence it appeared he could not rest content with a share in the government, without the absolute possession of it.

Antigonus is calumniated.

Aristobulus was at length prevailed upon, by degrees, to provide against all hazards, without discovering any sort of jealousy. He resided at that time in the castle of Baris, afterwards called Antonia, where he sent for his guards, and ordered them to wait for Antigonus in a certain subterranean passage. If he came unarmed, they were to let him pass; if otherwise, they were to finish him on the spot. Aristobulus then sent for Antigonus, requiring him to come unarmed. The queen concerted the plot with the conspirators, by engaging the king's messenger not to deliver the order in express and definitive terms, but rather obliquely hint, that the king intimated a desire of seeing the suit of armour he had got in Galilee; upon which Antigonus, without the least suspicion of the good faith of his brother, speedily arrayed himself in armour, and hastened to present himself. But in the subterranean passage, known by the name of Straton's Tower, the guards fell upon him, and slew him. This instance may serve as a lesson, that the bonds of nature, equity, and friendship, are all cancelled where the ear is open to calumny and slander, and that no reliance should be placed in sycophants, that generally infest courts.

In this place I cannot omit a remarkable story of one Judas, by sect an Essene, a man famous for divination, who had never been known to fail in his predictions. Judas happening to pass by as Antigonus went through the temple, exclaimed to some of his disciples, "that it was time for him to leave the world, when truth itself was dead; that his prediction was false, as that very Antigonus, who was to have been slain that day, is still living. The fatal place where he was to have been taken off was Straton's Tower, which is no less than 600 stadia from hence, and that they were then but in the fourth hour of the day." This exclamation was accompanied by a dejection of countenance that betrayed the anxiety of his mind. News arrived soon after, that Antigonus was slain in a subterraneous passage, bearing the same name of Straton's Tower with that of Cesarea upon the sea-coast, and this ambiguity misled the prophet.

The death of Antigonus foretold by Judas, the Essene.

The crime of fratricide was no sooner committed, than Aristobulus was seized with all the horrors of conscience, which greatly inflamed his distemper, and brought on an excessive vomiting of blood, which was thrown by the servants on the very spot where Antigonus was slain. This raised a lamentable outcry among the spectators, which the king overhearing, sent immediately to enquire into the cause of it. The more reluctant they were to disclose it, the more he pressed them, till at length they related the whole matter, when the king, fetching a deep sigh, exclaimed, "that it was not to be expected his secret sins should escape the eye of an all-seeing God, and that divine vengeance shall not follow so horrid a crime. He lamented that his body should retain his soul from doing the justice he owed to the manes of a murdered mother and brother; and that he should linger and go off, at last, in the bitterness of agony, the sport of fortune." With these words he resigned his breath, having reigned no longer than one year.

Last words and death of Aristobulus.

The widowed queen set Alexander at liberty, and caused him to be declared king. He was the eldest son, and reputed a prince of moderation. When he came to the crown, however, he put one of his brothers to death for aspiring to the sovereignty; but the other reconciling himself to a private station, was admitted to his friendship and favour.

Alexander declared king.

Ptolemy Lathur, king of Egypt, having taken Aschois, Alexander gave him battle, and slew many of his men; but the victory rather inclined to Ptolemy. Cleopatra, the mother of that prince, forcing him away into Egypt, Alexander took Gadara by siege, and Amathus, the strongest of all the fortresses beyond Jordan, and the place where Theodore, the son of Zeno, had deposited his choicest treasure. But Theodore attacking him before he was aware, not only recovered his treasure, but took the king's baggage, and cut off near ten thousand Jews in the battle. Alexander, however, by the addition of some reinforcements after this defeat, carried the war towards the sea coasts, to Raphia, Gaza, and Anthedon, which Herod, in process of time, called Agrippias.

Wages war with various fortune.

As public assemblies and festivals are frequently productive of seditions, the Jews raised an insurrection against Alexander, on an accusation of this kind. It came to such a pitch, as to fall little short of a general revolt; so that the king, in his own defence, was under the necessity of taking foreigners into pay, as Pisidians and Cilicians; but for Syrian mercenaries, such was their aversion to the Jews, that he durst not admit them into the service. However, with the forces he had raised, he cut off upwards of six thousand of the mutineers, and then made war on Arabia, where he subdued the Galaadites, and the Moabites, made them his tributaries, and returned to Amathus. By this time Theodore, alarmed at the successes of Alexander, quitted the place; and the other, finding it without a garrison, razed it to the ground.

His next expedition was against Obodas, king of Arabia, who laid in ambush for him near Golan. Alexander was there surprized, and driven into a deep valley, where his army was crushed by the multitude of camels. He escaped himself, with great difficulty, to Jerusalem, where he found his former foes more implacable than ever since his last disaster. They embarrassed him much; though, in every encounter, he overcame them; inasmuch that, within the course of six years, he destroyed at least 50,000 Jews. But he could derive no satisfaction from victories attended with the devastation of his kingdom; so that, in the end, he had recourse from arms to reason, and endeavoured to ingratiate himself with his people by lenient measures. But the mutability of his conduct, instead of gaining them over, rendered him so odious and contemptible, that, on his asking them what he should do to appease them, they replied, that he must die; adding, that they could hardly pardon him in his grave for the injuries he had done them in the time of his life.

The Jews called to their assistance king Demetrius Eucerus, who, finding it his interest to come over to them, readily complied, and advancing with an army, joined the Jews near Shechem. They were computed to amount, in number, to 3000 horse, and 40,000 foot. Alexander, however, with only 10,000 well affected Jews, encountered them. The two kings, before they engaged, used their endeavours to gain deserters from each party; Demetrius applying himself to the mercenaries of Alexander, and the other to the Jews that followed Demetrius: but when they found that neither the Jews or Greeks could be wrought upon to prove unfaithful, they put it to the decision of a battle, in which Demetrius came off conqueror, though Alexander's mercenaries displayed great courage. Demetrius, indeed, was abandoned by some of the troops that invited him to come over to them; and the compassion of several of the Jews for their unfortunate king, induced some of those who had fought against him, to seek him out, and join him, in the mountains, where he had taken refuge. This sudden turn of fortune alarmed Demetrius to that degree, that, through fear lest the rest of the army should follow this example, he gave up his design, and withdrew.

But these desertions of the auxiliaries had no effect on the multitude, who still maintained the war against Alexander, till he had slain the greatest part of them, and driven the remainder into the city of Bemezel, where they were all made prisoners, and carried to Jerusalem. We have now before us a striking instance of the ungovernable rage of an impetuous passion. Alexander, revelling with his concubines, as one part of the entertainment, caused to be exhibited the horrid spectacle of 800 prisoners on crosses in the midst of the city, having first commanded the throats of their wives and children to be cut before their faces. This dreadful scene had such a terrible effect on the opposing multitude, that some of them fled their country the next night; nor did they return till after the death of this prince. By these inhuman means he at length suppressed the tumults that disturbed the peace of his kingdom.

himself; but Alexandra, at her death, leaves it to Hyrcanus. Dissention between the brethren. A compromise ensues.

THOUGH intestine broils amongst the Jews had subsided, Antiochus Dionysius, the brother of Demetrius, and the last of the race of Seleucus, involved Alexander in fresh troubles. This prince, having overcome the Arabians, put Alexander into some apprehension for himself; so that he ran a line, with a deep ditch, and an high wall, before it, with wooden towers, in order to prevent any sudden approaches. This line, or retrenchment, was carried all along the mountains near Antipatris, to the borders of Joppa. But it was no obstruction to the progress of Antiochus; for he set fire to the towers, filled the ditches, and so passing over with his army, marched strait away against the Arabians, regardless of his revenge upon Alexander.

Aretas, king of Arabia, upon the approach of Antiochus, drew his army into strong holds, and then on a sudden, when the latter thought himself secure, fell upon him with ten thousand horse. The action was obstinate and bloody; for while Antiochus survived, his men stood bravely by him, though the Arabians made very great slaughter. When he fell in the heat of the battle, they turned their backs and fled; so that upon the issue, betwixt those that were cut off in the engagement and the pursuit, the army was nearly destroyed. Some escaped into the village of Cana, where the greater part of them perished with famine. The people of Damascus had such an hatred for Ptolemy, the son of Menæmus, that they entered into a league with Aretas, and made him king of Cœlo-Syria. He carried the war into Judæa, defeated Alexander, and then retired upon mutual agreement.

The king of the Jews having taken Pella, assaulted Gerata, and carried it, though fortified with a triple circumvallation, making himself master not only of the place, but of all the treasure of Theodore deposited therein. After this he demolished Gaulan, Seleucia, and a place called the Valley of Antiochus, together with the strong castle of Gamara. In this place he took prisoner Demetrius, the governor, (a man of infamous character;) and so returned to Jerusalem, where he was received with joyful acclamations, after a success of three years. At the expiration of the war he fell into a quarrel, and being of an opinion that action would do him good, entered into a fresh and unreasonable war, and struggling beyond his strength, wore himself out with fatigue; and thus closed the scene of life in the twenty-seventh year of his reign.

Alexander left the kingdom to Alexandra, his queen, as one that had acquired popularity by her moderation and virtue: he therefore made no doubt of the people's ready submission and resignation to her authority. Nor was he deceived in his opinion; for the reputation of her goodness atoned for the disadvantages of her sex; being a woman versed in the Jewish rites and customs, and one that had given constant proof of her zeal for the observance of those holy laws. As she had two sons by Alexander, she made Hyrcanus, the elder, high-priest; not only on account of his seniority, but the inactivity of his disposition, which would prevent him from disturbing the public peace. Aristobulus, the younger, being of an enterprising spirit, she thought it more expedient to keep him in a private station.

There was amongst the Jews a certain sect called Pharisees, who valued themselves upon being thought more holy than their neighbours, and better skilled in the law. Alexandra, who was bigotted in her religion to a degree of superstition, held these men in the most profound reverence upon account of their mighty pretensions; and they availed themselves so far of her favourable opinion, as to engross the honour and privileges of government, recommend to places under administration, and imprison or discharge whom they thought proper. They reserved both the honourable and profitable commissions commissions of government to themselves; but the cares, expences, and difficulties, were left to Alexandra. She had great sagacity in the conduct of affairs; made a point of augmenting the militia; kept two armies on foot, and a great number of foreign auxiliaries in pay, which rendered her respectable at home, and formidable abroad. But though she had thus far the command of others, she was herself under the absolute dominion of the Pharisees.

Alexandra governed by the Pharisees.

The leaders of this sect caused Diogenes, a man of the first rank, and a particular friend of the late king, to be put to death, upon a suggestion that he had a concern in crucifying the eight hundred prisoners at the command of Alexander. Nay, further, they prevailed with the queen not to suffer one man to escape that was an adviser to that horrible proceeding. The queen was so captivated, that she could deny them nothing; so that under the colour of such prevailing influence, they destroyed whom they pleased, and carried their violence to such lengths, that no good man was safe; inasmuch, that several persons of condition were forced to take sanctuary with Aristobulus, who persuaded his mother to spare those persons out of respect to their dignity, and for the future to expel those from the city whom she might suspect of having been guilty. This being granted, they were banished, instead of being put to death.

They oppress the Jews.

Alexandra, about this time, sent an army to Damascus, upon a pretext that Ptolemy grievously oppressed that city, and got possession of it without any considerable resistance. Cleopatra was now besieged in Ptolemais, by Tigranes, king of Armenia, while Alexandra plied him with presents and proposals; but Lucullus having already entered Armenia with a Roman army, he marched away to prevent further mischief at home.

Damascus taken by Alexandra.

Soon after this Alexandra fell dangerously ill; whereupon the younger brother, Aristobulus, with a train of adherents, in the prime of youth, faithful and brave, got possession of the castles, seized what money he could find, engaged a body of auxiliary troops, and declared himself king. Hyrcanus complaining of this usurpation to his mother, she so far commiserated his case, that she caused the wife and sons of Aristobulus to be confined in the castle on the north side of the temple, formerly called Baris, and afterwards Antonia under the government of Anthony, as Sebaſte and Agrippias drew their names from Augustus and Agrippa. Alexandra, after a reign of nine years, departed this life, before she could revenge herself upon Aristobulus for endeavouring to depose his brother.

Aristobulus seizes on the kingdom.

Death of Alexandra.

She left Hyrcanus all she possessed, and transmitted the government to him while she was living; but Aristobulus was much his superior in power and magnanimity. The dispute between the two brothers came to a battle near Jericho, where the greater part of Hyrcanus's men went over to Aristobulus, while he, with his wretched partizans, escaped, with much difficulty, into Antonia, where they had their security, the wife and sons of Aristobulus being there in custody. The brothers, however, before matters proceeded to extremities, came to this agreement, that Hyrcanus should yield up the kingdom to Aristobulus, and content himself with such honours and privileges as belonged to the dignity of the king's brother. The reconciliation being interchangeably declared in the temple, they embraced each other, and Aristobulus repaired to the royal palace, while Hyrcanus went to the former residence of his brother.

Disputes between the brothers for the kingdom.

They come to a composition.

CHAP. V.

Hyrcanus, at the instance of Antipater, applies for assistance, in the recovery of his kingdom, to Aretas, king of Arabia, who enters Judæa with a formidable army, forces Aristobulus into Jerusalem, and besieges him there. Scaurus, the Roman general, tempted by a bribe, raises the siege. The two brothers prefer their suit to Pompey, who treats the younger with great contempt. They plead their cause before Pompey. Aristobulus submits to Pompey, and is made his prisoner. Jerusalem besieged, and the temple taken by assault. Moderation of Pompey. He declares Hyrcanus high-priest. Aristobulus and family carried away prisoners to Rome.

THE sudden elevation of Aristobulus to the royal dignity was a great mortification to his enemies, and especially to Antipater, with whom he had been long at variance. Antipater was by extraction an Idumæan, and, for birth and estate, a man of the first rank in the country. Hyrcanus being now deposed, and arrogantly deprived of his dominions, Antipater advised him to apply to Aretas, king of Arabia, for assistance towards the recovery of his kingdom; employing his own interest, at the same time, with Aretas, to gain the point, by censuring the usurpation of Aristobulus, and applauding the pacific disposition of Hyrcanus. He adduced arguments supported by the honour of contributing to the restoration of a much injured king, and enforced them by representing it as becoming the character of a great prince to vindicate the prerogative of royalty.

Antipater advises Hyrcanus to apply to Aretas, king of Arabia, for assistance towards the recovery of his kingdom.

Having thus pre-disposed Aretas in favour of Hyrcanus, Antipater conveyed him out of the city by night, and brought him, with the utmost expedition, to Petra, the royal palace of Arabia, where he consigned him, with plausible words, and sumptuous presents, to the care and protection of the king, who promised to exert his utmost endeavours to restore him to his crown.

Aretas sends the prince Hyrcanus to Petra.

To this end he entered Judæa with an army of 50,000 men, horse and foot; so that Aristobulus, through inferiority in point of numbers, being incapable of making resistance, was routed at the first charge, and forced to take sanctuary in Jerusalem. He was there besieged; and had certainly been taken, if Scaurus, the Roman general, had not seasonably interposed, and raised the siege. Pompey the Great, who was then at war with Tigranes, sent Scaurus, with an army, out of Armenia into Syria; but, upon his arrival at Damascus, he found the place taken by Metullus and Lellius, and their troops drawn off. Receiving intelligence of the state of affairs in Judæa, he thought it most expedient to bend his course that way, and had no sooner reached the borders, than he was encountered by two deputies from the brothers, who had each of them instructions to implore the assistance of the Romans for their respective matters. But the three hundred talents presented by the deputy of Aristobulus, had much more weight than the pretensions of his brother Hyrcanus, as appears from an herald being sent by Scaurus to Hyrcanus and the Arabians, threatening them with the resentment of Pompey and the Roman senate, unless they immediately raised the siege. Aretas, terrified into compliance, withdrew with precipitation out of Judæa into Philadelphia; and Scaurus returned to Damascus. Aristobulus, not satisfied with his escape, assembled all his forces, and pursued the enemy to a place called Papyron, where he engaged them, and cut off above six thousand of their men, and amongst the rest Cephalon, the brother of Antipater.

Aristobulus is routed by Pompey's army, and forced to take sanctuary in Jerusalem.

Scaurus, the Roman general, interposes, and raises the siege.

The first of the brothers is taken.

Hyrcanus and Antipater, thus deprived of their hopes from the Arabians, transferred the same to their very adversaries; and upon Pompey's entering Syria, and coming to Damascus, cast themselves upon his honour for protection. They used the same means of presents and arguments which they had done with Aretas; entreating Pompey to consider the violent usurpation of Aristobulus, and the right of Hyrcanus, as well with respect to seniority as character. Aristobulus, relying upon his interest with Scaurus, arrayed himself in royal attire, and presented his person to Pompey with the train and equipage of a king. But finding that his assuming of royal dignity had no weight with Pompey, and disdaining a servile application, he abruptly took his departure, and returned to Diospolis.

The

The arrogant behaviour of Aristobulus gave Pompey great offence, a most desirable circumstance to Hyrcanus and his adherents. He immediately drew out his Roman troops, and some Syrian auxiliaries, and marched after him. When he had passed Peila and Scythopolis, and came to Corea, upon the borders of Judæa, in the Mediterranean passage, he heard that Aristobulus was fled to Alexandria, a strong hold, situated on an high mountain, whither he sent, and commanded him to come down to him. Aristobulus, naturally proud and ambitious, could not brook this imperious mandate, and therefore determined to run all hazards rather than comply with it: but, through the murmuring of the people, and the pressing instances of his friends, to consider the power of the Romans, and the urgency of the case, he was at length prevailed upon to come down; and after speaking in defence of his pretensions, went up again. He afterwards, at the requisition of his brother, came down a second time; and when they had each of them preferred their respective claims to Pompey, returned without the least molestation. He was now divided between hope and fear, and alternately disposed to submission and resistance, till, upon mature deliberation, he was resolved to go up to the castle again, lest he should be tempted to do any thing derogatory to his royal state.

Pompey was now strongly inclined to take possession of the castle; but being told that Aristobulus had given a positive charge to all the governors to attend to no orders but those under his own hand and seal, he commanded him to write to them severally, to deliver them up immediately upon the sight of his letters. Aristobulus obeyed the injunction; but went away, in disgust and indignation, to Jerusalem, meditating a war with Pompey.

The Romans did not give him time to make preparations to withstand a siege, but hastened immediately after him; and he was incited to an expedition in his progress, by the intelligence he received at Jericho of the death of Mithridates. This is the most fruitful country of Judæa, bearing a vast number of palm-trees, besides the balsam-tree, the juice of which, upon the incision of the bark with a sharp stone, drops down like tears. He staid there that night, and posted away the next morning for Jerusalem. Aristobulus, alarmed at this expedition, cast himself at Pompey's feet, with supplications and tears: he made him promises of money, and proposal of giving up both the city, and his own person, into Pompey's hands. This appeased him for the present; but Aristobulus did not perform the condition; for, when Gabinus was sent to receive the money, his partizans would not admit him into the city.

This prevaricating behaviour irritated Pompey to a great degree, that he kept Aristobulus prisoner, and advanced to the city, took a view of the fortifications, and considered upon what quarter to attack it. He observed that the walls were strong and impregnable, and the temple to invincibly sure, that if the city itself was taken, the work would be but half accomplished.

While Pompey was deliberating upon the most expedient means to pursue, a violent sedition arose in the town, between the parties of Aristobulus and Hyrcanus. The former were for putting the matter to the decision of an engagement, and retaining their long by dint of arms; the other for opening the gates, and admitting Pompey into the town without any opposition. This was the sense of the majority, from the awe in which they held the Romans. The friends of Aristobulus, upon this, retired into the castle, and cut down the bridge of communication betwixt that and the city, determining to maintain it to the last. But as the others had received the Romans into the city, and put them into the palace, Pompey sent Pito, one of his general officers, with a strong detachment, to take possession of it. When he perceived the obstinacy of the Jews in the temple, and that there was no longer any hope of accommodation, he posted his guards, and put all things in order for an attack; Hyrcanus and his party contributing the best they could, both in action and counsel, to his assistance.

The first business was to fill up the ditch and valley upon the north-side of the temple; and the soldiers were obliged to carry materials for that purpose. It was a work of infinite difficulty, both with respect to the prodigious depth, and the advantage the Jews had of annoying them from their superior station. Nor could the Romans have succeeded in their efforts, had not Pompey reminded them of the Jews strict observance of their seventh day or sabbath. This great leader, knowing that the Jews made a conscience of doing any work upon that day, but what was of absolute necessity, either for the support of life, or the defence of it in case of immediate danger, commanded his soldiers only to ply their entrenchments on that day, without any other act of hostility. When the ground was now levelled, the bulwarks advanced, with strong and large turrets planted upon them, and manned, the Romans, with certain engines they had brought from Tyre, began the battery; the soldiers, at the same time, beating the defendants out of the towers above, with stones from the walls, till, in the end, they were tired out with the labour.

Pompey could not but admire the fortitude of these people, and more especially in this particular, that, in the midst of extremity and danger, they never discontinued the ceremonies of their religion, but offered up their daily prayers and sacrifices as regularly as if it had been a time of profound peace. Nor, indeed, did they relax in their attention to Divine worship, even after the temple was actually taken, and many were slain before the altar. In short, after a three months siege, and the loss of only one tower, the temple was taken by assault.

The first that entered the breach was Paullus Cornelius, the son of Sylla; and after him Furius and Fabius, two centurions, with their cohorts, who beset the temple, and put to the sword all that fell in their way. There were several priests at that time in the very exercise of their holy function, who, with the point of the sword at their breasts, went on with their oblations and incense, without any regard to the safety of their lives, out of a veneration they had for the duties of their profession. The greater part of them were slain by their own countrymen of the adverse faction; and an innumerable multitude threw themselves down precipices: others, in a rage or desperation, set fire to what they could reach about the walls, and then cast themselves into the flames. There perished in this outrage 12,000 of the Jews. Few of the Romans were slain, but great numbers wounded.

But nothing affected the Jewish nation so much in their present calamities, as that their holy place, which had hitherto been seen by none, should be exposed to the view of strangers. Pompey, with a train of attendants, went into the temple itself, where it was not lawful for any but the high-priest to enter, and saw what was reposed therein, the candlesticks, lamps, and tables for incense, with other vessels, all of gold, a mass of spices, with 2000 talents of sacred treasure. Yet such was his liberality, that he would not suffer any thing to be touched that was dedicated to Divine worship, but commanded the ministers about the temple, the very next day after he had taken it, to superintend the purification of it, and go on with their ceremonies as before.

He also declared Hyrcanus high-priest, in consideration of the good offices he had rendered him, both in the siege and otherwise, by drawing off great numbers of the faction from Aristobulus. By these means, like a wise and good man, he secured himself the affections of the people. Amongst the captives was the father in law of Aristobulus, who was also his uncle. Pompey caused the principal authors of the revolt to be beheaded; and conferred upon Paullus, and those of his party who had signalized their bravery, the most honourable rewards. He imposed a tribute upon Judæa, took away from the Jews the cities they had possessed themselves of in Cœlo-Syria, and annexing them to the jurisdiction of the then Roman governor, reduced them to their own bounds. He rebuilt Gadara, which they had destroyed, to gratify Demetrius, one of his freemen, and a native of the place. With respect to the inland cities of Hippion, Scythopolis, Pella, Samaria, Marissa, Azotus, Jamnia, and Arethusa, and the sea-coast towns of Gaza, Joppa, Dora, and that which was formerly called Straton's Tower, and afterwards Cæsarea by Herod, who beautified it with magnificent buildings, he took them all from the Jews, to restore them to their inhabitants, and so joined them to the province of Syria. After the passing of these orders, and settling Scaurus in the government of Judæa, and of all the country of Egypt to the borders of the Euphrates, with the command of two legions, Pompey hastened to Rome by way of Cilicia, carrying Aristobulus, and his family, prisoners with him; that is, two daughters, and two sons, Alexander and Antigonus; the former of whom made his escape on his passage; but the latter, with his sisters, were carried to Rome.

IN the mean time Scaurus made an expedition into Arabia, towards Petra, but found the country so craggy, that he could not advance without the greatest difficulty. He laid waste Pella and its environs; though he had many hardships to encounter, through want of provisions for his army. Hyrcanus, however, at length found means, by the assistance of Antipater, to furnish him with a supply. Scaurus, well knowing that there was a good understanding subsisting between Antipater and Aretas, prevailed with the former to go to him upon terms of amity, and endeavour to bring him to consent to a composition of the war for a stipulated sum of money. Antipater undertook the commission, and brought the king of Arabia into compliance with the proposal; who, entering into an agreement to pay three hundred talents as the purchase of a peace, Scaurus drew his army out of Arabia. Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, who escaped from Pompey, had, by this time, raised a considerable body of men, was ravaging Judæa, and pressing so hard upon Hyrcanus, that Jerusalem was supposed to be in danger, upon a presumption that the walls which Pompey had beaten down were not as yet repaired. But Gabinus, the successor of Scaurus, an officer eminent for his conduct and valour, being sent into Syria, and marching against him, Alexander found the necessity of putting himself in the best posture of defence against so formidable an enemy. He had raised an army, consisting of 10,000 foot, and 1500 horse; and had fortified several defensible places, as Alexandrion, Hyrcanus, and Machærus, near the mountains of Arabia.

Gabinus sent Mark Anthony before him, with a detachment of some of Antipater's choice troops, and a great number of Jews, under Malichus and Pitholaus, to join him. Gabinus himself followed with the main body, and advanced towards Alexander, who, finding himself so greatly overpowered in number, was forced to retire. But Gabinus pressing upon him in his retreat, came up with him, and engaged him not far from Jerusalem, where he lost 6000 men; of whom 3000 fell in the action, and the remainder were taken alive; while he himself fled with those that escaped to Alexandrion. When Gabinus came up to the castle, he offered an act of indemnity to all deserters that would come over to him, and join him before the battle; but as they were too haughty to listen to terms of accommodation, he fell upon them, slew great numbers, and shut up the rest in the citadel. Mark Anthony signalized himself in this action; and though upon every occasion he displayed his valour and conduct, he seems upon the present to have outdone himself.

Gabinus, leaving a sufficient force before the castle, took a view of all the cities and towns in the province, with an intention of repairing those that had sustained damage, and rebuilding those that had been destroyed. He then gave peremptory orders for the re-peopling of Scythopolis, Samaria, Anthedon, Apollonia, Jamnia, Raphia, Marissa, Dora, Gadaza, Azotus, and several other places, where the inhabitants came flocking in with the utmost joy to resume their former habitations.

When Gabinus had thus disposed of these places, he returned to the siege of Alexandrion, and carried it on with renewed vigour. Alexander was so alarmed at the desperate situation of his affairs, that he sent ambassadors, with an absolute resignation of himself to his pleasure, an acknowledgment of his errors, and a solicitation for pardon. They were commissioned to tender to him not only Machærus and Hyrcanion, but Alexandrion itself. This offer being made and accepted, Gabinus demolished them all at the instance of Alexander's mother, lest they might prove the occasion of another war. Such was her tenderness for her husband and children, that were carried prisoners to Rome, that she omitted no application nor address that might ingratiate herself with the general.

After this Gabinus brought Hyrcanus to Jerusalem, committed the temple to his charge, appointed officers for the civil administration, and divided the whole province of Judæa into five jurisdictions. The first was Jerusalem, the second Gadara, the third Amathus, the fourth Jericho, and the fifth Sepphoris, a city of Galilee. It gave great satisfaction to the people to find themselves delivered from a monarchy to an aristocracy.

It was not long before Aristobulus afforded occasion for new disturbances. He made his escape from Rome, and collected a great body of Jews, partly through love of innovation, and partly through the regard they bore him. His first attempt was the repairing of Alexandrion; but upon information that Sifenna, Anthony, and Servilius, were marching towards him with an army from Gabinus, he withdrew to Machærus, where he dismissed the unprofitable multitude, and took with him only a body of eight thousand men well armed, including a thousand fugitive Jews, that Pitholaus had brought out of Jerusalem. The Romans followed them close, and brought them to action. Alexander and his men behaved gallantly upon the occasion; but, in the end, being overpowered with numbers, the Romans obtained a decisive victory. Five thousand were slain upon the spot, two thousand withdrew to a hill, and made a little stand, and the other thousand, with Aristobulus himself, cut their way through the Roman army, and marched to Machærus. Though, upon their arrival there, they found it in ruins, Aristobulus did not despair of gaining time enough, by a truce, to repair the castle, and reinforce his army.

The Romans in the mean time plied the attack, and, at the end of two days, after a very brave resistance on the part of the besieged, took the place, with Aristobulus, and his son Antigonus, that fled from Rome with him. They were both bound, and sent to Gabinus, and thence to Rome again. The senate put the father under confinement; but sent the son back to Judæa, at the instance of Gabinus, who had promised as much to the wife of Aristobulus upon the delivery of the castles.

Gabinus was now preparing for a war upon the Parthians; but Ptolemy, having quitted the Euphrates, phrates, and being on his return from Egypt, gave him a diversion. Hyrcanus and Antipater afforded him all possible assistance, supplying him with men, money, arms, corn; in fine, with all provisions necessary for carrying on a war. They also prevailed with the Jews, that guarded the avenues to Pelusium, to let Gabinus pass over at his return. His departure to alarmed the other places of Syria, and caused such a revolt amongst the Jews, that Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, having collected a vast multitude of people, took up a resolution to put every Roman to death that was to be found in that quarter. The general was not insensible of the danger, and the sedition increasing, he made use of his interest with Antipater to bring matters to an accommodation. But Alexander being a warlike prince, and having an army of thirty thousand men, was eager to come to an engagement, which accordingly fell out near the mountain of Itabyr. Ten thousand of Alexander's army were slain upon the spot, and the rest routed and dispersed. Gabinus then returned to Jerusalem, to settle the government, according to the advice of Antipater. Thence he marched after the Nabathæans, having privately discharged two Parthian deserters that came over to him, Mithridates and Orsanes, pretending to the soldiers that they had made their escape.

Crassus, who succeeded Gabinus in the government of Syria, rifled the temple not only of the two thousand talents that Pompey left untouched, but all the gold that was deposited there for the purpose of carrying on the Parthian war. Upon this he passed the Euphrates, where he himself was lost, together with his army.

Crassus was succeeded by Cassius, who put a stop to the Parthians, when they were just ready to break into Syria. He was no sooner in possession of his government, than he marched into Judæa, took Tarchen, and carried off near three thousand Jews into bondage. He also caused to be put to death Pitholaus, who had supported the seditious followers of Aristobulus, and this through the advice of Antipater. Cypris, the wife of Antipater, was a noble Arabian, by whom he had four sons, Phasael, Herod, afterwards king, Joseph, and Pheroras, and one daughter, whose name was Salome. He was a man universally beloved for his many excellent qualities; but his most particular friend was the king of the Arabians, to whom he recommended the care of his children when he undertook the war against Aristobulus. When Cassius had forced Alexander to come to terms, and remain quiet, he returned to his post at the Euphrates, to take possession of the pass, and prevent the inroad of the Parthians.

CHAPTER VII.

Aristobulus released by Julius Cæsar, emperor of Rome, and afterwards taken off by Pompey's faction; as is his son Alexander by Scipio. Antipater cultivates the friendship of Cæsar, and performs many heroic actions.

UPON the sudden flight of Pompey, and the Roman senate, beyond the Ionian sea, Julius Cæsar was left in the sole possession of the empire, and immediately released Aristobulus from his bonds. He then dispatched him with two legions into Syria; taking it for granted, that the country would submit on the appearance of the Roman soldiery upon their borders. But the expectation of the emperor, and the confidence of Aristobulus, were both disappointed, the latter being soon poisoned by some of Pompey's faction. The body was embalmed, and lay some time uninterred, till Anthony caused it to be transported to Judæa, and there deposited in the royal sepulchre. Nor did Alexander, his son, long survive his father; for he was beheaded by Scipio, at Antioch, according to the direction of Pompey, upon an accusation exhibited against him before his tribunal, for seditious practices against the Romans. But Ptolemy, the son of Menneus, and prince of Chalcis, upon mount Libanus, sent his son Philippion to Ascalon, to the widow of Aristobulus, in order to bring with him his son Antigonus, and his daughters. Philippion became enamoured of the younger, whose name was Alexandra, and took her to wife, for which his father caused him to be slain, and afterwards married her himself. This alliance greatly attached him to her brother Antigonus, and her sister.

On the demise of Pompey, Antipater changed his system of politics, and made court to Cæsar: and Mithridates, of Pergamus, finding a stop put to his expedition into Egypt, by prohibiting his forces a passage through the avenues about Pelusium, he halted with his army at Ascalon, and not only prevailed with the Arabians for assistance, though a stranger, but raised, upon his own account, three thousand well armed Jews. He brought also several of the leading men of Syria into the party, as Ptolemy of Libanus, Jamblicus, and another Ptolemy; so that men of their reputation and interest induced the whole country to engage in this war. Mithridates finding himself, through the help of Antipater, in a condition to enter upon action, marched forwards to Pelusium, and, upon the inhabitants opposing his passage, laid siege to the city. Antipater added to the honour he had acquired by his intrepid behaviour in this encounter; for he was the first man that mounted the breach, and entered the town with his people after him.

Antipater assists Mithridates, and takes Pelusium.

Thus was Pelusium taken: but the Egyptian Jews, of the province of Onias, stopped their further progress. Antipater, however, prevailed with them not only to offer no hostilities, but to furnish provisions for the army. This example wrought so far upon the people of Memphis, that, of their own accord, they delivered themselves up to Mithridates. Upon this he went on to Delta, and engaged the rest of the Egyptians at a place called "The camp of the Jews," where Mithridates, and the whole right wing, were in extreme danger of being totally cut off; but Antipater having already broken the enemy's other wing, wheeled about, passed the back of the river, and came up so seasonably to the rescue of Mithridates, that he turned upon his pursuers, slew many of them, and followed the remainder to their camp, which he plundered, and all this with the loss of only fourscore men on his side. Mithridates lost in the pursuit about eight hundred men. He escaped with his life beyond all expectation, and became an irreproachable witness to the Roman emperor of the gallant exploits of Antipater. Cæsar was so frank and generous in his professions and acknowledgments to this great man, that he became more and more zealous and ambitious, upon every occasion, to lay down his life for so illustrious a master. He needed no other proofs of his fidelity and courage than the honourable marks he wore on his body. When Cæsar had settled the affairs of Egypt, and returned into Syria, he gave Antipater the privilege of a citizen of Rome, and rendered him at once an object of admiration and envy, by the singular tokens of respect and esteem he conferred upon him. On his account he confirmed Hyrcanus in the dignified office of high-priest.

CHAPTER VIII.

Antigonus addresses himself to Cæsar, and, contrary to design, promotes the interest of Antipater. Cæsar appoints Hyrcanus to the pontificate, and Antipater to the government of Judæa. Antipater prefers his sons Phasael and Herod. Herod is cited to appear before the council, and acquitted of the charge exhibited against him. He is declared general in Syria and Samaria. Sextus Cæsar is taken off by the treachery of Bassus, and succeeded by Marcus.

ABOUT this time Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, addressed himself to Cæsar, and became, very contrary to his design, the means of the advancement of Antipater. He seems to have been actuated by a desire of pouring forth the most extravagant travagant invectives against Hyrcanus and Antipater, as having expelled him and his brethren from their native country, and oppressed the public to gratify their own ambition and caprice. He also represented, that the assistance they sent to Cæsar in Egypt, was from a motive of fear rather than goodwill, hoping to atone, in some measure, for the services they had formerly rendered to Pompey. Now if he had adhered to matter of fact, he would have imputed the death of his father to the instrumentality of Pompey's faction, and complained of Scipio's barbarity towards his brother.

Antipater vindicates himself.

Antipater, to obviate effectually these reproaches, threw aside some parts of his garment, and exposed his wounds as a testimony of his loyalty to Cæsar, enforced by remarking, "that he could not but wonder at the confidence of Antigonus, the son of an enemy to the Romans, a fugitive, and, like his father, a seditious incendiary, in exhibiting accusations to Cæsar against the most faithful and dutiful of his subjects, and insisting upon pretensions to merit of which he was wholly devoid; and that his desire in obtaining power, was to employ it in opposing the will of his benefactor."

Hyrcanus made high-priest.

Cæsar was so wrought upon by this manly conduct, that he declared Hyrcanus well qualified for the office of high-priest, and gave Antipater the liberty of nominating his commission. As he referred this matter to the good pleasure of his master, the emperor constituted him governor of Judæa, with the additional favour of permission to repair the walls of his country. These honorary grants Cæsar ordered to be engraved on brass, and the table hung up in the capitol, as a memorial of the deserts of Antipater, and his own justice.

Antipater governor of Judæa.

He repairs the walls of Jerusalem, and pacifies the tumults.

When Antipater had conducted the emperor to the borders of Syria, he returned to Judæa, where the first thing he did was to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, that Pompey had caused to be overthrown. He then made a tour through the province to prevent disorders, and keep the peace; giving the people to understand, that, if they behaved with due reverence towards Hyrcanus, they should live in plenty and happiness; but if they should prove retrograde, and desirous of advancing themselves by the ruin of their country, they would find Antipater, instead of a gentle governor, a rigid master; and Hyrcanus a cruel tyrant, instead of a gracious prince.

Prefers his sons Phasaël and Herod.

Herod quells the robbers of Syria.

Notwithstanding this apparent deference paid to Hyrcanus, Antipater took upon him to settle the state of the province, and supply the defect and incapacity of the other for political administration. He gave to Phasaël, his eldest son, the government of Jerusalem, and the provinces adjacent: to Herod, his second son, that of Galilee, with the same power. Herod, being naturally bold and active, soon found honourable occasion for the display of his genius. Syria was greatly infested with bands of robbers, till he took Hezekias, the leader of them, and caused him to be put to death, with several of his followers. This exploit was so acceptable a service to the Syrians, that the towns and villages resounded with acclamations to the honour of Herod as the restorer of their liberties and possessions. It also made him known to Sextus Cæsar, the kinsman of Cæsar the Great, who was then governor of Syria. The fame of this achievement inspired Phasaël with a generous emulation to excel his brother, and to gain more and more upon the hearts of the people of Jerusalem, where he exercised his power with such moderation and justice, as to produce universal satisfaction. The wise conduct of this administration inspired the people with as great a reverence for Antipater, as if he had been their absolute sovereign; and he behaved himself, at the same time, with the profoundest respect towards Hyrcanus.

Antipater in great esteem.

Afterwards exiled.

But as the human mind is too susceptible of envy, we find, upon this occasion, a notorious instance of it in Hyrcanus. The renown these young governors had acquired in their respective provinces, and the daily informations he received of the exploits of Herod in particular, raised this ignoble passion in the heart of Hyrcanus. There were not wanting, as in all palaces, adulating sycophants, to undermine the sons of Antipater, through a jealousy of the fame they had obtained with the people. They suggested this end, that it was derogatory to the dignity of Hyrcanus, that the administration of government should be divided betwixt Antipater and his sons, while he held but an empty name; that it was absurd in him to set up kings in opposition to himself; and that they disclaimed his authority in their general conduct; but more especially in the instance of Herod's causing so many to be put to death, in direct violation of the Jewish law, and without any mandate from him. In short, they demanded if Herod was a private man or a king; referring, that if he was only the former, he was amenable to the king himself, and to the laws of his country, for the murder of so many innocent persons.

Hyrcanus was gradually incensed by these insinuations to so violent a pitch, that he commanded the proper officers to summon Herod to make his appearance for trial. Herod, conscious of his innocence, with the advice of his father, secured his garison in Galilee, and repaired to Jerusalem, taking with him only a competent guard for the security of his person, without any design of offering an affront to Hyrcanus. Sextus Cæsar, however, anxious for his safety, sent a peremptory requisition to him to acquit Herod of the charge alledged against him. Hyrcanus seemed disposed to compliance; but Herod, too cautious to depend upon fair words, went to Sextus at Damascus, with a resolution not to attend to a second summons. The court sycophants renewed their application to Hyrcanus, and represented the abrupt departure of Herod as indicating a design of some desperate attempt. Though Hyrcanus credulously admitted of their intimation, he remained undetermined as to the steps he should pursue, apprehending the enemy too powerful for him, till Sextus declaring Herod general of all his troops in Syria and Samaria, it struck such a terror into Hyrcanus, from a consideration of his own strength, and the affections of the people, that he conceived him marching at the head of an army against him.

Nor was he mistaken in his conjecture; for Herod, from a transport of indignation at finding himself treated as a criminal, collected a body of forces, and marched towards Jerusalem, with a full determination to depose Hyrcanus from the government, which he had certainly done, if his father and brother had not stopped the violence of his passion. They advised him to carry his revenge no farther than threatening, and to spare the prince under whose patronage he had been advanced to his present dignity. They reminded him, that, though he might have been arraigned, yet, as he was acquitted, it was but setting the conservation of his life against the hazard of it; and that if the Almighty was the author of success in war, an unjust cause would meet with a deserved fate; and that therefore he should not be too presuming nor confident in his attempt upon a prince who had been his supporter and benefactor, and would never have treated him with rigour, had he not been misled by calumny and evil counsel. Herod was prevailed on by these arguments, and contented himself with giving the nation this proof of his great power and interest.

In the mean time the Romans fell into a civil war near Apamia. It was occasioned by the treacherous murder of Sextus Cæsar, by Cecilius Bassus, which he perpetrated out of his good-will to Pompey, and then assumed his command. The officers of Julius Cæsar, in revenge for the death of Sextus, fell with their utmost force upon Bassus. Antipater also sent his sons to join them with succours, from a regard to the character of the living, and the memory of the deceased, Cæsar. The war was protracted to a considerable space of time, and Marcus was ordered out of Italy to succeed Sextus Cæsar in the government of Syria.

C H A P.

C H A P. IX.

The murder of Julius Cæsar in the capitol entails horrible factions. Cassius an intolerable oppressor. Herod ingratiates himself with him. Malichus plots against Antipater. Augustus Cæsar and Anthony wage war with Brutus and Cassius. Herod made governor of Syria. Antipater is taken off by the treachery of Malichus, who is put to death at the instance of Herod.

THERE fell out, at this time, a more desperate war amongst the Romans than the former. The murder of Julius Cæsar, in the third year and seventh month of his reign, by the treachery of Brutus and Cassius, was followed by destructive factions in divers parts of the empire. The great men were divided into parties, each individual acting as his humour or interest led him, without any regard to the public good. Cassius proceeded to Syria, to possess himself of the forces that were then before Apamia, where he effected a reconciliation between Marcus and Bassus, and the raising of the siege of Apamia at the same time. He laid the cities under excessive contributions, and imposed a tax of seven hundred talents upon the Jews, which Antipater provided for in time, by an equal distribution of the charge, appointing his sons, friends, and Malichus, though his professed enemy, to take a seasonable care of the levy. The first that wrought himself into the good graces of Cassius was Herod, who presented him with an hundred talents for the quota of Galilee, and for that very important cause was ranked amongst his friends. But Cassius resented the delay of others in bringing in their proportions to such a degree, that he razed Gophna, Thamna, and two other places of less note, to the ground; and when this was done, formed a resolution of cutting off Malichus for being so dilatory in exacting his tribute. But Antipater prevented his death, and the destruction of several cities, as well as conciliated the esteem of Cassius, by bringing in an hundred talents in due time.

Cassius, however, had no sooner taken his departure, than Malichus, dead to every sense of gratitude and moral obligation, entered into a plot upon the life of the very man whom he had so often acknowledged as his friend, and whom he determined to remove as an obstacle to his wicked practices. Antipater, persuaded of his power and art, beheld him with a cautious eye, and therefore passed the Jordan, in order to raise forces to guard himself against his treacherous designs. Malichus, finding himself suspected, had recourse to delusive arts with the sons of Antipater, and plied both Phasael and Herod so effectually with excuses, oaths, and protestations, of his plain dealing and integrity, that he engaged them in a mediation with the father for a reconciliation; and by the same means made peace with Marcus, governor of Syria, who had determined to put him to death as a mutineer.

Augustus Cæsar and Anthony, being now at war with Brutus and Cassius, the latter having had convincing proofs of the bravery of Herod, appointed him governor of the whole province of Syria, with a considerable guard of horse and foot: nay, Cassius went so far as to promise him the kingdom of the Jews at the end of the war. But it so happened, that the hope and bravery of the son was the cause of the destruction of the father; for Malichus held him in such dread, that he bribed one of the cup-bearers of Hyrcanus to intermix poison with his drink, by which means he lost his life at a banquet. Thus was this great man requited for the favours he conferred on the most ungrateful of wretches. He was a man of singular prudence and prowess, to which Hyrcanus might be said to be indebted for his kingdom. The people were so enraged at Malichus, from a suspicion of this execrable practice, that they were ready to sacrifice him to their resentment. But, upon his renouncing and adjuring any knowledge of the matter, they suspended their purpose; and Malichus, in the mean time, by way of prevention, put himself into a posture of defence, as it could not be expected that Herod would suffer so atrocious a murder to pass unrevenged. He knew Herod was absolutely for taking his revenge at the head of an army; but his brother Phasael dissuaded him by all means from that resolution, for fear a tumult should ensue. The brothers, upon this, gave him a hearing, with a semblance of allowing his defence, and a countenance as if they thought him innocent, and then proceeded to the funeral obsequies of their father, which were very sumptuous and magnificent.

Samaria being at this time rent with factions, Herod went thither to appease them, but returned, upon all solemn days, to keep his festival at Jerusalem, being attended, at his going and coming, by his guards. Hereupon Hyrcanus, at the request of Malichus, who feared his approach, forbade the introduction of foreigners to mix themselves with the people of the country, while they were exercising the rules of their holy profession. But Herod, in contempt both of the cause itself, and of the authority that issued the command, entered the city by night. Upon this Malichus came to him, and, with tears, bewailed the loss of Antipater. Herod, on the other hand, dissembled his rage and indignation. But, at the same time, he wrote to Cassius for justice upon Malichus, for the murder of his father. This was easily obtained, as the traitor was odious to Cassius; so that he left Herod to take due course of law, and sent private orders to his tribunes to give him assistance as occasion might require.

Disimulation of Malichus and Herod.

Laodicea being lately taken, persons of rank resorted from all parts to Herod, with congratulations and presents. This, therefore, he looked upon as the fairest opportunity for the execution of his purpose: but Malichus, suspecting his design, laid a plan to evade it, by getting away his son from Tyre, who was an hostage there, and conveying him privately to Judæa. Fearing this plan might fail, he concerted a greater exploit. This was to set the whole nation of the Jews against the Romans, while Cassius was fully engaged in the war with Anthony. By this means he flattered himself he could effect the deposition of Hyrcanus, and the acquisition of the government to himself. But fate had otherwise determined it; for Herod, suspecting a mischievous design, invited Malichus and Hyrcanus to an entertainment, and sending a servant out, under pretence of making preparations, gave him private instructions for the tribunes to attend, and execute the plan concerted between him and Cassius. The tribunes accordingly marched out with their swords towards the sea side, where they met Malichus, surrounded him, and cut him to pieces. Hyrcanus was so alarmed at this incident, that he fell down in a swoon, from which, as soon as he recovered, he enquired of Herod who it was that killed Malichus? One of the tribunes replied, that it was done by order of Cassius. Hyrcanus then rejoined, that Cassius had saved both him and his country at once, in the destruction of a tyrant so dangerous to both. Whether Hyrcanus spoke the sentiments of his mind cannot be determined; but this was the revenge of Herod, and the end of Malichus.

his assistance, for he defeated Felix with his own troops, and took an opportunity of reproaching Hyrcanus for his ingratitude, in affording aid to Felix, and putting several strong castles into the hands of the brother of Malichus, and amongst the rest Massada, one of the best fortified places in that country. But this availed them little against the power of Herod, who no sooner recovered from his indisposition, than he re-took all he had lost, and brought Hyrcanus to submission, even in Massada itself. He drove Marion, king of Tyre, out of Galilee, and recovered three castles of which he had possessed himself. He not only spared, however, the lives of those Tyrians whom he took, but gratified many of them with donations, thereby attaching them to himself, and rendering them inimical to Marion. This Marion was a fit instrument for Cassius, who had let so many tyrants over Syria. It was from his aversion to Herod, that he assisted Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, and Fabius also, who was the hireling of Antigonus; but Ptolemy, the kinsman of Antigonus, supplied them all with necessaries.

Herod made every necessary preparation for the encounter, which soon took place on the borders of Judæa, and was decided in his favour; so that having totally defeated Antigonus, he returned to Jerusalem, and was received with every token of honour and respect, even by those who had despised him before; but this was from a particular regard to his family alliance with Hyrcanus. Herod had formerly married a woman of his own country, who was of noble extraction, and called Doris, by whom he had his son Antipater. He afterwards took to wife Mariamne, the daughter of Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, and of Alexandra, the daughter of Hyrcanus.

Upon Cæsar's coming into Italy, and Anthony into Asia, after the death of Cassius, at the battle of Philippi, ambassadors were dispatched from several places to Anthony in Bithynia, whither the chiefs of the Jews were repaired also, with complaints against Phasael and Herod, for usurping arbitrary power to themselves, and allowing Hyrcanus merely the name of sovereignty. Herod appeared ready to answer this accusation; but had so effectually ingratiated himself with Anthony, by dint of presents, that the plaintiffs were dismissed without an hearing.

Anthony being some time after this at Daphne, in the suburbs of Antioch, (about the beginning of his intrigue with Cleopatra,) there came an hundred of the principal men among the Jews to prefer their complaints to him against the brothers. They selected their best orators for the purpose of advancing their plea. Messala undertook the cause of the brothers, and was seconded by Hyrcanus, upon the score of alliance. When Anthony had heard the allegations of both parties, he demanded of Hyrcanus, whom he esteemed the fittest man for the administration of government? Hyrcanus replied, that he knew of none so compatible as the two brothers. Anthony was highly gratified at this declaration, having been greatly obliged to Antipater of old, for a generous reception and entertainment upon his coming into Judæa with Gabinius. So he pronounced them both tetrarchs of Judæa, and committed the whole administration to their conduct. The deputies were so disgusted at this proceeding, that, for their behaviour, he committed fifteen of the hundred to prison, and they escaped narrowly with their lives: the rest he reprimanded, and then dismissed them. This served to inflame the mutineers at Jerusalem to a greater degree, so that, instead of an hundred, they sent a thousand deputies to Anthony at Tyre, who was at that time preparing to fall upon Jerusalem. They were to clamorous, that the magistrates of Tyre were ordered to disperse them; and, in case of resistance, to put all to death whom they took; Anthony giving them further charge to maintain the authority of the tetrarchs whom he had set up. Herod and Hyrcanus being informed of this disaster, went up towards the sea-shore, and advised the ambassadors to use the utmost caution, lest they should bring ruin upon themselves, and involve their native country in a war by their rash contentions. But as they grew outrageous, Anthony was under necessity of sending out armed men, who slew and wounded great numbers of them. Hyrcanus, however, took care of the wounded, and provided for the burial of the dead. This had no effect upon those that escaped, for they continued their tumults, till they provoked Anthony to such a degree, that he ordered all his prisoners to be put to death.

Passes to Brundisium, and thence to Rome. Generosity of Augustus and Anthony to Herod. Herod declared in the senate king of the Jews.

ABOUT two years after this time, when Barzapharnes, a noble Parthian, held the government of Syria, with Pacorus, the king's son, Lysanias, the successor of Ptolemy, the son of Mennæus, entered into an agreement, and confirmed it by articles, to deliver up to them a thousand talents, and five hundred women, upon the dethroning of Hyrcanus, and setting up Antigonus in his place. They immediately proceeded to the execution of the project. Pacorus took the way of the sea-coast, and Barzapharnes marched over the midland. Ptolemais and Sidon opened their gates to Pacorus, but the Tyrians absolutely refused him entrance. He sent before him a party of horse into Judæa, under the command of Pacorus, one of the king's cupbearers, (an officer of his own name,) with instructions to attend to the enemy's motions, and to assist Antigonus, if occasion might require.

The Jews of Mount Carmel spontaneously offered their services to Antigonus, who directed them to advance, and possess themselves of that quarter of the country they call Dryma. An action ensued, in which the party of Antigonus prevailed; and when the enemy was routed and dispersed, their numbers increasing, they marched at once to Jerusalem, where Hyrcanus and Phasael made a very brave resistance, and, after a smart contest in the market-place, forced them to retire into the temple. Herod, upon this, placed a guard of sixty men over the adjoining houses; but the people set fire to them from the aversion they had to the two brothers. These practices transported Herod to such a degree of indignation, that he fell upon the enemy, and cut off great numbers of them; nor did a day pass without slaughter.

The feast of Pentecost being now at hand, the city, upon that occasion, being crowded up to the very temple, and many of the multitude coming under arms, Phasael took charge of the walls, and Herod, with a small party, of the palace. The latter made so unexpected a sally into the suburbs, that he killed several, and dispersed the whole multitude. Some fled into the city, others into the temple, while others sheltered themselves behind the ramparts.

When things were brought to this pass, Antigonus proposed a treaty of peace, and nominated Pacorus as the arbitrator. Phasael acquiesced, and admitted the Parthians with 500 horse into the city. His pretence was to compose the mutiny; but his real intention was to assist Antigonus. This perfidious wretch prevailed afterwards with Phasael to send an embassy to Barzapharnes upon the same subject. This was very contrary to the opinion of Herod, rod, who advised Phasaël to use the utmost caution in trusting him, as perfidy was the characteristic of a barbarian. Pacorus, however, went out, and took Hyrcanus with him, that he might be less suspected. He also left with Herod some of the horse-men which they called freemen, and conducted Phasaël with the rest.

When they came to Galilee, they found the people of that country had revolted, and were in arms; but the governors, however, came out to meet them. Barzapharnes had the art to disguise his intention with the external civilities of compliments and presents; but as soon as they were departed, had an ambush in readiness to surprize them on their return. They were conducted to a place near the sea, called Bedipon, where they were informed of the particulars of the plot; that a thousand talents, and five hundred women, were to be delivered to the Parthians, upon their betraying Hyrcanus and Phasaël. They were further informed, that the plan would not have been deferred so long, but that they waited for Herod's coming up to Jerusalem, lest it should take air, and be frustrated.

Ophelius was the man to whom Saramalla (a Syrian of great opulence) had communicated the particulars of the whole design. Ophelius importuned Phasaël to provide for his safety; but he determined, at all events, not to abandon Hyrcanus, and therefore went up to the Parthian general, and reproached him to his face, for entering into this treacherous design against him, from mercenary, the meanest of all, motives; telling him, that if money was his object, he could give him more for his life than Antigonus had promised him for the kingdom. The subtle Parthian endeavoured to remove the suspicion by prevarication and oaths, and then went immediately to Pacorus. But no sooner had he departed, than Phasaël and Hyrcanus were taken into custody by the Parthians who were left behind, according to their order, and had only the liberty of exclaiming against so horrid a perjury.

The Parthian, in the mean time, was instructed to attempt to delude Herod out of the town, and seize upon him. He made the effort; but Herod was so well acquainted with the treacherous practices of those barbarians, that he would not venture out of the city. He did not doubt but that Phasaël had sent him information of the plot, though the Parthians might have intercepted the letters. Pacorus, however, could not draw him out by the most plausible pretences he could use, and the strongest assurances of his personal security; for he still kept upon his guard, having heard that his brother Phasaël was apprehended: besides, Mariamne, a woman of great sagacity, enjoined him by no means to go forth, nor expose himself to the manifest designs of those barbarians.

Pacorus finding it impossible to circumvent a man of Herod's prudence and penetration by open attack, began to deliberate how they might bring their plot to bear privately. But Herod, while this was in agitation, made his escape, with some of his nearest relations, by night, towards Idumæa. The Parthians no sooner received intelligence of his departure, than they pursued him; upon which he sent his mother, brother, Mariamne, (to whom he was contracted,) and his younger brother, before him; whilst he himself, with his party, made a stand against the barbarians, and overcoming them in several encounters, retired, at last, to the castle of Massada. The Jews pressed him more in his flight than the Parthians, attacking him sixty furlongs from Jerusalem, so that at length a regular engagement ensued. Herod obtained the victory, slew great numbers; and, to perpetuate the honour of the action, erected a magnificent palace upon the spot, with a strong castle, which he called Herodium, after his own name.

As great numbers repaired to his standard in his retreat, his brother Joseph, when he came to Threffa, in Idumæa, advised him, by all means, to lessen his train, which amounting, according to computation, to upwards of three thousand men, the castle of Massada could not contain them. Herod attended to his counsel, and dismissed the most cumbersome part of his retinue, disposing of his kindred, and the best disciplined of his followers, in the respective departments of the castle, with an extra body of 800 men for the protection of the women, and provisions sufficient to hold out a siege, if occasion should require. Having thus arranged matters, he went forward to Petra, in Arabia.

The Parthians at Jerusalem were wholly intent upon plunder, breaking into the houses of those who were absent, and rifling the royal palace itself, sparing nothing but the treasure of Hyrcanus, which did not amount to more than three hundred talents; though they possessed themselves of the riches of others, but not equal to expectation; for Herod, from a suspicion of the perfidy of the barbarians, had taken care to convey what was most precious to Idumæa; and his companions had followed his example. But the Parthians, not content with the spoil of the city, infested the adjacent country with a bloody and implacable war. They laid waste the city of Marissa; and not only constituted Antigonus king, but delivered up Phasaël and Hyrcanus bound into his hands. Such was the cruelty of Antigonus, that he tore off the ears of Hyrcanus with his teeth, to render him incapable of the pontificate, as no maimed person was eligible to that sacred function. Phasaël, however, frustrated his inhuman designs; for having neither command of his sword or his hands, he prevented all further abuses by dashing out his brains against a stone, demonstrating thereby his alliance to Herod; while Hyrcanus had given proof of degeneracy. He died like a man of honour, and his end was suitable to the glory of his life. It is reported that he survived that violence upon himself, and that a physician was sent him from Antigonus, who poisoned the wound, and so dispatched him. There prevails another report, that, being told by a woman, a little before his death, that Herod had made his escape, he exclaimed, "I shall now die in peace, as I shall leave behind me a friend to avenge my wrongs." But we do not contend for the authenticity of either of these reports.

This was the end of Phasaël; and the Parthians, though they were disappointed in the promise of the women, put the government of Jerusalem into the hands of Antigonus, and sent Hyrcanus bound into Parthia. Herod was not yet made acquainted with the death of Phasaël; so that concluding, from his knowledge of the avaricious disposition of the barbarians, that a sum of money would be the only means of his redemption, he determined upon a journey into Arabia, in hopes of supplying himself from the king upon that occasion, either as a bounty upon the score of an old friendship betwixt him and Antipater, or a loan upon the security of the pledge of his nephew, the son of Phasaël, a youth of seven years of age, whom he proposed to take with him for that purpose. The sum he intended to give was three hundred talents, and the Tyrians were to intercede to procure his request.

But fate unhappily prevented the execution of his generous design in the death of Phasaël. Nor could he trust himself among the Arabians; for Malichus, their king, ordered him to depart immediately out of his territories, pretending that the Parthians had demanded, by their ambassadors, that Herod might be driven out of Arabia; though the real motive was to withhold what was due to Antipater, and to avoid the obligation of making a requital to the son for the bounty of the father. He was, indeed, persuaded to act thus illiberally by those about him, who were destitute both of faith and honour.

When Herod found that the Arabians were his enemies, and for the very cause which he imagined would have conciliated their friendship, he dispatched the messengers with each an answer, as was suggested by the impetuosity of his passion, and then proceeded to Egypt. He came in the evening to a certain temple, where he had left several of his companions in his passage. The next day he arrived at Rinucolora, where he received the first news of the death death of his brother. The surprize, no doubt, affected him; but when he had given vent to the feelings of natural affection, and discharged his last duty to his brother, he proceeded on his journey.

The king of Arabia soon repented of what he had done, and dispatched messengers to prevail on him to return. But it was now too late, as he had advanced as far as Pelusium, where the officers stopped his progress, till, upon application to the magistrates, he was permitted to pass on, from the respect they had for his character. He embarked for Alexandria, whither, upon his arrival, he was received by Cleopatra with all pomp and splendor, hoping that he might be prevailed upon to accept the command of an army which she was then raising for some important design. But Herod was so intent upon his voyage to Rome, that neither the entreaty of the queen, the rigour of the season, nor the hazard of the seas, could divert him from the prosecution of it. Putting therefore to sea, and taking his course by the way of Pamphylia, there arose so violent a tempest, that the mariners were under a necessity of casting the goods overboard to save the vessel. At length, with great difficulty, they got safe to Rhodes, where he found things in great disorder, on account of the war with Cassius. He was there received by two friends, Ptolemy and Saphinius, and, notwithstanding his then want of money, found means to provide himself a stout vessel, which conveyed him and his friends to Brundisium, and thence to Rome. Upon his arrival, he paid his court to Anthony, between whom and his father Antipater an ancient friendship had subsisted, and revealed to him the adventures and misfortunes of his family, particularly that of his relations, being then shut up in the castle of Massada, which induced him to hazard a voyage, in the most rigorous part of the season, to wait upon him, and implore his protection.

Anthony was so affected by compassion for his distress, and tender regard for the memory of his father, together with the due sense he entertained of his own personal merit, that he determined to have him declared king of the Jews, as he had made him tetrarch before. To this he was moved, not only from respect to Herod, but aversion to Antigonus, whom he looked upon as of a turbulent, seditious spirit, and inimical to the Romans. Augustus was, if possible, more attached to Herod than Anthony; nor was any thing more pleasing to him than to enter into a detail of Antipater's services in Egypt, the hardships they had there encountered together, and the mutual friendship they had long enjoyed.

Upon this an assembly of the senate was called, where Messala, and after him Atratinus, (Herod being present,) enlarged upon the merits of Antipater, and his fidelity to the people of Rome, holding forth Antigonus, at the same time, as a public enemy, not only from his defection, but receiving a crown from the hands of the Parthians, in contempt of the sovereignty of the empire. The senate were so wrought upon by these representations, that they gave their voices unanimously for Herod to be king of the Jews, which was enforced by Anthony, who pointed out the advantages that would accrue from it in the conduct of the Parthian war. When the senate rose, Cæsar and Anthony went out, preceded by the consuls and other magistrates, to give orders for sacrifice, and the depositing the decree of the senate in the capitol. Anthony also made a splendid entertainment for Herod on the first day of his reign.

DURING this time Antigonus besieged the castle of Massada, where the family and friends of Herod suffered much thro' an extreme drought, insomuch that Joseph, his brother, understanding that Malichus, king of Arabia, had repented of the injuries he had done to Herod, took a resolution to leave the castle by night, with two hundred chosen friends, and apply to the Arabians for succour. But at the very precise time that they were about to make the sally, there fell so copious a shower of rain, that their pits, cisterns, and other vessels were all replenished, which obviated the necessity of carrying their design into execution. After this seasonable relief, the garrison made several resolute sallies, and, between surprize and open force, did considerable execution upon the enemy, though they frequently met with severe repulses.

In the mean time Ventidius, one of the Roman generals, being sent to restrain the incursions of the Parthians into Syria, entered Judæa, under colour of a design to relieve Massada, but in reality to seize upon the treasure of Antigonus. When he had accomplished his purpose at Jerusalem, he withdrew, with the greatest part of the army, but left Silo, with a small body, behind him, in order to countenance his pretence; for if he had taken with him all the forces, his motive to enrich himself would have been too evident. Antigonus, however, maintained a good understanding with Silo, hoping that the Parthians would come again to his assistance.

Herod, having now sailed out of Italy to Ptolemais, raised a considerable army, both of his own nation and strangers, and then marched through Galilee towards Antigonus, with the assistance of Ventidius and Silo, who were prevailed upon, by the solicitation of Dellius, at the instance of Anthony, to aid Herod in obtaining the possession of his kingdom. Ventidius was then intent on quieting the tumults which the Parthians had raised in divers cities, while Silo was corrupted by the bribes of Antigonus in Judæa. Herod, however, was not destitute of forces, as numbers repaired to his standard every day during his march, and the greatest part of Galilee came over to his interest. The principal object of his attention was the raising the siege of Massada, to set his kindred and friends at liberty; and Joppa was the first obstacle to be removed, as they could make no attempt upon Jerusalem with that enemy so near at hand. Silo took this opportunity to withdraw, and the Jews of the party of Antigonus pursuing him, Herod, with an handful of men, engaged, defeated them, and brought off Silo, after a very faint resistance.

After this Herod took Joppa; and then hastened, with all expedition, to set free his kindred and friends, that had been shut up a considerable time in the castle of Massada. The inhabitants of the country seemed in general disposed to join him; some for the sake of his father, others for his own sake, and others for their obligations to both; but the greater part were actuated by the hopes of honour and reward. Herod was by this time at the head of a considerable army; but Antigonus used his utmost endeavours to obstruct his passage, by planting ambushes in his way, though with little or no damage to the adverse party. He found, upon the whole, a great difficulty in raising the siege, and removing his friends and effects out of the castle. From thence he advanced to Jerusalem, where many of Silo's men, and of the inhabitants, came over to him, awed by his increasing power.

He pitched his camp upon the west side of the town, where the enemy galled him with showers of darts and arrows, and the defendants made divers vigorous sallies. As a prelude to his design, he caused a proclamation to be issued in form by an herald, round the walls of the city, setting forth that he had only in view, by his expedition, to promote the common good of the people, and the safety of the place; with an offer of burying in oblivion the efforts of all his enemies, of every rank and degree, without exception. Antigonus, on the other hand, did all he could, with noise and harangue, to keep his people from hearing the conditions of the declaration, or being moved by the force of it, and at length commanded them to fall on; upon which the assailants were repulsed from the tower, and forced to a retreat. The corruption of Silo was now evident beyond a doubt, from the clamours of the soldiers that he had suborned to put all in a flame. They exclaimed that they were lost for want of necessities, as well as convenient winter quarters, through means of the army of Antigonus, that had carried every thing off. By these means the people were stirred up to a revolt, and Silo would have accompanied them in their retreat. This attempt threatened so much danger, that Herod was under the necessity of applying not only to Silo's officers, but to the common soldiers, representing to them the mischiefs that must inevitably ensue if they deserted him, and requesting that, as he had the commission of Cæsar, Anthony, and the senate, for what he did, they would stand by him one day longer, and all their wants should be supplied. Upon this assurance Herod went himself to give orders for the provisions, and forthwith sent them so abundant a supply, that all Silo's pretences were obviated; and to secure them a future competence, he wrote to Samaria, which was then under his protection, to send him all sorts of provisions to Jericho, such as corn, wine, oil, cattle, and every other necessary article. When Antigonus had intelligence of this, he dispersed his troops abroad, and laid ambushes to intercept the convoys. They obeyed their orders, so that a considerable army was posted near Jericho, and parties placed up and down the mountains to obstruct any kind of relief.

Herod, in the mean time, with his usual activity, advanced with ten companies, half Romans, half Jews, and a small body of horse, to Jericho, where he found the city totally abandoned; but five hundred men, with their wives and children, had taken possession of the summits of the mountains. These he took, and then dismissed them. The town contained abundance of valuable plunder, which the Romans carried away; and Herod leaving a garrison in the place, returned, and assigned the Roman troops their winter-quarters in the cities that came over to him, as Idumæa, Galilee, and Samaria. Antigonus also, by bribing Silo, had part of his army quartered in Lydda, to stand fair in the opinion of Anthony.

The Romans now lived in the full enjoyment of peace and plenty: but Herod, whose active spirit could not rest, sent his brother Joseph, with 400 horse, and 2000 foot, to fortify Idumæa, lest Antigonus should enter upon any new device, while he went with his kindred, whom he had rescued at Massada, to Samaria. When he had settled them securely, he advanced into Galilee, to reduce certain garrisons possessed in that province by Antigonus. He came up to Sepphoris in a deep snow, and took the place without any difficulty; for the garrison quitted it without making any resistance. When he had given his men time to refresh themselves after the fatigue of the winter, there being in that city abundance of necessities, he turned his arms against the free-booters that sheltered themselves in caves, and, by sallies and incursions, annoyed the inhabitants more than an open and professed enemy in the course of war. He sent three companies of foot, and a troop of horse, before him to Arbela, and followed them himself forty days after with the rest of his army. The free-booters were not in the least alarmed at this incursion, but, on the contrary, advanced against them in a body, confident of the conduct and courage of their leader. When it came to a pitched battle, they put to flight Herod's left wing; but Herod wheeling upon them immediately with his right, not only stopt the flight of his own men, but brought them on again with such fury, that the robbers, not being able to stand before them, were pursued as far as the Jordan, many of them cut off, and the rest got over the river. Thus was Galilee delivered from these ravagers, except some stragglers, that kept still in their fastnesses, which occasioned Herod to prolong his stay in the country.

After this exploit, as the first fruits of his soldiers' services, he gave to every man an hundred and fifty drachmæ, and to the officers so much more in proportion, and then dismissed them to their winter quarters. He gave it in charge to his younger brother, Pheroras, to superintend the supply of provisions, and the raising of a wall about the castle of Alexandrion, which was accordingly performed with the utmost punctuality.

In the mean time Anthony took up his residence at Athens; while Ventidius sent to Silo and Herod to join him in the war against the Parthians; but instructed them first to settle the affairs of Judæa. Herod willingly dismissed Silo to go to Ventidius; but went himself in quest of the robbers that lurked in the caves. These dens or caverns were in the crags of the rocks, hardly accessible on any side, but by narrow turnings and windings, and a direct precipice from top to bottom. As it appeared, from the situation of the place, that the attempt would be attended with the utmost difficulty, the king hesitated for some time; but at length hit upon a bold and desperate experiment. There were strong chests, with soldiers in them, let down with ropes from the top of the mountain to the mouth of the entrance into the caves. These soldiers destroyed the robbers in their holes, some with their arms, and others, that resisted, with fire. As Herod was desirous of saving some of them, he had proclamations made that they should surrender themselves; but not one of them came spontaneously; and many, that were compelled, preferred death to captivity.

There was a very remarkable instance of the resolution of an old man, the father of seven sons. His wife and children entreating him to suffer them to go out, and surrender themselves, according to the tenour of the proclamation, he commanded them to come forth one after another, and as they respectively appeared, put them to death. This spectacle struck Herod with compassion, so that he entreated him, by signs, to spare his children. But neither words or actions could prevail with him; for he maintained his resolution, killed the children first, and then the mother, casting their dead bodies down a precipice, and himself at last, and reproached Herod with the meanness of his spirit.

When Herod had exterminated these robbers, he left only such a force behind him as he judged necessary to preserve the public tranquillity. He left the command to Ptolemy, and returned to Samaria, in order to march against Antigonus, with three thousand foot, and six hundred horse. The malecontents of Galilee took advantage of Herod's absence, fell upon Ptolemy by surprise, and slew him. They also laid the country waste, and then retired to bogs and places almost inaccessible. Herod no sooner received intelligence of this disorder, than he returned, cut off great numbers of the seditious, raised the siege of the fortresses they had invested, and fined the cities an hundred talents for the riots.

The Parthians being now defeated, and Pacorus slain, Ventidius, by order of Anthony, dispatched Machæras to Herod, with a thousand horse, and two legions, as auxiliaries to him against Antigonus. Antigonus had sent Machæras a letter, complaining of the indignities he had received from Herod, with a very considerable offer to enter into his interest. Though Machæras did not comply, as he had greater expectations of advantage from espousing the cause of Herod, he kept fair with the other party, and seemed disposed to treat with him on the business; but this was to sound him as to the present state of his affairs, though directly repugnant to the opinion and advice of Herod.

Antigonus, by this time, discovering his intention, not only refused him entrance, upon his approach to the city, but kept him off with darts and arrows as a professed enemy. Machæras was so mortified at this

Herod was so enraged at this merciless outrage, that, at first, he determined to avenge himself on Machæras as an open enemy; but he cooled upon reflection, and chose rather to accuse him before Anthony. Machæras, conscious of the atrocious nature of his conduct, instantly followed Herod, and by submissions, protestations, and importunities, sued for pardon. But this did not divert him from going to Anthony; and hearing that he was at that time besieging Samosata, a strong place upon the Euphrates, he made the greater expedition to come up to him, in order to ingratiate himself by some signal proofs of his fidelity and courage. His arrival put a speedy end to the siege; he slew great numbers of the barbarians, and obtained immense booty. Anthony, who always maintained a favourable opinion of Herod, held him, upon this occasion, in higher esteem than ever, which redounded much to his honour, and encouraged his hopes of obtaining the kingdom. Antigonus, in fine, was compelled to deliver up Samosata.

DURING these transactions the affairs of Herod were in a precarious situation in Judæa, which he left, in his absence, under the command of his brother Joseph, upon this express condition, that he should make no attempt against Antigonus during his absence. This advice proceeded from a suspicion he entertained of the perfidy of Machæras, founded upon former circumstances. But Joseph, when his brother was at a distance, became unmindful of his injunction, and marched towards Jericho, with four companies that Machæras had provided him, to carry off the corn that was now fit for sickle. The enemy fell upon him from the mountains, and, from the advantages of the place, and the occasion, gave him a total defeat, cutting all the Romans to pieces, and the general himself, who left behind him the character of a great and valiant man. These were only new raised troops, levied in Syria, and had no veterans amongst them to supply the want of skill and experience in their fellow-soldiers.

Is slain in a skirmish.

His head struck off by order of Antigonus.

But such was the brutality of Antigonus, that, not content with the victory, he committed the most unmanly insolences upon the remains of the dead, insulting over the body of Joseph himself, and then striking off his head, though Pheroras offered a composition of fifty talents to avoid that indignity. Affairs were so changed in Galilee, upon the success of Antigonus, that they took the partizans of Herod, of the first quality, and plunged them into the lake. The affairs of Idumæa underwent several alterations where Machæras repaired the walls of the castle of Gath. Herod was ignorant of these transactions; for, upon the taking of Samosata, Anthony made Sosius governor of Syria, with a charge to assist him against Antigonus; and so he departed into Egypt. Sosius, upon this, sent away two companies into Judæa, to join Herod; and he himself followed soon after with the rest of the army.

Joseph's death is foretold to Herod.

When Herod was at Daphne, near Antioch, he had a preface of the death of his brother in a dream. As he leaped out of his bed in a confused manner, messengers arrived at that very instant to acquaint him with the calamity. The surprize struck him at first; but when his grief had a little subsided, he hastened, with all expedition, in quest of the enemy. Upon his arrival he took eight hundred of the inhabitants, and one Roman cohort, to his assistance. With this body he entered Galilee before day, charged the enemy, and beat them back to the castle which they had left. He sat down before it, and assaulted it day after day; but, before he could make himself master of it, the weather became so tempestuous, that he was under a necessity of drawing off his army into the next village. Anthony, some few days after, sent him a reinforcement of another company, which put the garrison into such apprehensions, that they escaped from the castle through favour of the night.

He makes an irruption into Galilee.

After this Herod proceeded to Jericho to avenge himself of the death of his brother, where he seems to have been preserved by a miraculous interposition of Providence. That evening he gave a grand entertainment to several persons of the first distinction; and when the company had retired, and the hall was cleared, the roof fell to the ground. He took this remarkable escape as so auspicious a preface with respect to the war in which he was engaged, that he decamped early the next morning. The enemy, in a body of about 6000 men, came down the mountains, and had a skirmish with his van-guard; but they did not press on to close action with the Romans, assaulting them only with darts and stones at a distance, by which means Herod, as he passed, received a wound in his side.

His wound cured by a miracle.

Antigonus, who piqued himself in being supposed superior to Herod, not only in the number but courage of his men, sent Pappus, his familiar friend, with an army, into Samaria, to try an encounter with Machæras. Herod in the mean time took five towns, ravaged the enemy's country, destroyed 2000 of the inhabitants, laid their houses in ashes, and so returned to the main army, not far from a village called Cana.

Now a great multitude of Jews resorted to him daily, both from Jericho and other parts of the country. Some were moved from their hatred to Antigonus, others from their respect to Herod, and others from their love of innovation. Herod was most sanguinely desirous of bringing on an engagement; nor were Pappus and his army less anxious for the encounter; so that, without dismay, they boldly advanced to the charge. When they came to close action, they made a stout resistance for some time; but wherever Herod came, he was so transported with the spirit of revenge for the death of his brother, that his enemies fled before him. In a word, a most terrible slaughter ensued; some were forced back into the place whence they came, Herod still pressing and pursuing them, till he fell in with the thickest of them in the town. The houses were soon crowded with fugitives, and the very roofs covered with them. But these were easily destroyed; and, upon beating down the buildings, several perished under the ruins, and others by the sword; and those who escaped the one perished by the other. The streets were so blocked up with carcasses, that they found some difficulty to march over them; and the spectacle was so hideous, that it could not be seen without the most thrilling horror. Upon confidence from this victory, Herod would certainly have marched immediately to Jerusalem, if the extreme rigour of the season had not rendered the ways impassable. This was the only point wanting to crown his victory, and effect the irreparable ruin of Antigonus, who was now making the previous dispositions for abandoning the city.

Meeting of the two armies.

Herod, in the evening, having dismissed his friends, to refresh themselves after the fatigue of the day, went to bathe, as is usual in such cases, with only one servant to attend him, and was met on his way by one of the soldiers of Antigonus with a drawn sword, then by a second, then by a third, and afterwards by several more. These were men who had fled thither with their arms out of the battle for refuge. Upon sight of the king they were seized with such dread and tremour, that they passed by most precipitately; and no one being at hand to apprehend hend them, got off, while Herod fortunately escaped untouched. The day following he ordered the head of Pappus, the general of Antigonus, to be struck off, and sent it to his brother Pheroras, in revenge for the blood of Joseph, who was slain by that very Pappus.

Herod expects another deliverance.

When the spring season came on, Herod advanced to Jerusalem, drew his men to the walls, and, for the advantage of the attack, encamped before the temple, being the quarter from which Ptolemy had taken it before. This was the third year since Herod had been declared king at Rome. He assigned all his troops their proper stations, and every man his post in the suburbs. He ordered the casting up of three ramparts, and the building of turrets over them; and when he had given these commissions in charge to such of his officers as he could best confide in, he went himself to Samaria, to consummate a marriage with Mariamne, (the daughter of Aristobulus, son of Alexander,) to whom he had been contracted some time before; so that the siege and the match went on together in spite of his foes.

Upon this marriage he returned to Jerusalem with a number of additional troops, besides a strong body of horse and foot, under Sosius, the Roman general, who was sent to join him. The greater part of them took their march through the midland, and he himself through Phœnicia. The whole army, upon the muster, amounted to eleven regiments of foot, and six thousand horse, besides a strong reinforcement of Syrian auxiliaries. The assault was made on the north side; Herod founding his right upon the decree of the Roman senate, that had constituted him king; and Sosius preferring the commission of Anthony for the assistance of Herod with the troops under his command.

The Jews within the city were now in the utmost confusion and distress, the common people crowding about the temple, and passing their judgment upon the times, in a kind of enthusiastical foreboding of future calamities. The more bold and hardy part of the rabble went up and down, pillaging whatever they could reach, especially within the purlieus of the city, where they left no necessities for man or horse. The soldiers omitted nothing for the defence of the place; kept the assailants from their walls, and opposed one instrument and stratagem to another. But their chief manœuvre was in mining, and breaking in upon the enemy before they were aware.

The king, on the other hand, took care to provide against the depredations of the plunderers, and for a supply of provisions by convoys from abroad. The Jews must be allowed to have displayed the greatest resolution and courage, but were constantly excelled by the Romans in military skill and experience. They maintained the contest, however, with the utmost bravery; and, in case of any surprize of the enemy from their trenches, by sally or attack, found some means or other to frustrate their attempts. In fine, they spared neither art or labour in the resolution they had taken to defend the city to the last. But, after five months resistance against so vast an army, a chosen band of Herod's men were so hardy as to mount the wall, with some of the Roman centurions to second them, and thereupon fell into the city.

Immediately upon their entrance, they posted themselves round the temple, and as nearly as possible, while the army dispersed, and carried death and desolation, in the most hideous forms, wherever they went. The Romans were exasperated to revenge, by the hardships they had endured in the course of the siege; and the Jews of Herod's party were implacably cruel, in preventing the escape of any of their adversaries. The avenues of the city were covered with piles of mangled carcases; for the conquerors spared neither age or sex; nor was the temple itself any longer a sanctuary; nay, though the king himself commanded them, upon their allegiance, to hold their hands, and desist from the massacre, they went on with the carnage to a degree of inhuman phrenzy.

No. 29.

Antigonus, with the most dastardly pusillanimity, without regard to his rank, or past or present fortune, came down from the citadel, and prostrated himself before Sosius, who, without discovering the least pity for his calamitous condition, taunted him with a declaration that his name should be no longer Antigonus, but Antigone. But though he named him, he did not treat him like a woman; for he was loaded with chains, and kept a prisoner. Herod's present concern, after subduing his enemies, was to restrain the impetuosity of his foreign auxiliaries; as the multitude pressed so violently into the temple, prompted by curiosity to see the building, and its valuable contents, that it was with the utmost difficulty he could keep them in order, either by menaces, entreaties, and sometimes blows; accounting that his victory would be worse than a defeat, if it tended to expose those sacred things, which, by the Jewish law, were to be veiled from the sight of the prophane.

Meanness of Antigonus.

He then proceeded to the regulation of the soldiery in the matter of pillage, pertinently observing to Sosius, "that, by leaving neither men or money, the Romans would render him king of a desert, rather than of a city and people; and that he judged the dominion of the whole habitable earth too small a compensation for the slaughter of so many citizens." Sosius replied, "that it was but just to allow the soldiers this plunder, as a reward for what they had suffered during the siege." Herod rejoined, "that he would see justice done every individual out of his own private fortune." By this generous manner of proceeding, he preserved the remainder of his country; and afterwards fulfilled his promise to the army, by making liberal presents to each private soldier, and in proportion to the officers, with a royal bounty to Sosius himself; so that, upon the whole, he gave universal satisfaction. Sosius after this dedicated a golden crown to sacred services, and then left Jerusalem, carrying Antigonus bound to Anthony, flattering himself with the hope of mercy, till the axe put a period to an exile not worthy of being protracted.

Herod prevents the plundering of the city.

Antigonus loses his head.

The multitude in the city were divided; and Herod distinguished party from party, conferring honours on his friends, to attach them to his interest, and putting the adherents of Antigonus to death. When his finances ran low, he divided the most valuable of his effects betwixt Anthony and those immediately about his person: but this did not prove an effectual security; for Anthony was so infatuated with a predilection for Cleopatra, that he could deny her nothing. This execrable woman having sated her cruelty with the blood of all her own kindred, turned her implacable fury against strangers, by calumniating men of rank and fortune to Anthony, and prevailing with him to cause them to be put to death, to obtain possession of their estates. Her avarice transported her so far against the Jews and Arabians, that she entered into a secret practice on the lives of their kings, Herod and Malichus. Anthony amused her with fair words, and seeming compliances; but, though he could not indulge her so far as to take away the lives of two kings who had treated him with such singular respect, he violated the terms of friendship that subsisted between them, and put her in possession of great part of their territories; for instance, the lands in Jericho, so famous for palm-trees and the balsam plant, and all the cities upon the river Eleutherus, except Tyre and Sidon. When he had gratified her with these presents, she accompanied him as far as the Euphrates in his expedition against the Parthians, and so took her way into Judæa, by Apamia and Damascus.

Herod rewards his friends, and avenges himself upon his enemies.

Avarice and cruelty of Cleopatra.

Herod had already attempted, by large presents, to conciliate the favour of Cleopatra; but her cruelty was so implacable, and her avarice so insatiable, that former largesses had no effect; so that he found himself under a necessity of allowing her two hundred talents out of the revenues of Judæa, and then with the utmost obsequiousness conducted her to Pelusium. Anthony soon returned from the Parthian-war, with Artabazes, the son of Tigranes, his prisoner.

Craft and treachery of Cleopatra.

ON the breaking out of the war in Actium, Herod being at liberty, proposed to accompany Anthony in that expedition; for he had gained possession of Hyrcania from the filter of Antigonus, and all things were now composed and easy at home. But Cleopatra, lest Herod should be a companion in the danger with Anthony, craftily diverted him from his design. This princess, having a mortal aversion to the kings both of Judæa and Arabia, persuaded Anthony to commit the conduct of the Parthians to Herod; foreseeing as the consequence, that, if he succeeded in the enterprize, he should be queen of Arabia; if otherwise, queen of Judæa.

This crafty design tended to the advantage of Herod, who, having levied a great body of horse, sent them against the Syrians about Diopolis, where he attacked them, and, after some resistance, drove them out of the field. Upon this defeat the Arabians drew together a formidable army, and posted them at Camatha, in Coelo-Syria, there to await the arrival of the Jews. Herod was now advancing towards them; but, upon sight of their number and disposition, he found it expedient to be more than ordinarily watchful, and therefore ordered the raising of a wall about the camp. But the people were so elated with one victory, that, regardless of Herod's precaution, they fell on without ceremony, and routed the Arabians at the very first onset. But Herod himself escaped very narrowly upon the pursuit, by a body of the troops of Camatha, which were sent in by Athenion to the relief of the Arabians. This Athenion was one of Cleopatra's generals, and a deadly enemy to Herod. Animated by this reinforcement, the Arabians rallied, scattered Herod's army, and pursuing them through crags and woods, slew many of them in the chase. Those who escaped fled to an adjacent village, called Ormiza, where they were pent up and surrounded; and the Arabians made themselves masters of the camp, and the men that were in it. Soon after this severe check, Herod brought up succours; but could not repair the losses sustained by the late disaster, which was owing to the contumacy and disobedience of his officers; for if they had not been too sanguine and precipitate, Athenion could never have had an opportunity of putting his plot into execution. But he avenged himself afterwards upon the Arabians by surprizes and incursions, and, by several victories, compensated for one defeat.

Herod is routed by the Arabians.

Afterwards takes his revenge.

An earthquake in Judæa.

Several Jewish ambassadors put to death.

There befel Herod in the course of his successes one providential calamity. This was in the seventh year of his reign, in the beginning of the spring, and the midst of the war at Actium. It was a tremendous earthquake, that destroyed an immense number of cattle, and near thirty thousand people; but the army that lay in the field sustained no injury. It was in reality a sad disaster; but gaining, as usual, upon report, the Arabians took it for granted that Judæa was totally overwhelmed, and flattered themselves into an opinion, that they should get a land destitute of inhabitants into their power. In this confidence they put certain Jewish ambassadors, who were then with them, to death, and advanced into the country to take possession of it. This formidable inroad of the Arabians struck the Jews with such a terror, especially as they had undergone so many calamities upon one another, that Herod was under necessity of attempting to reduce them to reason and resolution by the following speech:

"You are here, in my opinion, (said he,) under a most unreasonable apprehension. I will allow you to indulge your sorrows under the hand of an offended God; but to subject yourselves to the same despondencies and passions, for fear of the power of men, is a meanness of soul below your courage. Nay, so far am I from any dread of an enemy, after this earthquake, that it looks to me rather as if Providence had ordered the ensnaring of your adversaries, by this temptation, into a vengeance for the injuries they have done you: nor do they lay so much stress upon the force of their own arms or valour, as upon the opinion they have of our abject and miserable state. But those are false hopes, when men support themselves upon the infirmities of others, rather than upon their own virtue. Nor is there any certainty either in prosperous or adverse fortune, as they are both unsteady, and take their turns. For a confirmation of this doctrine, you need go no farther than to the late battle, where we were masters one hour, and at mercy the next. This is the very case of our enemies at present, or I am much deceived. They think they take, and they are taken. People that are over-confident are unwary; but a considerate fear makes men provident; so that the very ground of your apprehension is the foundation of my assurance. You would needs be charging the enemy contrary to order, and forwarder than you should have been; and Athenion, you see, made advantage of your error. But you yourselves are now upon the reserve: your deliberations are sober, and not fantastical; which is a disposition that I look upon as an omen of a certain victory. This is the right temper of a brave man before he comes into action; but let him reserve his spirit till he has occasion for it in the field. So let it be your business now to convince your enemies, by force of arms, that the Jews will sooner part with their lives than their reputation; and stand firm at last under all misfortunes; nor ever own the Arabians for their masters, who have so often been their slaves.

A generous speech of Herod's to encourage his soldiers.

"But why this fear at last for things inanimate? How comes an earthquake to be a portent, or a presage of things to come? Is there any thing more natural than the agitations and disorders of the elements? They do not foretel calamities, but they actually bring and create them. It is possible that there may be some forerunning signs of plagues, famine, and earthquakes, to come; but when they are once come, the greater they are the sooner will they be over. Or put the case we should be conquered now, which is worse, the war or the earthquake? But there's a destination of these people to ruin, even by their own hands, without the help of enemies, that could be so impious and inhuman, as, contrary to the laws of nature and nations, to dip their hands in the blood of our ambassadors, and dedicate the sacrifice to God for the success of the war. Can they ever think to escape the all-seeing eye and almighty power of a vindictive God, whenever we shall but rouse in us the courage and zeal of our forefathers, and call these perfidious violators of leagues and public faith to a severe and just account? Wherefore stand up, my fellow-soldiers; not for your wives, children, or country, but to revenge the murder of your ambassadors, whose very blood will consecrate the cause; and those heroes, dead as they are, will do you more good in the head of your army, than the living commanders of it. Do you but follow where I will lead you, and I will ask no more. Only one word of caution; be not rash; and when it comes to the trial, they will not dare to look you in the face."

This animated address infused such ardour into the soldiers, that Herod, availing himself of the opportunity, sacrificed, and, without delay, passed his army over the river Jordan. He pitched his camp at at Philadelphia, not far from the enemy, with a castle betwixt them, which looked as if the castle was to be the subject of dispute. Herod, at that distance, provoked them to a battle, desiring nothing more than to bring it to a speedy issue; for the enemy had sent people before to take possession of this castle; but Herod's party, without much difficulty, repelled them, and gained the ascent. Herod drew out every day in order of battle to dare the Arabians to a combat: but when he perceived they would not answer the challenge, (for they were all in a consternation, and Altemus, their general, above the rest,) he attacked them in their trenches, and so forced them to a battle; upon which they entered in such disorder, that their horse and foot were mixed together. They were, indeed, superior to the Jews in number, but inferior in valour; although they were obliged to expose themselves to danger from their desperate situation.

While they resisted, the slaughter was not great; but when once they turned their backs, between those that fell in the pursuit, and those that were trampled to death by their own people, there were 5000 missing; and the rest were driven into the camp, where Herod soon encompassed and besieged them. They were also much distressed for want of water. In this embarrassed situation they sent ambassadors to Herod, with an offer of fifty thousand talents for a composition; but he would not so much as deign them an hearing. They came out after this in troops in the torment of a raging thirst, and delivered themselves up to the Jews at discretion; so that, in the course of five days, Herod had four thousand of them in bonds. Upon the sixth day the remainder of them, in a transport of despair, provoked the Jews to battle; where about 7000 men were slain on the spot. This stroke finished Herod's revenge upon the Arabians; for it humbled them to that degree, that they chote him afterwards as their protector.

C H A P. XV.

Herod's free address to Cæsar at Rhodes, upon the defeat of Anthony at Actium. His gracious reception from the emperor. He is confirmed in his government with large additions.

THE affairs of Herod now took a prosperous turn; but the news of the defeat of Anthony at Actium affected him most sensibly, as he entertained the highest regard for him. His apprehension, however, was not justly founded; for Cæsar could never think Anthony absolutely suppressed, as long as Herod continued to assist him. Herod, in consequence of this unfortunate event, repaired to Rhodes, where Augustus was at that time, and presenting himself without any ensigns of royalty, in the habit of a private man, but with the majesty of a king, thus candidly and frankly addressed him:

"I must confess, mighty Cæsar, that as Anthony made me a king, I have exerted my regal authority in the service of the benefactor from whom I received it. And you yourself, if I may be permitted to speak freely, would have found the effects of my services, had I not been diverted by the Arabian war. It did not, however, prevent me from sending supplies both of troops and provisions; nor has this last fatal blow at Actium in the least abated my zeal for the interest of my patron. I could not, indeed, furnish him with men and arms, nor attend him in person upon the occasion; but I gave him this salutary counsel, to detach himself from Cleopatra, which done, I promised him money, fortresses, troops, nay, my very self, as an assistant in the war against you. But, through his infatuation to a woman on the one hand, and your success in arms on the other, all our efforts are frustrated; so that the fate of Anthony and Herod are involved: we fell upon the same day, and with his fortune I now laid "down my crown. All my pretence to gain cle"mency is founded upon a consciousness of having "acted consistently with the character of an honest

"man and a sincere friend."

Cæsar, struck with this address, thus rejoined:

"Herod, be secure, be happy, be still a king, and "that more firmly than ever; as I am confident so "generous a friend must make a good governor.
"Be as faithful in your attachment to the conqueror
"as you have been to the vanquished, and I shall "cherish the hope of deriving mighty benefits from "so exalted a mind. Anthony has been swayed by "the counsels of Cleopatra to our mutual advan"tage. Rest, therefore, content with the confirma"tion of the kingdom to you; and I shall take "care that, in future, you shall find no detriment
"from the loss of Anthony."

Augustus Cæsar, after this speech, with great humanity adjured Herod not to doubt of his friendship; and then putting the crown upon his head, confirmed his title to it by an act of state, with honourable commendations of his character. When Herod had made due acknowledgments, by fair words and sumptuous presents, he interceded with the emperor in behalf of Alexander, one of Anthony's friends, to obtain his pardon; but Cæsar would not hearken to his solicitation, declaring that his offences were unpardonable.

As Augustus was afterwards passing through Syria into Egypt, Herod entertained him with royal magnificence; and Cæsar, in return, did him the honour of causing him to ride by his side, while he was reviewing his troops about Ptolemais. Herod also made a plentiful provision of water for them, during their march to Pelusium through a dry country; nor were there any necessaries wanting; in-
"much that Cæsar, impressed by these extraordinary
"instances of his munificence, declared to his train,
"that the kingdom of Judæa was too little for the "mind of so great a prince.

Cleopatra and Anthony being both deceased upon Cæsar's arrival in Egypt, he not only conferred new honours upon Herod, but annexed to his kingdom those parts which Cleopatra had taken from him, with Gadara, Hippiion, Samaria, and the maritime cities, Gaza, Anthedon, Joppa, and the Tower of Straton. He also presented him with four hundred Gauls, who had been Cleopatra's body guards. He also gave him the province of Trachon, with Batanea and Auranitis, upon the following occasion.

It had been a common practice with Zenodorus, who resided in a mansion he hired of Lysanias, to send robbers out of Trachon to Damascus. The inhabitants applied themselves to Varus, at that time governor of Syria, for relief, entreating him to represent their calamitous situation to Cæsar. Varus accordingly complied with their request; and the emperor sent him orders immediately to suppress these robbers; in consequence of which parties being dispatched to all suspected places, they freed the country from those pests of society. The governor also having been enjoined to deprive Zenodorus of a part of his estate, Cæsar bestowed it upon Herod, to secure it from being any longer a receptacle for those caterpillars, appointing him, at the same time, governor of all Syria. He also cautioned the subordinate rulers to consult Herod in all matters of importance; and, upon the demise of Zenodorus, gave him all the land between Trachon and Galilee. But Herod was more abundantly gratified by the consideration that he was beloved by Cæsar above all men living, next to Agrippa; and by Agrippa next to Cæsar. From these concurring circumstances he was advanced to a great degree of human felicity, and evinced a magnanimity equal to his exaltation, by adapting his acquisition to laudable purposes.

Herod's magnificent edifices.

The citadels Cæsarion and Agrippion.

Sebaste, in Samaria, dedicated to Augustus.

HEROD, in the fifteenth year of his reign, applied himself to the repairing and rebuilding of the temple, which he accomplished with splendid magnificence, and at immense charge, as appeared from the stately galleries round about it, that were raised from the very foundation, and the castle on the north side adjoining to it, which, for grandeur and elegance, was not inferior to the royal palace itself, giving it the name of Antonia, alluding to his favorite Anthony. He greatly enlarged the enclosure round about the temple; and raised upon an eminence, that overlooked the city, two superb spacious structures, comparable to any temple, which he called Cæsarion and Agrippion, in honour of his two illustrious friends Cæsar and Agrippa.

Nor did he restrain his zeal for perpetuating the memories of three celebrated characters to palaces and particular fabrics, but dedicated whole cities to the immortalizing of their fame to posterity; for instance, Sebaste, in Samaria, a city twenty furlongs in compass, with a stately wall about it, a colony of 6000 inhabitants planted in it, and an endowment of fruitful lands belonging to it, with peculiar immunities to the people. Amongst other eminent works he erected a majestic temple, with an area of three furlongs and an half about it; and this temple he dedicated to Augustus Cæsar.

After this Cæsar gratified Herod, with an additional donation of lands; and Herod, in acknowledgment, erected another temple, of white polished marble, near the head of the river Jordan, at a place called Panium, which he also dedicated to his illustrious patron. Not far from hence stands a mountain of stupendous height, that overhangs the crags and rocks, and looks down into a deep valley. At the bottom is a dark and hideous cavern, worn and hollowed to such a depth by the constant fall of waters upon it, that it cannot be sounded. From the foot of this cavern there bubbles forth an issue of several springs, which, according to tradition, passes for the source of the river Jordan.

Other proofs of his gratitude to his patron.

The king gave equal proofs of his magnificence at Jericho, where he caused to be erected, betwixt the castle of Cypros and the old palace, other stately and commodious buildings, and called them by the names of the same august personages. In fine, he did not leave one considerable place in the whole kingdom without some monumental memorial to the fame of Cæsar. When he had ornamented the borders of the temples throughout Judæa, he did the like in the provinces, distinguishing several of them by the name of Cæsarea.

As Herod was on his progress along the coast, he observed one maritime city amongst the rest, with all the decays of antiquity about it. It was known by the name of Straton's Tower, and appeared, from its situation, worthy of the king's royal care and bounty. He not only repaired the castle with beautiful white stone, but erected a palace there equal in grandeur to his other works. It lies betwixt Dora and Joppa, where there is no good haven; and the passage is so dangerous, that mariners, who shape their course that way towards Egypt from Phœnicia, run great risque from a south-west wind, which sets in with such violence upon the rocks, that it rebounds in eddies, and raises a turbulent sea.

But the king's liberality and resolutions surmounted all the difficulties and obstructions that could arise either from situation or expence; for he built an haven there larger than the Pyreneum at Athens, with stations for the largest ships to ride in with the utmost security from wind and weather. It was so fortified against the violent surges of the sea, and ornamented so agreeably to the view, as to admit of no addition, either of strength or beauty of contrivance.

Upon taking measure for the dimensions of the port, he ordered huge stones to be cast into the sea at twenty fathoms water. The greatest part were fifty feet in length, nine in depth, and ten broad, and some still larger. When they had filled up the space to the surface of the water, they carried on a wall two hundred feet wide; the one half to break the force of the waves in the nature of a mole, from whence it was called Procymæa, and the other for the support of the turrets that were fixed upon it; to one of which he gave the name of Drusion, in compliment to Drusus, Cæsar's kinsman.

There were also a great number of vaults for stores; and before and above these vaults a pavement of flat stones, that served both as a landing-place and walk for recreation. It fronted the north, which, upon that quarter, is the most gentle of all winds. On each side of the entrance stood three colossi, mounted on pillars. Those on the left hand were supported by a strong tower of oncentire stone; and those on the right by two large stones, in the form of columns joined together. The buildings next the port were all of white stone; and the streets that led from the city to the quay exactly uniform. Upon an hill, opposite the mouth of the haven, stood Cæsar's Temple, a building, in magnitude and curiosity, not inferior to that of Jupiter Olympus, from the model of which it was taken; as also of another at Rome, that did not fall short of the temple of Juno at Argos. Herod's design, in erecting this stately tower and port, was the advantage of the province, and the security of voyagers; and, to the honour of Cæsar, he called it Cæsarea.

There was other famous works of Herod worthy of record; as a spacious market-place, a theatre, an amphitheatre, and the institution of the Ludi Quinquennales, so called from their being games appointed to be celebrated every fifth year, which he dedicated to the honour of Augustus. He was the first who, in the 192d olympiad, propounded honorary rewards, not only to the victors themselves, but to the second and third competitor, in course one after another. He repaired Anthedon, which had been nearly demolished in the war, and called it Agrippion; and, as a testimony of respect for his friend, inscribed the name of Agrippa on the gate of the temple he had built there.

Herod was a dutiful son, as well as a generous friend and patriot; for he founded a city to the honour of his father, in the most pleasant and fruitful part of his dominions, abounding with plants and rivulets, which he called Antipatris. There was a castle also near Jericho, which was strong and delightfully situated. This place he walled in, and gave it the name of Cypros, after his mother. Nor was he unmindful of his brother Phasael on several occasions; as in a tower he built at Jerusalem, which he called Phasaelis; and likewise a city to the north of Jericho, which he also called by the same name.

As he transmitted to posterity the memories of his family and friends, he did not omit a memorial for himself; for he built and fortified a castle on a mountain of Arabia, which he called Herodion, after his own name. He gave the same appellation also to an hill, which he caused to be thrown up in the form of a woman's breast, about sixty furlongs distant from Jerusalem. This mount was encompassed passed at the summit with round turrets: the circuit of it filled with royal apartments, as splendid and brilliant, within and without, as art and cost could render them. The stairs were of pure white marble, comprising two hundred steps from the bottom to the top. It was of stupendous height. At the feet of it he built other magnificent apartments for the accommodation of his friends, inasmuch, that, considering it was adapted to every use and convenience, it seemed to be a city rather than a castle; though it was nothing more than a structure erected for the temporary residence of the king.

Having given so many proofs of munificence to display his liberality to his own subjects, Herod seemed disposed to render foreigners partakers of his generosity. To this end he caused public baths to be set up at Tripolis, Damascus, and Ptolemais; built strong walls at Byblis; galleries, council chambers, public magazines, market-places, and temples, at Berytus and Tyre; theatres at Sidon and Damascus; an aqueduct at Laodicea; water-works at Askalon, with piazzas of exquisite workmanship. To some he gave groves and harbours, to others lands. He appropriated annual revenues for the support of baths, distributed corn to the necessitous, and frequently furnished the inhabitants of Rhodes with money for equipping a navy, when occasion required it. He repaired the temple of Apollo, (called Pythium,) and rendered it more magnificent and commodious than it was in its pristine state. I might add, to these instances, his liberality to the Lydians and Samians; his largesses throughout Ionia, Athens, Lacedæmon, Nicopolis; and particularly his bounty to Antioch, one of the principal cities of Syria, that stood in a bog for the space of twenty furlongs, till he caused the passage to it to be paved with white marble, and shelters to be put up against foul weather.

Men of narrow minds may suggest that these favours were confined to a few particular places. to such we need only oppose the obligations he laid upon the Elians, wherein not only the people of Greece, but the whole world were concerned; at least all those who have heard the fame of the Olympic games: for when he found, upon his arrival at Rome, that these games were all that remained of ancient Greece, and that they were upon the decline for want of money to support them, he not only took upon him the charge of that year, but settled an annual allowance for the perpetual continuance of them. It would be endless to recount the debts and tributes which he remitted, and particularly those of the inhabitants of Phœlæis, Batanea, and the small towns in Cilicia, where he discharged them from the payment of their pensions. He would have extended his liberality still farther, but was prevented by an apprehension of incurring envy from other monarchs.

Herod possessed great strength and agility of body, was an excellent horseman, and discovered perfect skill in the lance; for he darted forty beasts upon the chace in one day. He was a consummate soldier, and finished swordsman. In a word, he was as fortunate as accomplished; and if he failed in any warlike exploit, it was attributed to treachery, or the rashness of his soldiers, and not to their gallant commander.

HEROD, in the midst of his external successes, was greatly perplexed by domestic broils, which took their rise from his putting away one wife, and taking to himself another; for he no sooner became possessed of the kingdom, than he dismissed Doris, and married Mariamne, the daughter of Alexander, the son of Aristobulus. He banished out of the city Antipater, whom he had by Doris, for the sake of the sons he had by Mariamne, and permitted him to come thither at no other times than the festivals. He then put to death Hyrcanus, his wife's grandfather, upon his return from Parthia, under pretence of having plotted against his life: for Barzapharnes having carried him away prisoner to the king of Parthia, after the taking of Syria, the Jews, on the other side of the Euphrates, from pure compassion, set him at liberty, and paid his ransom. If he had followed their counsel, and not passed over the river to Herod, he might have lived safe and happy; but through a passionate desire to revisit his own country, he was inveigled to his ruin; as Herod was conscious of his right and title to the government, though he had no reason to entertain a thought of his design to lay claim to it.

Mariamne had five children by Herod, two daughters and three sons. The youngest of the latter died in the course of his studies at Rome. The two elder were educated according to their royal descent, both with respect to the dignity of the mother's extraction, and their being born when their father was in possession of the crown. But nothing moved Herod so powerfully in their favour, as the wonderful ascendancy Mariamne had over him, which grew to such an height, as to render him insensible of all indignities and affronts. Mariamne requited this warmth of affection with an equal degree of aversion. She did not want matter of pretence for disgust, and presuming upon the extravagant passion he had for her, she peremptorily charged him with the murder of Hyrcanus, and her brother Aristobulus, and highly aggravated her reproaches. The latter, an innocent youth, she observed, but seventeen years of age when he was created high-priest, was cut off as soon as he obtained that sacred function, amidst the approbation of the people, who wept with joy at his appearance in the pontifical vestments to officiate at the altar; but the very same night he was sent away to Jericho, and there drowned in a lake, by the Gauls, at the instance of Herod.

Mariamne did not content herself with these outrages against Herod, but uttered the foulest invectives upon his sister and mother, which he heard with patience, through the excess of his affection. This incensed them to that degree, that they concerted means to raise the indignation of Herod, and to that end dropped some oblique hints to him touching the honour and virtue of his wife. Amongst other plausible matters they related the circumstance of Mariamne's sending her picture to Anthony, and the pains she took to ingratiate herself with him from a principle of concupiscence; adding, that Anthony was so great a libertine as to gratify his inordinate desires at the expence of his very life.

The women tamper with Herod against Mariamne.

Through the rage of jealousy, the consideration of Cleopatra's insatiable avarice and cruelty, and the power she had over Anthony, in the instance of Lysanias, and Malichus, the king of Arabia, who were both put to death at her instigation, Herod was thunderstruck at this intimation of his sister and mother, apprehending danger of losing not only his wife, but his life also.

Herod goes to Anthony, and leaves the care of his wife to his brother-in-law Joseph, with secret instructions.

In this perplexity of mind he determined to go to Anthony, and recommend the care of his wife, during his absence, to Joseph, the husband of his sister Salome, whom he had ever found faithful to him; but with this secret instruction, that if Anthony took away his life, he should cause the death of Mariamne. Joseph immediately hinted this to the queen, as a proof of the king's extraordinary affection for her, since he could not endure the thought of separation even in death itself. Herod, upon his return, in an hour of dalliance, was professing the rhapsody of his affection for Mariamne, and that he never had a passion for any other of the sex; upon which the queen sarcastically replied, "that he had given an infallible proof of it in the order he had left with Joseph to dispatch her." The disclosing of this very important secret filled the mind of Herod with indignation, as he was persuaded Joseph would never have divulged it but in the confidence of an amour. In this state of distraction he suddenly arose from his couch, went into the court-yard, and there met Salome, who, availing herself of so fair an opportunity for calumniating the queen, so effectually confirmed Herod in his suspicion, that, in the rage of jealousy, he ordered both Joseph and Mariamne to be put to death. The command was no sooner issued than he repented of it; but the execution was done before it could be recalled. He affected extreme compunction; and, from the extraordinary pomp of her funeral solemnities, and the grief he expressed upon the occasion, seemed desirous of manifesting that he bore the same esteem for the memory of his deceased wife, as he had affection for her person whilst living.

Deaths of Joseph and Mariamne.

Inveteracy of the sons of Mariamne against their father.

The sons of Mariamne were so inflamed by the horrid barbarity of this proceeding towards their mother, that they looked upon their father as an open enemy. They had entertained a very unfavourable opinion of him, even when they were at Rome together, and were confirmed in it upon their return to Judaea, as their knowledge improved by experience and observation. Being arrived at years of maturity, one of them married the daughter of his aunt Salome, who was mortally averse to their mother. The other took to wife the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia. In process of time they indulged themselves in a greater liberty of speech than formerly, and that confidence betrayed them to the malice of informers, inasmuch that their enemies peremptorily assured the king, that they had entered into a conspiracy against his life, and that the son-in-law of Archelaus designed to go privately to Rome, with a complaint against Herod himself to Cæsar. When Herod had information of these transactions he recalled Antipater to court, whom he had by his former wife, Doris, proposing to use him as a countermine against the brothers, and to this end treated him with singular tokens of respect.

Antipater recalled home.

The brothers resenting this preference, given to the son of an obscure woman, as the highest indignity offered to princes of their illustrious descent on the mother's side, took every occasion of signifying their disgust, and even indignation. But these means, instead of furthering their design, tended to the advantage of Antipater; for he managed matters so artfully with his father, that, through the prevailing effect of flattery on the one hand, and calumny on the other, he brought it to this issue at last, that the brothers were totally excluded from the succession, which was to devolve to him by virtue of his father's will and testament. He was sent after this to Cæsar in a kind of royal state, having the robes and train of a king, and only wanting the crown. So elated was he with this pomp, that, through the means of insinuation and slander, he introduced his mother into Mariamne's bedchamber; and at length wrought his father, by degrees, into a design upon the lives of his brothers.

With this view Herod took Alexander to Rome with him, and there charged him, before Cæsar, with an attempt of taking away his life by poison. When Alexander was admitted to his defence, and before a judge that was not to be imposed on either by Herod or Antipater, he cautiously avoided laying any imputation to his father, but, with great force of argument, refuted the calumnies brought against himself; demonstrated the innocence of his brother, who was involved in the same accusation; and from thence proceeded to lay open the impurities, frauds, and contrivances of Antipater, and this with such power of elocution, and grace of action, as carried the strongest conviction to the minds of the auditors, and impressed them with a due sense of his integrity, as well as his accomplishments as an orator. This speech had so powerful an effect upon Cæsar, that, rejecting the accusations, he made them all friends, provided that the sons, in future, should be obedient to their father; and the father at liberty to appoint whom he pleased to succeed him in the kingdom.

Herod, at his return from Rome, could not but acquit his sons of the accusations brought against them; yet he could not cast away his suspicions; for Antipater tampered with him so effectually, that he kept jealousies alive; though he durst not openly avow his sentiments, lest he should seem to dispute the authority of the arbitrator. He took his passage by Cilicia, and so to Eleusa, where he was received by Archelaus with great pomp and respect, who congratulated him on the reconciliation effected between him and his sons. Archelaus had not in the mean time been wanting, by letters, and other instances, to his friends at Rome, to make interest for Alexander. He conducted Herod as far as Zephyrium, where he presented him with thirty talents, and took his leave.

The king, upon his arrival at Jerusalem, called an assembly of the people, and, in the hearing of his three sons, thus addressed them on the subject of the late reconciliation.

"This is a blessing which I shall ever value incomparably above the glories of a crown, a which I shall endeavour to preserve and improve accordingly. It is to Cæsar that I stand indebted for my dignity and estate; and to Cæsar again that I owe the liberty and privilege of appointing my own successor. It is to him also that I am to pay my acknowledgments, with this declaration, that I design them all three both for the sovereignty and the succession, if it may be agreeable to the will of God and your good pleasure. The eldest of them has the title of seniority; the other two may pretend to the dignity by their extraction; and the command, at last, is extensive enough for all three.

"As for those that Cæsar hath united, and the father set up, you must be sure to pay them all due respect; that is to say, it must be impartial, equal, and just, with regard to a precedence of birth-right; for the advancing of one man before his time, will not be near so great an obligation upon him that is preferred, as a disgust to the other that is postponed. But now, for fear of evil counsel or example, it shall be my care to place wife and sober people about them, such as I can depend upon, and such as shall be answerable for their good order and decorum.

"I do further expect from these ministers, as well as from the officers of my army, that, for the present, they shall own no other matter than myself; for it is not the government, but the honourary part of it, that I have transmitted to my sons; so that they may have the pleasure of a kind of regency, but the burden of administration is to rest upon my shoulders; and the last resort of matters, in the judgment and determination of things, must be my province. If you con"sider my age, the course of my life, or manners, I am not so far advanced upon the first point, but, by the course of nature, I may be allowed many days. Neither have I done any thing to shorten my life by intemperate pleasures. As to my duty to God, I have been so true to his holy worship, that I will not despair of the blessing of a longer time yet in this world, even in consideration of that zeal and devotion. But if any of you shall take upon him to advance the sons while I am yet living, in contempt of the father, let him expect to be severely punished for it. It would give me pleasure to have my children honourably treated in the world; but young men are hot and pragmatical, and 'tis but throwing a temptation in their way to inflame their desires. People would do well to consider, before they make these applications; for it is my part, as men do well or ill, to see them rewarded or punished; nor will I be wanting in that article of my duty. The best way will be for the sons and father to be all of a mind; for it is their interest to have me govern, and it is mine for them to agree among themselves.

"And now, my dear children, (says he,) consult, in the first place, that natural affection which Providence hath made common even to beasts with men, and acquit yourselves like dutiful children to your father. Bleis Caesar, in the next place, for the good office of his mediation; and take it kindly from me, in the third place, that I only desire what I have a right to command; that is to say, let me entreat you to live amicably as brethren. I shall now take care to provide you such a train and equipage as may be suitable to your quality. Be sure you live peaceably one with another; and I beseech God to keep me steady in the same mind."

When the king had thus spoken, he embraced his sons, and dismissed the multitude. Some malecontents went away muttering that he was not audible in his address, others decanting on particular parts of it, and others doubting the sincerity of his declarations.

The brothers were still divided among themselves, and their dissensions produced a voluntary separation. Aristobulus and Alexander were much disgusted that Antipater should have the preference. Antipater, on the other hand, that his brethren should be allowed any share in the government. Antipater being of a malicious and reserved disposition, disguised the mortal aversion he had to his brothers; whereas the other two, being frank and open, despised the mean arts of dissimulation. Their enemies had their instruments planted up and down to watch their words and actions, provoke them to indulge their natural frankness of disposition, and gain upon them by insinuation, under the mask of confidence and friendship, inasmuch that not a word passed from Alexander, but it was brought to Herod with considerable additions. The most simple remark had a criminal interpretation, and every thing was misrepresented that could tend to calumniate.

The agents of Antipater, on the other hand, were like himself, ever on the reserve, either from disposition or the force of bribery, so that their whole proceedings were enveloped in mystery and ambiguity. Antipater, in fine, conducted matters with such art and address, that the friends and servants of Alexander were all corrupted, either by flattery or rewards, into the betraying of him in whatsoever he said or did. Instead of appearing himself as an open enemy to his brothers, he had his confidants at hand ready to accuse them, while he stood forth speciously himself in their vindication; but introduced such oblique hints, and subtle insinuations, as greatly alarmed Herod, and fully persuaded him that the report of Alexander's plot upon his life was well founded: indeed, Antipater's artful manner of misrepresentation gave the semblance of truth to every calumny.

Herod was greatly incensed against the two brothers by these practices of Antipater, inasmuch that he gained the good opinion of the king in proportion to their loss of it, and by that means obtained the interest of the courtiers, particularly that of Ptolemy, his dearest friend, as also his brethren and domestics. The influence of Antipater was all prevailing, as was that of his mother: nor could any circumstance be so mortifying to Alexander, as the part she bore in the whole scheme, well knowing her mortal hatred to the children of the queen. Great respect was paid to Antipater, from a consideration of his influence with the king, who absolutely prohibited his courtiers, in general, from holding any intercourse with Alexander or his brother, on pain of his severest displeasure. This interdiction struck a dread not only into the king's household, but their friends abroad: for Herod had privileges conferred upon him by Augustus which he never granted to any other, as the liberty of bringing deserters out of the jurisdiction of other princes, where himself had no absolute authority.

Antipater's mother conducts the plot.

The brothers were not as yet conscious of having given any offence, as Herod had not exhibited any public charge against them, which made the danger to much the greater, through want of precaution for a necessary defence. They inferred, however, the state of their case from the king's coolness towards them, which consequently increased their anxiety.

Antipater had also prejudiced their uncle Pheroras, and their aunt Salome, against the brothers, and intigated them to use their influence with Herod to their disadvantage. The feud already ran very high; but it was greatly inflamed by Glaphyra, the wife of Alexander, who, upon all occasions, would be boasting of the dignity of her birth, and claiming a superiority above others. She came from Themenus, the said, on the father's side, and from Darius, the son of Hytaspes, on the mother's; reflecting, at the same time, on the wife and sister of Herod as upstarts, and treating them with all imaginary contempt; observing that Herod did not marry for rank, but for beauty. We have already observed that he had several wives, and much approved of polygamy, it being allowed by the Jewish law, and they were all exasperated against Alexander for the haughty and insolent behaviour of Glaphyra. Aristobulus made Salome, his mother-in-law, also his enemy. She was sufficiently piqued at the pride of Glaphyra, who was continually upbraiding her with the meannets of her origin. He would also reproach his wife in like manner, and complain that he had married a woman of low descent, whereas his brother had taken to wife one of royal descent. The daughter of Salome carried these taunts to her mother; adding, that Alexander threatened the mother of his other brethren with the vilest indignities if he should come to the crown, and declared he would put their children, male and female, to the most servile and menial offices, as best becoming their mode of education. These intimations raised the resentment of Salome to that degree that she related the whole to Herod; nor could her testimony be suspected, since it was against her son-in-law.

Enmity between Aristobulus and Salome.

There was another calumny propagated, that inflamed Herod more than all the rest. It was given out that Alexander and Aristobulus were continually bemoaning the fate of their mother, and execrating their father for his cruelty; and farther suggested, that, upon Herod's dividing Marianne's wardrobe among the rest of his wives, the brothers forboded that their gaudy apparel would soon be turned into mourning.

Herod, on these insinuations, conscious of the high spirit of the princes, was not without apprehension of violence from them, yet did not despair of reducing them to filial duty and obedience. Being on the point of setting out for Rome, he ordered his sons to be called, and, with the authority of a king, and tenderness of a father, admonished them to agree among themselves, and love one another, with promise of an absolute pardon for what they had had done amiss, upon condition of their repentance and amendment. By way of reply, they refuted the calumnies that had been raised against them; and alleged, that their actions were sufficient for their vindication; adding, that the king should not credulously admit of such tales, as there never would be wanting those who would poison the royal ear with them.

and Salome

thers.

Though they had thus pacified him, and freed themselves from any further apprehension of danger, they soon fell into new anxieties. They knew that Salome, and their uncle Pheroras, were their deadly enemies, who were both of them rigidly severe. The latter also had great power and influence, as he shared with Herod in all the dignities of royalty, the crown only excepted. His own proper revenue was fixed at an hundred talents, besides the amount of all the lands beyond Jordan, which he enjoyed through the bounty of Herod, at whose request Cæsar was prevailed upon to make him a tetrarch. Herod honoured him also with a royal match, bestowing upon him his wife's sister in marriage; and, upon her demise, offered him his eldest daughter, with a portion of three hundred talents. But Pheroras was so captivated with a passion for a private person, that he declined the proposal of the royal marriage, which Herod resenting, gave her to the son of his brother, who was afterwards slain by the Parthians. But though Herod was incensed for the present, upon reflection, he imputed the refusal to the violence of his passion, and so pardoned his folly.

Pheroras
and Salome are suspected by Herod

It seemed that a rumour had long prevailed of Pheroras having entertained a design, even in the life-time of Mariamne, of poisoning his brother. This was a season so favourable to spies and informers, that Herod, though possessed of great fraternal affection, was alarmed at the report, though he did not absolutely credit it. Many were apprehended upon suspicion, and several put to the question, passing from one to another, till they came at last to the friends of Pheroras. They confessed nothing of the poisonous intention; but acknowledged that Pheroras had made preparation to steal away with his mistress to Parthia; and that Costobarus, Salome's second husband, was privy to the design. Herod had delivered her up to this Costobarus, after her former husband had been put to death for adultery. Nor was Salome free from accusations; for her brother Pheroras exhibited a charge against her, of having entered into a marriage treaty with Silæus, governor of Arabia, under king Obodas, one of Herod's most implacable enemies. Salome was found guilty of the charge alleged against her by Pheroras. Herod, however, pardoned them both.

Confession of the eu-nuchs.

The storm of faction now rested upon the head of Alexander, and from the following cause. There were three eunuchs who were in high esteem with the king, and employed in offices immediately about his person. Alexander, by flatteries and rewards, had rendered them his creatures, subservient to his purposes. Herod, suspecting some collusion, put them to the torture, and extorted from them a confession, that Alexander had expressed to them "the vanity and folly of the king in colouring his hair, from an affectation of youthful gait; whereas he was entitled to their attention, as being successor to the crown, and having, on the attainment of it, power of avenging himself on his enemies, and rewarding his friends, amongst whom he ranked them in particular." The informers added, that the great officers of state were in their hearts all attached to the interest of Alexander, and concerted their schemes in private meetings and cabals.

Herod is

His cruelty and unjustice.

These confessions alarmed Herod, though he would not venture to publish them immediately; but he had his spies at work, night and day, to make discoveries in all places, and amongst all families; and death was the certain consequence of suspicion. This part of Herod's history was one scene of cruelty and injustice. Every disgust made way for a calumny, and that calumny was construed a mortal crime; for Herod executed the malicious designs that were suggested to him by others: no witness so infamous, nor imposture so gross and ridiculous, but it gained credit; and the punishment immediately followed even the supposed offences; so that the accused and the accuser frequently went off together, as Herod contemned the formalities of law where the life of a prince was in danger. Nay, he was transported, by suspicion and apprehension, to that degree, that he could not behold an innocent person with complacency; and his nominal and quondam friends became, as it were, the objects of his aversion.

Antipater was the source of Herod's disquiet and turbulent proceedings. He first suggested, and then exaggerated charges. Nay, he so terrified the king with groundless insinuations, that he fancied Alexander stood before him with a drawn sword ready to assassinate him. Under these frantic apprehensions, he caused him to be taken and bound, and then proceeded to put his adherents to the torture. Many of them died mute, and sacrificed their lives to a good conscience; others, who wanted resolution to bear the torment, framed a falsehood, charged the brothers with plotting against the life of the king as he was upon the chace, and a design afterwards of flying to Rome. Improbable as this story was, it had such an effect upon the credulity and suspicion of the king, that he urged it in his own justification for committing his sons to prison.

Antipater
the cause of the trouble.

Alexander
there, and his friends tortured.

The jealousy of Herod raging to an incurable degree, Alexander dismissed all thoughts of vindicating himself by way of argument, and had recourse to another expedient, which was to concur with his enemies in their declarations, and, by confessing his own guilt, involve them in the same condemnation. To this end he drew up four narratives, acknowledging himself a confederate against the life of his father, with the names of divers of the conspirators, but particularly those of Pheroras and Salome, charging her with forcing him to a criminal intercourse with her.

Entered

der.

Those narratives, which contained the severest allegations against several persons of the first rank, being put into the hands of Herod, it so happened that Archelaus came into Judæa at that very juncture of time, anxious for the deliverance of his daughter and son-in-law from their present very alarming situation. Archelaus managed matters with such art and address, that he restored Herod to the use of his reason, and accomplished a much desired purpose. When he came into his presence, he began to exclaim most bitterly against his son-in-law as a traiterous parricide; to wish for an opportunity of ridding his daughter from such an husband with his own hands, and to lament the taint she had received from intercourse with so flagitious and abandoned a character. He professed the patience of Herod to be miraculous in sparing the life of a conspirator at the hazard of his own, and his wonder at finding Alexander alive. He then soothed him, by observing, that his feelings would be too tender to inflict condign punishment upon so rebellious a son, and therefore requested that he would leave to him to do him right, as he would recommend to his generosity the disposal of his daughter. These specious means, as they caused Herod to abate of his rigour towards Alexander, inflamed him the more against Pheroras, as he was the principal subject of the four narratives, which Herod gave Archelaus to peruse. Every thing appearing opportune for his purpose, Archelaus insinuated himself, by little and little, into the merits of the cause, laying the blame upon the ring-leaders, and chiefly upon Pheroras, and finding the effect of one artifice, had recourse to another.

At last the king was restored to his reason.

He represented to the king, "that, in his opinion, his son was in more danger of being undone by a faction, than he was of being destroyed by his son: that Alexander must be frantic to entertain such a design, as he had already a fair pretence to the succession; that young men were rash, inconsiderate, and easily imposed upon by evil company and corrupt counsels, thro' want of knowledge and experience; and that such was the prevalence of the arts, machinations, machinations, and calumnies of incendiaries, that they were, in general, as irresistible as destructive."

Archelaus gains his point.

Archelaus counsels Pheroras.

Herod began now to coincide with Archelaus in opinion, and think more favourably of Alexander, and worse of Pheroras than he had done; from the substance of the four narratives. Pheroras perceiving the king in a more tractable temper, through the influence of Archelaus, he left Alexander, and had recourse to him; by whom he was told plainly, that he could not possibly exculpate himself from a charge so manifestly proved against him, as the sun was not clearer than the evidence of his being in a conspiracy against the life of his brother; and also of his contrivance of the detraction of Alexander. To enforce his former remarks, he subjoined, that it would tend more to his advantage to give up his evasive manner of behaviour, and frankly confess that part of his charge of which he was conscious of being guilty; that his brother had a natural tenderness for him, by which he might be prevailed upon to pardon him; and that, if he would make the experiment, he would do his utmost to render it effectual.

Pheroras humbles himself before Herod.

Pheroras took the hint, and having assumed the appearance of contrition, both in drefs and countenance, cast himself at Herod's feet, made confession, implored forgiveness, and urged, as a plea for his behaviour, the foolish passion he had for a woman, which transported him beyond the bounds of reason and duty. Pheroras having thus made his confession, and pleaded for his pardon, Archelaus availed himself of that circumstance to work Herod into a more complacent humour.

Herod becomes an advocate for Alexander.

Archelaus having now softened Herod towards Pheroras, to carry on his design, treated Alexander with reproaches and menaces, and, in the conclusion, threatened to take away his daughter. This seeming fierceness of Archelaus wrought so sensibly upon Herod, that he became an advocate for his son, and made his suite to Archelaus not to annul the marriage. His answer was, that, out of the reverence he had for the rights of alliance, he was content to leave his daughter at Herod's disposal, provided only that he should not give her to Alexander. But all this was counterfeit and disguise. Herod was averse to a disunion; and observed, that, as they had children, and their affection was so evidently mutual, it would be death to part them: besides, it would be a perpetual barrier to the domestic felicity of the family.

Archelaus reconciles him to his father.

This conversation was no sooner at an end, than Archelaus retired, and, in a very short time, returned, bringing with him Alexander, whom he reconciled to his father. He approved of Herod's resolution to go to Rome, with an account to Cæsar of the late transactions, as he had written at large to him upon that subject. Thus did Archelaus accomplish his purpose, and deliver his son-in-law from impending danger. The reconciliation was celebrated with festivity, and most agreeable entertainments. Herod presented Archelaus, on his departure, with seventy talents, a throne set with precious stones, a train of eunuchs, and a concubine, called Panychis. All his great officers and friends were treated, by Herod's express order, with rich presents, according to their rank; the king himself, and his nobility, conducting him on his way as far as Antioch.

Eurycles defeats the projects of Archelaus.

There came a person into Judæa not long after this, a man of superior policy to Archelaus, one who not only overthrew the project of Alexander's reconciliation to his father, but so ordered matters, that he brought Alexander himself to his end. His name was Eurycles, a Lacedæmonian by birth, a man so exorbitantly luxurious and profuse, that the revenue of a prince would not answer his demands. He made Herod several valuable presents, which being deemed allurements to conciliate his friendship, were returned by gifts of much greater value. He used divers means to conciliate the favour of Herod, and, through captivating speeches, and the grossest flattery, wrought so effectually upon his temper and disposition, that whatever he said or did met with his approbation. By this parasitical behaviour he acquired great interest at court: besides, being a Spartan, they had a respect for his country as well as his person.

When Eurycles discovered the factions and divisions that prevailed in Herod's family, and marked how the king stood affected towards the different parties, he took up his residence with Antipater, and pretending a mighty regard for Alexander, related to him the good offices that had passed between him and Archelaus. This served as a passport to Alexander, who not only gave credit to the tale himself, but possessed his brother Aristobulus with the belief of it also. When Eurycles had founded the different parties, he assumed divers forms and modes of proceeding, as the case required; his grand business being to obtain money from Antipater, and to betray Alexander. To this end he intimated to the former, "that it was surprizing to him, that, as the eldest son, and next heir to the crown, he could suffer himself to be imposed on by pretenders to his just right." To Alexander he expressed his astonishment, "that the son and husband of a great prince could endure to see the son of a private woman interpolate betwixt him and the crown, especially having a patron of such weight and importance as king Archelaus." This duplicity gained ground with each party, upon the credit of professing a friendship for Archelaus. Alexander was so far from distrust, that he took Eurycles into close confidence, and disclosed every particular to him relative to the affair with Antipater, observing that it was no matter of surprize that Herod, who deprived the mother of life, should deprive the son of the kingdom. Eurycles expressed, both in countenance and gesture, his horror at the inhumanity of such a practice; and by engaging Aristobulus in the discourse, entangled him in the same snare. When this arch impostor had derived the necessary information from them both, he went to Antipater, and related to him the story, with some additional circumstances of his own, insinuating, that the conspiracy was upon the point of execution, and the king's life every moment more and more in danger. Antipater presented him with a considerable sum of money for this important service, and a recommendatory word to his father over and above; in consequence of which, he offered himself as an evidence against the brothers. He then went to Herod, and thus addressed him:

His main end and design.

Eurycles inveighs against Alexander to Herod.

"I am here come in gratitude to acknowledge all your favours, and to give you your very life in requital. It is now a long time that your death has been resolved upon; inasmuch that Alexander had a drawn sword in his hand once, with a full determination to have done the deed. And let me tell you, Sire, this horrid wickedness had been completed, if I had not put a respite to the dispatch, by seeming to approve of the thing, and offering myself to join in the exploit. What! says Alexander, cannot Herod content himself with the usurpation of a kingdom, the death of my mother, and the renting the government to pieces, without declaring that pitiful wretch Antipater his successor, to the scandal of all crowned heads? But it belongs to me to do justice to the manes of Hyrcanus and Mariamne: neither would it be consistent that the government should descend from such a father to such a son without blood. Not a day passes over my head without fresh arguments and provocations. If I drop but a syllable upon the subject of honourable families and extraction, Herod upbraids me with it as an affront that strikes at him. When I am a hunting with him, if I say nothing, Why do not you talk? he cries: or if I talk, Why do you not hold your tongue? Nay, I cannot so much as commend him, but he suspects my truth. I can do nothing, in fine, to his liking; and it is only Antipater that has the good fortune to please him. So that (says Alexander) if this plot should miscarry, I had rather be in my grave than outlive the disaster. If it succeeds, I can easily get off to my father-in-law, and thence to Cæsar, who knows but little, alas! of this history, or of the temper of Herod. I shall not now stand trembling

ling

"ling when I come to Rome, ■ formerly, under the awe of a severe father, who was then present: nor shall I much insist upon private injuries done to myself, but rather turn my discourse to public grievances; as horrible corruptions and oppressions, and the squandering away of exorbitant impositions in luxury and pleasure. I shall shew which way they went, and into what hands; the miserable slavery of the cities, and the true reasons of it: And, to conclude, I shall deliver such an history of the death of my grandfather Hyrcanus, and my mother Mariamne, and make such a discovery of the wickedness of the prince, that no man living, after these necessary truths, shall ever deem me the murderer of my father."

When Eurycles had finished this invective against Alexander, he turned the remainder of his discourse into ■ panegyric upon Antipater, declaring him to be the only son that truly loved his father, and put a seasonable stop to the progress of the design. The king, still labouring under his former jealousies, took fire at this hint; so that it was now the business of Antipater to inflame his passion, by producing new witnesses against the brothers. The evidence was this: "That Alexander and Aristobulus held a private correspondence with Jucundus and Tyrannus, two officers of horse, who, for some misdemeanor, had been dismissed from their command."

A charge against the brothers.

Two officers put to the torture.

This information so enraged Herod, that he commanded them immediately to be put to the torture. They denied any further knowledge of the matter, than that a certain letter was sent from Alexander, as to the governor of Alexandria, desiring him to receive himself and his brother Aristobulus into the castle, in case of their father's death; and to furnish them both with arms, and other necessities, if that event should happen. Alexander charged this letter as a forgery of Diophantes, an enterprising man, and very expert at counterfeiting hands; besides which, he was the king's secretary; and it is to be observed, that he suffered death for forgery. The governor of the castle was also tortured, but made no confession. The brothers were honourably acquitted; yet Eurycles, that pest of society, and projector of this vile accusation, was applauded by Herod as his friend and preserver, and rewarded with fifty talents for his services.

The brothers acquitted of the charge.

Eurycles is exiled.

Two characters contrasted.

This abandoned wretch, before Archelaus could have any certain information of the imprisonment of the brothers, went to him by stealth, and had the effrontery to assure him, that he himself had effected ■ reconciliation betwixt Herod and his son Alexander. From thence he went into Achaia with his treasure, and spent it in riot and luxury; till, in the end, he was arraigned by Cæsar, for sedition and oppressive practices, and condemned to banishment. This was the punishment he suffered for his abominable practices.

It will be very pertinent in this place, to adduce the character of Evaratus, of Coos, in opposition to that of Eurycles, of Sparta. He was one of Alexander's most intimate friends, and was at Herod's court at the same time with Eurycles. The king demanded of him, upon his honour, what credit he gave to the report of the conspiracy, and to the accusation given out upon it. Evaratus declared upon oath, that he never heard the most distant hint of any such design from either of the brothers. This testimony, however, was of no avail to them; for Herod was so open to calumny, as to be entirely prepossessed by it; nor was there any other method of obtaining his favour, than by saying, doing, and believing as he did.

Salome incites Herod against his sons.

In the mean time Salome exasperated Herod against his sons, in order to secure herself. Aristobulus cautioned her, as a relation, to take care of her words and actions; intimating, that she was still in danger from Herod, as she lay under a second charge for the same crime of which she had been accused before; which was, that she had entered into a contract of marriage with Syllæus, the Arabian, though she knew him to be the king's enemy; and that she gave him, from time to time, secret information of the king's council. This caution proved eventually the very means of the ruin of the brothers; for Salome acquainting the king with it, he was transported to such an impetuous passion, that he commanded them to be separated, and laid in chains.

They are put in prison.

In his fury he dispatched Volumnius, a general of his army, and Olympius, one of his chief friends, to Cæsar, with copies of the proceedings. The emperor, upon reading them, was much affected by the situation of the princes, but, at the same time, very fearful of exerting his civil power to the prejudice of the natural feelings of a father over his children; so that he returned Herod for answer, "That he was master over himself, and those that belonged to him; but that he thought it advisable to call an assembly of respectable persons, to enquire into the conspiracy, and proceed to justice according to substantiated evidence."

Transmits an account to Cæsar.

His answer.

The emperor having pointed out Berytus as the place of meeting, Herod, in conformity to his direction, called a council there. It was composed of Saturninus and Pedanius, ambassadors; Volumnius, the governor of the province; the friends and relations of Herod; not omitting Salome and Pheroras; the principal men of Syria, Archelaus only excepted, Herod having suspicion of him as father-in-law of Alexander. The council did not approve of bringing the sons into court, and from prudential causes; for their very presence would have tended to excite compassion; and if they had been heard in their own vindication, Alexander, with the greatest ease, would have baffled all their objections; so that they were rather kept under custody at Platane, ■ village of Sidonia.

A council held at Berytus about the fate of Herod.

When the king stood up, he began to inveigh against his sons with great acrimony, and exhibit tokens of passion as if they had been present. Touching on the subject of the conspiracy his voice faltered, and he seemed rather disposed to pass it over, because he was destitute of evidence; but when he came to specify expressions, indignities, injuries, and instances of disobedience respecting himself, he was abundantly vociferous, giving the assembly to understand, that those reproaches were worse to him than death; and finding every allegation pass without contradiction, he only lamented his own unhappiness in gaining a cause so ruinous to himself; and then called upon the court to proceed to pass sentence.

Herod accuses his sons.

Saturninus gave it as his opinion, that the brothers deserved to be punished, but not with death, as it was by no means just in him, who had three sons present in the assembly, to pass sentence upon those who were absent. The two ambassadors were of the same mind, as were others who spoke after them. The first who voted for sentence of death was Volumnius, and others followed him, as they were influenced by their passions or interest; but none from a principle of ill-will to the prisoners.

Debate on the sentence.

Sentence of death passed.

Judæa and Syria were in dread and suspense for the issue of this affair; though it could hardly be supposed that Herod could be so inexorably cruel as to be the murderer of his own offspring: but so destitute was he of the feelings of nature, that he sent his sons in chains to Tyre, and thence by sea to Cæsarea, deliberating, at the same time, on the means of their execution.

There was a certain old officer of the king's much attached to the princes, and whose son was upon terms of friendship with Alexander. His name was Tyro; and being greatly incensed at the proceedings of Herod, he went up and down exclaiming, in a fit of phrenzy, "that justice was trampled on, and truth lost; that nothing but iniquity prevailed in the world; and that there was neither humanity or natural affection to be found among mankind." He had even the resolution to go to the king himself, and remonstrate with him to this effect: "Of all men living, Sir, you are certainly the most inexorable, in believing the allegations of the most abandoned characters to the prejudice of your best friends. Permit me to point out

The reflection of Tyro.

“out Pheroras and Salome as persons you have “pronounced deserving of death; yet upon their “testimony you are about to take away the lives of “your sons. You do not consider that, when the “right heirs are removed, they will have, in the “succession of Antipater, a king framed to their “purpose. But let him beware of the soldiery;
“they will not tamely suffer the massacre to pass “unavenged, as they compassionate the case of the “unfortunate princes; and there is not a man of “honour but murmurs at such foul proceedings.”
Tyro, upon this, named several of the malcontents, who were instantly removed, by order of the king;
and the old officer and his son were put into cultody.

Evidence of Tryphon against Tyro.
There was one Tryphon, at that time the king's tonsor, suborned to exhibit himself suddenly as a witness, and depose, “that Tyro offered him a considerable reward, in the name of Alexander, to dispatch the king during the operation of shaving.”
Upon this allegation Tyro, his son, and the tonsor, were ordered to be put to the question. Tyro and his son denied the charge, and Tryphon was wholly silent; whereupon Herod commanded Tyro's torments to be increased, when his son, from filial piety to his father, promised the king a discovery of the whole transaction, on condition of his granting him a pardon. The old man being taken from the torture, the son declared, that his father had been intigated by Alexander to take away the life of the king. This was, in general, supposed to be an evasion of the son; yet there were those that gave credit to it. Herod, in an harangue to the public, soon after this, took occasion to inveigh against some officers of rank, together with Tyro, by which the rabble were so exasperated, that they fell upon those officers, Tyro, and Tryphon, and stoned them to death. Herod caused his sons to be strangled at Sebastæ, and their dead bodies carried to Alexandria, and there deposited by the remains of Alexander, their mother's uncle. This was the end of Alexander and Aristobulus.

Antipater conspires against the life of his father. Dissimulation and duplicity of Herod. The wives and leus. The insolence of Antipater. Cabal of women. Foul practices charged upon Salome. Herod him his successor. A design upon the life of Herod proved against Sylleus.

Antipater
was secretly
treacherous.
ANTIPATER had so far wrought upon the credulity and suspicion of his father, that he entertained not a doubt of succeeding to the throne of Judæa; but, through one continued scene of falshood and perfidy, he had rendered himself obnoxious to the people. Nor was he free from apprehension that the children of the murdered brothers would revenge the deaths of their parents. Alexander had by Glaphyra two sons, Tigranes and Alexander: Aristobulus had by Berenice, the daughter of Salome, Herod, Agrippa, and Aristobulus; and two daughters, Herodias and Mariamne. Glaphyra was sent away with her portion into Cappa-docia, after the death of Alexander; and Berenice, the widow of Aristobulus, was married to the uncle of Antipater, who promoted this marriage to effect a reconciliation with Salome, and put an end to all dissention. Antipater plied Pheroras with compliments and presents, and conciliated the esteem of Cæsar's friends, by sending vast sums of money to Rome to engage them in his interest. Nor was he less bountiful to Saturninus, and the rest of his friends in Syria. But this munificence, instead of conciliating their esteem, incurred their contempt, as they considered it as arising from a notion of fear. Indeed, he was generally obnoxious to the people, notwithstanding his liberalities, as they were convinced of the malevolence of his disposition, and the fallacy of his conduct.

Antipater
was secretly
treacherous.

Herod, having summoned his friends and kindred, sent for the young princes, and, with tears of compassion, addressed them in words to the following effect:

“You have here before you the children of an “unfortunate family. Their fathers have been “taken from me by a sad fate, and I find myself “bound in humanity to do the best I can for the “orphans, in discharging the part of a grandfather
“more to my satisfaction than I did that of a fa“ther. In pursuance of this purpose, I shall make “it my care, in the first place, to put these chil“dren in good hands, and under the charge of the “best friends I shall leave behind me when I am “gone. To begin with you, Pheroras, I would “have you marry your daughter to Alexander's “eldest son, and supply the place of a father and “guardian. As for your part, Antipater, I would “have your son to take one of the daughters of “Aristobulus, under which relation you will be as “good as a parent to the orphan. As for my son “Herod, the grandchild of Simon, the high-priest, “by the mother's side, let him marry the other “sister. This is my will and desire, and no rela“tive that has any regard or kindness for me will “dispute it. Thus I would have it; and I beseech “God to prosper these alliances to the comfort of “my kingdom and family, and grant in mercy “that the children may be looked upon with a more “favourable eye than their fathers.”

Herod com-passionates
the children of Alexander and A-ristobulus.

With this benediction Herod concluded; and joining the hands of the princes, and weeping over them, affectionately embraced, and then dismissed them. This instance of Herod's behaviour greatly alarmed Antipater; nor could he conceal his surprise, as he considered the respect paid to the fathers, thro' the children, as a degradation to himself.
This he likewise imagined would be a means of supplanting him; especially if Pheroras, the tetrarch, should join interest with Archelaus in favour of the sons of Alexander. He also considered the universal hatred he had incurred, the compassion of the people for the fatherless children, and, in fine, the concern the whole nation had for the living children, and reverence for the memory of the dead, of whom he was deemed little better than the mur-derer. These circumstances duly weighed, Antipater had no other remedy but to dissolve the contracts; a point of the greatest difficulty, as Herod, being rather rigid and suspicious, was not to be wrought upon by craft and circumvention. He therefore adopted a more frank and open manner of proceeding, and desired him, with all modesty and deference, that he would deign him the honour of which he thought him worthy, as without it all other grants were but the mere shadows of a kingdom without the substance, as would certainly be the case, if Alexander's son should not only have Archelaus for his grandfather, but Pheroras also for his father-in-law. Antipater pressed Herod, with vehement importunity, to change the disposition of the marriages, which might easily be done, as he had so numerous a family.

Herod had nine wives, and children by seven of them. Antipater by Doris; Herod by Mariamne, the daughter of the high-priest; Antipas and Ar-chelaus by Malthace, a Samaritan, and a daughter, Olympias, whom his brother Joseph married; Herod and Philip by Cleopatra, of Jerusalem; and Phasaël by Pallas. He had also two other daughters, Roxana and Salome; the one by Phædra, the other by Elpis; and two wives that had no children; the one was the daughter of his brother, the other his cousin-german. Besides these, he had, by Mariamne, the two sisters of Alexander and Aristobulus. Since therefore the royal family was so numerous, Antipater requested him to change the intended marriages.

Herod's wives and children.

The king perceived by this time the disposition of Antipater towards his children, and was very much disturbed at it, lest he should follow his own example, and dispatch the survivors as he had done their predecessors. In this humour he commanded him

him to quit his presence; but was soon after prevailed upon, by soothing flattery, to vary his project; so that he gave to Antipater himself the daughter of Aristobulus, and married the son to the daughter of Pheroras. This circumstance evidently proves the ascendancy of Antipater over the mind of Herod, in effecting that in which his own sister, aided by the interest of the empress Julia, had failed before. For when Salome was disposed to marry Syllæus, the Arabian, and engaged Julia to intercede in her behalf, Herod not only opposed the match, and rejected the intercession, but bound himself by oath to treat her as the greatest enemy if she did not give up the project. He caused her, against her consent, to be married to Alexas, a friend of his; and to give one of her daughters to his son, and the other to the uncle of Antipater by the mother's side. He also gave one of the daughters of Mariamne to Antipater, his sister's son; and the other to his brother's son, Phasael.

Insolence of Antipater.

When matters were thus changed, and every thing settled to the mind of Antipater, and consequently to the manifest exclusion of the orphans, his audacity became intolerable. As he was convinced he had incurred the hatred of the people, he founded his security on rendering himself a terror to them. Besides, Pheroras treated him as a prince established in his sovereignty.

faction.

New disturbances were now excited at court by a cabal of women; for the wife, mother, and sister of Pheroras, together with the mother of Antipater, behaved with insolence even towards the king's daughters, with which Antipater was well pleased, as he held them in utter detestation. The rest of the women stood all in awe of the cabal, except Salome, who informed the king of their private consultations, and pointed out to him that they did not tend to the promotion of his interest. When the women came to understand that the king had notice of these meetings, and took great offence at them, they desisted from their caballing, and pretended, in his hearing, to be at enmity with one another. Antipater availed himself of this dissimulation, and, in public, opposed the measures of Pheroras; but they had still private entertainments and consultations in the night; though nothing escaped the knowledge of Salome, who acquainted Herod with every particular.

Foul charges against the wife of Pheroras.

This put him in a rage, especially against the wife of Pheroras, upon whom Salome laid the greatest stress. Herod, upon this, called a council of his friends, and, among other foul practices, complained against her for insulting his daughters, engaging the Pharisees in opposition to him, and giving his brother a potion to render him his enemy. At length he turned to Pheroras, and asked him which of the two he would part with, his brother or his wife? Pheroras replied, that he would part with life itself rather than with his beloved wife. Herod, struck with this resolute answer, directed his speech to Antipater, and charged him to hold no intercourse either with Pheroras or his wife, or any person belonging to her. Antipater pretended compliance with the king's injunctions in public, though he continued to attend the nocturnal meetings. However, for fear of discovery, he so ordered matters with some friends he had in Italy, that letters were written to Herod by all means to send Antipater to Rome, to pay his court to Cæsar. Upon this invitation Herod immediately provided him a splendid equipage, furnished him with money, and dispatched him for Rome, with his last will and testament, wherein he declared Antipater his successor; and after Antipater, Herod, whom he had by Mariamne, the daughter of the high-priest.

Syllæus repairs this injury.

Syllæus, the Arabian, went also at this time to Rome, without any regard to Cæsar's injunctions, to dispute the same cause again with Antipater, that he had formerly defended against Nicolaus. It was a controversy of great moment that he had with Aretas, his own king, having put several of his friends to death, and, amongst the rest, Sohemus, the most eminent person for wealth and power in the whole city of Petra. He likewise corrupted Tabatus, one of Cæsar's governors, with a sum of money, to assist him against Herod; but Herod, by out-bidding, induced him to leave Syllæus, and made him receiver of his duties. Syllæus, finding that he came to no account, gave Augustus to understand, by way of complaint, that Tabatus was not Cæsar's governor, but Herod's. This provocation transported Tabatus to such a degree, that, being as yet in great credit with Herod, he went and betrayed Syllæus to him, telling the king that he had engaged Corinthus, one of his guards, for a sum of money, to join with him in a conspiracy; advising withal, that he might be forthwith taken into custody. The king complied; for this Corinthus, though he had his education in the court, was by birth an Arabian; so that Herod ordered not only him to be apprehended, but two Arabians who were found with him. One of them was a friend of Syllæus, the other the head of a tribe. This last being put to the question, confessed that they had prevailed with Corinthus, for a large sum of money, to undertake the killing of the king. Saturninus, the governor of Syria, took the examinations, and sent them away to Rome.

Pheroras is banished the court, and retires to his own tetrarchy. Herod falls sick, and sends for Pheroras, who refuses to visit him. Herod recovers, and Pheroras becomes indisposed. Herod visits him. Death of Pheroras. Evidence of his being poisoned at the instance of Syllæus. Insolence of Antipater towards his father. Herod is inexorable. Testimony of the widow of Pheroras. His own confession at his death. Proof adduced of Mariamne's being in the plot.

HEROD continued his importunities with Pheroras to put away his wife. He found abundant cause to hate her, but could not devise any means of bringing her to punishment, till, in a frantic outrage, he banished both herself and her husband the court. Pheroras submitted to the disgrace very patiently, and retired to his tetrarchy, binding himself, by an oath, never to return during the life of Herod; so that nothing but his death should put an end to his banishment. Herod soon after fell into a dangerous fit of sickness, and sent several times for Pheroras, having something of moment to communicate to him before he died. But Pheroras could not be prevailed upon to go; and Herod, on the other hand, beyond all expectation, recovered. Pheroras, a little after this, became indisposed himself, and the king, his brother, upon that occasion, displayed some degree of humanity, for he not only made him a visit, but gave him singular proofs of fraternal affection. The disease, however, carried him off in a short time. Though Herod had evinced this kindness for his brother in his expiring moments, a rumour went forth that he had caused him to be destroyed by poison. The body, however, was conveyed to Jerusalem, where public mourning, and a most pompous funeral, were appointed. This was the end of one of the murderers of Alexander and Aristobulus.

banished the court of Herod.

His death.

But the punishment was soon transferred to the author Antipater, and took its rise from the death of Pheroras; for certain of his freemen, in the agony of their passion for so irreparable a loss, went boldly to the king, and told him, "that his brother had been destroyed by poison; that his wife had brought him something prepared after an unusual manner; that, upon eating it, he fell into his distemper; that the mother and sister of Antipater, two days before, brought a woman out of Arabia, that was skilled in drugs, in order to prepare a love potion for Pheroras; that, instead thereof, she had given him deadly poison; and that this was done at the instigation of Syllæus, who was well acquainted with this woman."

Enquiry
concerning the death
of Pheroras.

So many suspicions started, and the presumptions were so strong, that the king ordered the putting of several several persons, bond and free, to the question. A female servant exclaimed, in the agony of her torture, "May the Almighty, ruler of heaven and earth, avenge himself and us upon the mother of Antipater, for all the miseries we suffer for her sake!" The king availed himself of this confession, and proceeded to further enquiry into the truth of the matter. Another woman laid open the whole circumstance of the familiarity betwixt the mother of Antipater and Pheroras and his women; the clandestine meetings; that Pheroras and Antipater, when they came from court, regaled together all night, nor would admit a servant into the chamber. It was one of the free-women that gave this evidence.

When the witnesses came to be examined apart, there was such an agreement in their informations, that the truth of the charge was no longer to be doubted. It was occurred to Herod, that Antipater's withdrawing to Rome, and Pheroras's procuring his own banishment, were only contrivances to get out of the way: for they had often been heard to say, "that, after the taking off Alexander and Aristobulus, they must prepare for their turns; since, from the execrable murder of his own wife and children, they had no ground to expect to fare better; and the only fence against such a monster of barbarity was to be out of his reach."

The women deposed further, that Antipater would often complain to his mother, "that he had already grey hairs on his head; that his father grew younger every day; that perhaps he might die before he came to govern; that, in case of the death of Herod, the enjoyment of the succession would be but transitory, as those heads of Hydra, the sons of Alexander and Aristobulus, were shooting up; that he was deprived, by his father, of the hope of being succeeded by his children, as Herod, the son of Mariamne, was appointed to succeed him; that, in this point, Herod was plainly distracted, to think that his testament should take place therein, as he would take care that none of his posterity should remain, being, of all parents, most averse to his children, and more so, if possible, to his brother, as appeared from his giving him an hundred talents to hold no intercourse with Pheroras; that, however, though they could expect nothing but inhumanity and barbarity from such a monster, if they had but the hearts and hands of men, they might assert their rights and liberties another way."

To this confession it was added, that Pheroras had some thoughts of flying with them to Petra. The discovery was clear upon the whole; but the most corroborating circumstance to Herod was that of the hundred talents, for he had only mentioned that particular to Antipater. He first vented his rage against Doris, his mother; took from her all her jewels and trinkets, which he had purchased for her at an immense charge, and then ejected her from the palace. After this he caused the women of Pheroras to be tortured to death; though he trembled all the while, and was distracted between fears and jealousies: nay, he was so rigid in inflicting punishments, that he put the innocent to the torture without distinction, lest any of the guilty should escape.

The next that passed examination was Antipater, the Samaritan, and steward to Antipater, the king's son. It appeared, upon putting him to the torture, that Antipater sent for poison into Egypt, by Antipater, his friend, with a design upon the king's life, which he received from Theudim, the uncle of Antipater, and, upon his order, delivered it to Pheroras, who had taken upon him to execute the design while he was at Rome, and, from distance of situation, freed from suspicion; and that he committed the care of the poison to his wife.

Herod sent for the widow of Pheroras, and commanded her, without delay, to shew him the secret she had received. She went out, on a pretence to fetch it, but cast herself headlong from the top of the house, to prevent both the torture and the discovery. But Divine Providence would not suffer Antipater to escape thus, for her fall was not mortal. She was taken up, and carried to the king, who, as soon as she recovered herself, demanded of her to tell him the cause of so desperate an act, assuring her, upon his oath, that if she spoke the truth, she should have no farther punishment; but if she deviated from that, she should die upon the rack, without being allowed the rites of a funeral.

By this time she recovered her senses, and thus rapturously expressed herself:

"Am I to keep secrets now Pheroras is dead and gone, in favour of Antipater, that has been the destruction of us all? Great prince! Give me the hearing, and I call that God, who cannot be deceived, to bear witness to the truth of what I say. When you were upon a visit to Pheroras in his sickness, and weeping over him, my husband called me to him. See, my dear wife, says he, how much I have been mistaken in my opinion of my brother's kindness to me; for, in plain terms, I hated him, and meditated the death of this man, that shewed so generous a pity for me in my distress, (though yet among the living;) but I have the just reward of my iniquity. Fetch me immediately the remainder of the poison that Antipater gave you to keep, and burn it before my face; else I shall carry the vengeance of a troubled conscience into the other world. I brought it as I was bid, and threw the greater part of the poison into the fire before his eyes: the rest I reserved for a time of need."

Pheroras's declaration and confession at his death.

With these words she produced a box, containing a little of the poison. The brother and mother of Antipater were then put to the question, and their information was, that Antipater brought that box out of Egypt, and that he received the poison from a brother of his at Alexandrion, that practised physic. It was now evident that Mariamne, the daughter of the high-priest, was concerned in the plot, as appeared from her brothers upon the question. But Herod punished the mother in the son, for he struck her son Herod out of his will, in which he had formerly declared him his successor.

C H A P. XX.

Antipater convicted by Bathyllus. Perfidy and villainy of Antipater. He is ordered to prepare for his trial. The court meets, and witnesses are produced. A plausible discourse of Herod to Varus. Nicolaus enters upon the proofs. Antipater's defence. Nicolaus very severe upon him. The evidences of the poison produced in order. Antipater in a plot with Acme against Salome. A resolution taken to put Antipater to death; but the indisposition of Herod prevents the execution. Herod erases Antipater from his will, appoints Antipas to the succession, and settles his legacies.

THE last and convictive evidence was Bathyllus, one of Antipater's freemen, who was just returned from Rome, and brought with him the poison of an asp, and other serpents, for Pheroras and his wife to compleat the work, if other attempts should fail. He brought also, as an addition to Antipater's devices against his father, several letters, which he had written to the prejudice of his brothers Archelaus and Philip, though they were princes of most generous dispositions.

The evidence of Bathyllus.

Archelaus and Philip were at that time at Rome, pursuing their studies. They were youths of promising genius, and consequently such objects of envy to Antipater, that he entertained no hopes of gaining his point, unless he could get them removed. To this end he forged letters against them, in the names of several of his friends at Rome. Some of them

Antipater's foul practices against his brothers them insinuated the irreverent manner in which they had treated their father, openly bewailing the deaths of Alexander and Aristobulus, and discovering much reluctance at their being recalled, a circumstance that gave Antipater more disquiet than all the rest. Antipater, indeed, was in a practice of forgery and secret intelligence even before he left Judæa, and procured letters from Rome to Herod upon the same subject, while he himself, to evade suspicion, applied himself to his father as a kind of advocate for his brothers, alledging that some of the charges contained in the letters were false, and others only the effects of youthful folly. The intelligence he obtained to circumvent his brothers was attended with great expence; to compensate which, he purchased a variety of rich apparel, furniture, gold and silver plate, and several other curiosities of great value, to the amount of two hundred talents, which he placed to the account of the suit they had with Syllæus, to disguise the subornations.

Antipater is held in universal detestation.

But, notwithstanding these artful practices, the whole country rang with the parricide, and all witnesses and letters concurred to prove repeated designs upon the lives of the brothers; yet not one that came to Rome took any notice of the present state of Herod's family, though seven months had intervened between his conviction and his return. Indeed, he was an object of universal detestation; so that their silence might arise from a desire of seeing justice executed upon so many horrid murders. He then wrote from Rome, informing Herod that he was upon the return, after having been most honourably dismissed by Cæsar.

Prosecutes his journey from Rome.

His friends are divided concerning it.

The king, being desirous of securing this plotter, in order to divert him from any precaution, dissimulated his anger in his epistle to him, and, in a familiar style, desired him to be with him as soon as possible; upon which condition he would lay aside the complaints he had against his mother; for Antipater knew she had been ejected from the palace. The first news he had of the death of Pheroras was by a letter he received at Tarentum, which very much affected him. Some looked upon his lamentation as the result of the feelings of nature; but others, with much greater reason, imputed it not to his tenderness for Pheroras, but his concern for the loss of so necessary an instrument for the execution of his plot. He was also under some apprehension of being detected. However, upon his receiving the king's letter when he came into Cilicia, he pursued his journey with all expedition. At his coming to Celendris, he had a kind of foreboding of his mother's state and condition. The most cautious of his friends advised him not to go rashly to his father, till he had learned the cause of his mother's ejection, lest he should be involved in the calumnies that had been cast upon her. But those who were less considerate, and preferred the sight of their native country to his interest, persuaded him to hasten his return, lest delay should raise suspicion, and suggest matter for his enemies to work upon. For if any thing should be moved against him, he could not clear himself in his absence; but if present, they would be more circumspect in their proceedings. They added, it would be absurd to deprive himself of a kingdom from uncertain suspicion: so that, from these specious representations, Antipater seems to have been actuated by the fatality of an impulse to prosecute his voyage to Sebaste, a port of Cæsarea.

He proceeds to Sebaste, and is treated with cold contempt.

Has recourse to disguise and duplicity.

Upon his arrival, to his great surprize, he found himself universally thunned. He was, indeed, as much detested there as upon his former visit, but the people were not so much at liberty to shew their aversion. Some were fearful of incurring the displeasure of the king; for the country was filled with rumours concerning Antipater, and himself was the only person that was ignorant of them. Never was man dismissed more magnificently when he set out upon his voyage to Rome, or treated with more ignominy and contempt upon his return, than was Antipater. He suspected the broils that prevailed in Herod's family, but concealed his apprehensions as much as possible, and assumed a chearful countenance to veil a perplexed mind. There was no possibility of escaping, nor had he any view of extricating himself from the difficulties with which he was encompassed. Nor could he obtain any certain intelligence of the affairs of the royal family from the menaces the king had issued; so that he had some intervals of hope, either that things were not discovered, or that, in case of extremity, he might bring himself off by confidence and imposture, the only means upon which he relied.

Herod's jealousy, his treacherous embraces.

Encouraged by these hopes, he advanced to the palace without his train; for they had been contemptuously repulsed at the first gate. It so happened that Varus, the governor of Syria, was then present. Antipater, at his entrance, with his usual effrontery, approached his father with a dutiful salutation; but Herod rejected his embraces, exclaiming against his presumption as a parricide, and denouncing a curse upon him, till he had cleared himself of the crimes alledged to his charge. He also assured him he should be judged by Varus, who would pass sentence according to his demerit; and then ordered him to depart, and prepare for his defence the next day, that being all the time allowed him. Antipater was so confounded, that, without reply, he took his departure. He was afterwards visited by his wife and mother, who informed him of the evidence they had procured to substantiate the charge, which induced him to reflect on the most effectual means of defence.

Antipater prepares for his trial.

Upon the following day Herod summoned a court composed of his kindred and friends; ordered the friends of Antipater to attend also; and, together with Varus, ascended the bench. He caused all the witnesses to be brought in, among whom were certain domestic servants of Doris, who had brought letters from the mother to the son, purporting, "that, since every thing had been discovered by Herod, he should be cautious of coming near him, unless he could prevail upon Cæsar to afford him his protection." When the witnesses were introduced, Antipater entered the court, and throwing himself at his father's feet, supplicated the grant of an impartial hearing, without prejudging his cause; as, in that case, he entertained not a doubt of demonstrating his innocence.

Appears before the court.

Herod vehemently enjoined him to hold his peace, and then thus addressed himself to Varus.

"I do certainly know that you, Varus, or any other unbiassed judge, will be fully satisfied that Antipater deserves to die: but I am afraid, in the mean time, of the opinion you may conceive of my invidious fortune, as if this calamity had justly befallen me for being the father of such children. I have some right, however, to your humanity and compassion, for having been so indulgent a father to such profligate wretches. As for the young princes that are gone, I designed them for the government, and trained them up at Rome, in the court and favour of Cæsar, the better to prepare them for the exercise of royal dignity: and none, at last, were so great enemies to my peace and safety, as those that I had raised even to be the envy of princes. Antipater made his profit of their ruin; for he found his account in it, as a security to himself in the succession. What is now the requital this monster designs me for all these tokens of favour, but the entering into a practice against my life? I was likely to live too long, he thought: nay, I had lived too long already; that was his grievance. The crown alone would not content him, it seems, unless he made his way to it through the blood of his father. And in this truly he seemed to have some colour of reason, for my bringing him back to court out of a private condition, to the exclusion of the sons I had by the queen, in declaring him my successor.

Herod's address to Varus.

"To confess myself to you, Varus, I am convinced of my error. I did not do well to provoke my sons, by cutting off the succession, to their injury."

"jury, in favour of Antipater: for what did I ever do for them comparable to what I did for him? He had a very great part of the administration settled upon him during the continuance of my life, and the succession after my death; and, beside other gratifications, a separate revenue of fifty talents, and his expences every where upon my charge: three hundred talents upon his voyage to Rome: and himself the only person of my whole family that I recommended to Cæsar as my preserver. Take them altogether, they had not half the wickedness in them of Antipater: the proofs against them were infinitely short of what I have against him; and yet this daring wretch has the face to plead innocent, and does not despair, I perceive, of baffling the truth by imposture. Varus, look to yourself; for he will tell his tale well: but I know the monster through all his disguises.

"This is the man that was so earnest with me, in time past, to have a care of Alexander, and how I exposed my person. How often would he come into my bed-chamber, and search about, for fear of treachery! This man was my guardian, and my security, while I slept; my comforter in my mourning for the dead brothers; and one that would undertake for the duty of those that were living: my champion, in line, and my guard. When I call to mind, and consider the address and hypocrisy of this man, how artfully he laid his snares, and covered his designs, I can hardly think myself alive at this day, or how it was possible for me to escape the danger. But since my fate willed it so, and that my greatest enemies are to be those of my own family, and those I have been the kindest to, I shall only deplore the hardship of my inevitable destiny, and keep my sorrows to myself; but with this resolution, that not one man comes off that shall be found guilty of thirsting after my blood, though the whole house should fall in the condemnation."

Herod, being then interrupted by the confusion of his mind, directed Nicolaus, one of his council, to produce the evidence against Antipater, who being prostrate before the king, raised his head, and, in an exclamatory tone, thus proceeded:

"You have had the goodness, Sire, to plead my cause: for how can I be a parricide, and yet recorded by yourself for your preserver? If my piety be only imposture and pretence, as you are pleased to say it is, how came I to be so crafty in one case, and so ignorant in another, as not to understand, that, though men may be imposed upon, yet the all-searching and all-seeing eye of God, that knows our hearts, will not suffer so great a wickedness to pass unpunished? God's vengeance overtook my brothers because of their unfortunateness to you. But what temptation had I now to practise upon your life? The hope of a kingdom? Why, I did reign in fact already. Was it that I thought you hated me? That was impossible, after so many demonstrations to the contrary. Was I afraid of you? When, quite on the other hand, others stood in awe of me, in consideration of the zeal I had for your safety. Or was it that I wanted anything? So far from it, that all my profusions were supplied out of your treasure. So that certainly I must be the worst even of men and of brutes, to be wanting in good offices towards so kind a father; being a person that you yourself, as you say, received into your favour, preferred before so many of your other sons, and whom you declared king while you yourself were yet living; beside other benefits in proportion, to make me the envy of other men.

"Wretch that I am! that this fatal journey should afford so much time and matter for envy and treachery to work upon. But it was, Sire, for the service of yourself, and of your affairs, that I undertook this voyage; and to keep Syllanus from putting affronts upon your old age. Rome is witness to my loyalty; and so is the prince of Rome, and of the world, Cæsar himself, that has so often celebrated me for my reverence to my father. Be pleased, I beseech you, to receive these letters, that have more truth in them than all the forgeries that have been trumped up against me: these letters are my justification, and the infallible arguments of a sincere affection for you. You may remember, Sire, how unwillingly I took that journey, to lay myself at the mercy of all the enemies I left behind me. It was your command, Sire, that ruined me, how unwillingly soever, in forcing me to give my adversaries time for concerting their malice against me.

"If I had been a parricide, divine justice, either by sea or land, would have found me out. But I shall not lay the stress of my innocence upon that argument, for I know very well that you have condemned me in your heart already. All that I beg, even in this state, is only that I may not suffer upon the credit of proofs extorted by torment; but let me rather be put to the test, either of fire, screws, or what other instruments of cruelty you shall think fit, without any mercy to a miserable carcase. For if I am a parricide, no pain can be too much for me."

These words were attended with such energy and pathos as to excite the commiseration of the whole court, and of Varus in particular. Herod alone remained unaffected, from a consciousness of the clearness of the evidence, and the consummate hypocrisy and fallacy of Antipater.

Nicolaus then, at the king's command, having premised many instances of the craft of the culprit, and thereby obviated the effects of the commiseration he had excited in the minds of the auditors, exhibited a long catalogue of charges against him; ascribing to him all the mischiefs of the kingdom, and especially the murders of his brethren, whom he demonstrated to have perished by the calumnies he raised against them. He observed, that he had laid plots against the survivors as standing in the way of his preferment; and commented on the folly of supposing that he, who prepared poison for his father, would spare the lives of his brethren. He then proceeded to convict him of the attempt to poison Herod, recapitulated the several discoveries that had been made, produced the evidences, and represented Antipater as principally accessory to the crime of Pheroras, the corruption of the court, and, indeed, all the calamities that had lately befallen the kingdom: nor did he conclude without expatiating largely on the several accusations.

Nicolaus represents his crimes in the most exaggerated light.

Varus then called upon Antipater to produce what he had to offer to clear himself from the accusations laid against him. After some pause he briefly said, "God is my witness that I am entirely innocent." Varus then called for the poison, and caused it to be administered to a condemned malefactor, who, having drank it, instantly expired. He then, after some private discourse with Herod, transmitted the proceedings of the court to Cæsar, and the next day took his departure. The king commanded Antipater to be bound, and sent the emperor an account of his proceedings.

Antipater is convicted and put in chains.

He was charged after this with a treacherous design upon Salome; for a servant of Antipater brought letters from Rome, from a female attendant of the empress Julia, whose name was Acme. By her a message was sent to the king, that she had found a letter, written by Salome, amongst Julia's papers, and sent it him privately from a motive of good-will. This letter contained the bitterest invectives against the king. They were forged by Antipater, who had bribed Acme, and employed her as an instrument to convey them to Herod. This was rendered evident from Acme's letter to Antipater, which ran thus: "I have written to your father according to your direction, and dispatched the letter. I am persuaded the king will not spare his sister after reading it. I have executed the business; do you look to the performance of your promise."

Detected in a plot against Salome

Herod's sickness prevents the execution of justice upon him.

Herod's last will and testament.

Upon the detection of this plot against the life of Salome, Herod was greatly alarmed, to reflect how narrowly his sister had escaped the traitor's snare; nor could he avoid suspecting that Alexander was taken off by a similar imposture. He therefore formed a peremptory resolution of bringing him to justice for all his crimes, domestic and national, but was diverted from the execution of it by a levere distemper. He transmitted, however, a detail to Cæsar of Achme's part in the intrigue, and the treacherous practices against Salome. He sent also for his testament, altered it, appointed Antipas to the succession in lieu of Antipater, but omitted Archelaus and Philip, through former suggestions of that execrable miscreant. He bequeathed to Cæsar, besides other presents, a thousand talents; and to the empress, her children, friends, and freemen, about five hundred more, with lands and considerable bounties to others. He also testified his regard for his sister Salome by many valuable bequests. This was the purport of his last will and testament.

C H A P. XXI.

Herod lapses into bodily and mental calamities. A tumult raised concerning the golden eagle, which is destroyed by the multitude. The guards overcome the rabble. The ringleaders are put to death. Herod labours under a complication of disorders. Attempts violence on himself. Instance of his cruelty in the immediate view of death. Antipater dispatched by the king's guards. Archelaus declared successor instead of Antipas. Death of Herod. Salome and Alexas prevent the execution of his cruel order. Archelaus accedes to the throne amidst the acclamations of the people. The funeral solemnity.

Herod's distemper increases.

HEROD's distemper became more and more severe, through the bodily decay of advanced years, and the effects of a disordered mind. His calamities were not a little aggravated by the consideration of Antipater's being still alive, whom he determined to bring to condign punishment in the most public manner, as soon as the state of his health would permit.

Judas and Matthias move sedition on occasion of the golden eagle.

These calamities were followed by a popular sedition, which was headed by Judas, the son of Sophoreus, and Matthias, the son of Margalus, two sophists, famous for their skill in the laws, and consequently highly revered by the people. They had many disciples, and were attended at their expositions by numerous audiences. When these rabbies were informed of the king's languishing condition, they intimated to their friends, that the present would be a convenient opportunity for vindicating the honour of God, in the demolition of all works erected in opposition to his sacred laws; and observed further, that the setting up of images in the temple, or the likeness of any living creature, was absolutely forbidden. It was evident that they alluded to the golden eagle, which Herod had caused to be fixed over the great gate of the temple. The multitude therefore came to a resolution to pull it down, as the most glorious hazard they could run in support of the laws of their country, even if they should die in the attempt. It was represented to them, that, should they do this, it would be followed with everlasting happiness and immortal honour; while the mean spirited, and those who were regardless of a future state, would prefer death in their beds by a disease, than to fall a sacrifice to religion and virtue.

The golden eagle is destroyed.

While this popular enthusiasm was spreading, a report prevailed that the king was at the point of death, which emboldening the multitude, they mounted the temple at noon-day, and letting themselves down with ropes and axes, demolished the golden eagle in the presence of a numerous congregation of spectators. The commanding officer of the guards no sooner had notice of this outrage, than he fell in among them with a party, seized about forty of the most active, and brought them before the king, who demanded of them if they had been so insolent as to demolish the golden eagle? When they replied in the affirmative, and he interrogated at whose command they had done it? they rejoined, at the command of the laws of their country: and when he further asked them how they could be so cheerful, as they must shortly die? they returned for answer, because they were assured of a better life after death.

This incensed the king to such a degree, that, seemingly unmindful of his disease, he reproached them in most opprobrious terms, for having attempted innovations in government under colour of law, and declared, as they had behaved themselves like abandoned wretches, as such they should undergo an exemplary punishment. The people, upon this, apprehending that the severity might be too far extended, preferred their request to the king, that he would content himself with justice upon the ringleaders and the prisoners, and shew mercy to the rest. Herod was at length prevailed upon, and ordered those that came down by the ropes, and the two heads of the faction, to be burnt alive; and those that were taken together, to be delivered up to the proper officers, in order to be put to death.

By this time the king's distemper seized upon his whole frame, and produced various symptoms, such as an intermitting fever, an intolerable itching, dropsical tumours about his feet, an inflammation in the abdomen, a putrefaction that caused worms, contraction of the nerves, and convulsions in general. It was the opinion of those who pretended to divination, that these calamities were inflicted upon him as a judgment for his rigorous proceeding towards the rabbies. But, notwithstanding the complication of his diseases, and the torments under which he laboured, he was still so desirous of life, that, in this very extremity, he sought for new remedies, and cherished some hopes of his recovery. He crossed the Jordan, and tried the warm baths of Callirrhoe, which run into the lake Asphaltites, a water not only medicinal, but grateful to the taste. Here the physicians advised him to bathe his whole body in warm oil; but upon his being let down into the vessel, his eyes and senses failed him together. This last fit was so alarming, that his attendants exclaimed with horror, and he revived a little at the outcry. But at length, when he found there was no hope, he ordered the soldiers fifty drachmæ a man; and left money to a great amount, to be divided amongst his governors and friends.

When he came back to Jericho, and found his case desperate, he seemed to let death at defiance, by a resolution the most dreadful that ever entered the heart of man. He sent an order throughout Judæa for seizing all the nobility, and shutting them up in the circus, called also the hippodrome, or horse-course. He then called for Salome, his sister, and Alexas, her husband, and gave them this charge: "I know that the Jews will celebrate my death by a festival; but I shall take care not to want mourners, or the splendid pomp of funeral solemnities, provided you will but follow my directions. Be it your care then, the moment I expire, to send soldiers to encompass the circus, and slay all those who are there in custody. This will be an infallible means of making the whole province of Judæa, and every particular family in it, true mourners for my death."

Herod had no sooner given these orders, than his deputies brought him letters of information from Rome, that Achme was put to death at Cæsar's command, and that Antipater was under sentence of condemnation; but it was added, that, if Herod chose to mitigate the punishment, and banish him, he had the emperor's permission. This complacent message procured him some little relief; but soon relapsing, as he was at that time afflicted with a convulsive cough, he had some thought of laying violent hands on himself, and, to that end, called for an apple and a knife, as if he had been about to cut and pare it. Having looked around him with an eye of caution, he raised his hand with the point towards his breast, which being perceived by his nephew Achiab, he wrestled the knife out of his hand, and prevented the seemingly intended mischief.

Upon this a rumour was spread that the king was dead; of which Antipater availing himself, tampered with his keepers, for a sum of money, to release him: but the principal officer not only rejected his request, but gave instant notice of it to the king, who, upon hearing it, burst out into a vehement exclamation, and ordered his guards immediately to dispatch him, and see his body deposited in the castle of Hyrcanion. He then altered his testament once more, declared Archelaus, his eldest son, successor, and constituted Antipas a tetrarch.

Herod died five days after his son, having reigned thirty-four years from the death of Antigonus, and thirty-seven since he was declared king by the Romans. He was fortunate in every other respect but that of his family; being advanced to the throne from a private station, which he maintained a series of years, and was at length succeeded by one of his sons.

Before the soldiers knew of the king's death, Salome and her husband went to the circus, and dismissed those who were confined there, in order to be slain by the king's command. They did this upon a pretence that Herod had changed his mind; but as soon as they were released, proclamation was made of the king's death. The soldiery and populace being assembled at the amphitheatre of Jericho, Prolemy, the keeper of the royal signet, made a speech in honour of the deceased, whom he mentioned as a fortunate prince, condoling with them, at the same time, for so sensible a loss. He then read the epistle which had been left for the soldiers, and contained an earnest recommendation of his successor to their loyalty and allegiance. After this he read the will; by which Philip was to inherit Trachon and the adjacent country, Antipas was made tetrarch, and Archelaus appointed to succeed to the throne. He left orders for the delivery of his ring to Cæsar, who was to be informed of every transaction; as the whole was to be confirmed by the emperor's sole authority and direction.

This was followed with joyful congratulations to Archelaus upon his accession to the throne, both from the soldiers and populace. Preparations were then made for the funeral of Herod, for which neither care or cost was wanting to render it as pompous as possible. The bier was covered with an embroidery of gold and jewels, and an intermixture of purple. The corpse was placed upon a purple bed of various contexture, a diadem was put on the head, with a golden crown about it, and a sceptre fixed in the right hand. Next the bier were the deceased king's son and kindred. The guards, Thracian troops, Germans and Gauls, marched at the head of the solemnity, as in form and order of battle. To close the procession, five hundred officers, domestics and freemen, brought up the train. The body was carried two hundred furlongs to Herodion, where it was interred according to mandate.

CHAP. I.

Archelaus appoints the ceremony of mourning and feasting. His gracious declaration in favour of the people. They are clamorous on the subject of grievances. Raise a tumult on account of those who had been put to death for the demolition of the golden eagle. The multitude overcome the guards, but are afterwards routed by the whole army. Three thousand Jews are slain. Archelaus goes to Rome, leaving the administration to Philip in his absence. Sabinus advances to Cesarea in his way to Judea. Varus puts a stop to his journey. Sabinus goes to Jerusalem, and demands possession of some castles and treasure. Meets with a formal refusal from the officers. Antipas goes to Rome, and prefers his claim to the succession. Sabinus and Salome exhibit a charge against Archelaus. His defence. Caesar attends to the respective allegations of the parties, and proceeds to trial. Antipater, the son of Salome, opens the cause against Archelaus. Nicolaus pleads for the defendant. Archelaus graciously received by Caesar. The court adjourned.

Fresh tumults arise.

Archelaus well received by the multitude.

His address.

THE necessity Archelaus was under of going to Rome proved the occasion of new disturbances. After a public mourning for his father seven days, and he had given a very expensive feast to the multitude, (a custom ruinous to many of the Jews, who cannot dispense with it,) he arrayed himself in white, and went up to the temple, where the people accosted him with the loudest congratulatory acclamations. He returned the compliment, from a throne of state, in a manner becoming the dignity of his character. Having returned them thanks for the zeal they had shewn in the funeral of his father, and the royal honours they had paid to himself as to an anointed king, he observed withal, "that he would not at present take upon him either the authority or name of a king, until Caesar, the declared lord and master of all by

"the testament of his father, should confirm the succession: that, for this cause, when the army would have set the crown upon his head at Jerusalem, he would not accept it; but that he would make abundant requitals, not to the soldiers only, but the people, for their good will towards him, when the superior power should have given him a compleat title to the kingdom, as it should be his study, upon all occasions, to be more complacent than his father."

The people were highly gratified by this declaration, and presently put him to the test by preferring several petitions. The purport of some was to have their taxes abated, of others to have them wholly remitted, and of others for a general release of prisoners. Archelaus readily complied with the whole, in order to secure their attachment, which being done, he sacrificed and feasted with his friends.

Soon after this, however, a great multitude, desirous of innovations, assembled together, and declining the subject of the common mourning for the death of the king, began to murmur at the public grievances, and particularly to lament the case of those who were put to death by Herod for demolishing the golden eagle which he had placed over the gate of the temple. This lamentation was expressed by beating their breasts, tearing their hair, and outrageous exclamations for the loss of so many pious and virtuous men, who had died martyrs to the religion and laws of their country. They demanded justice upon Herod's mercenaries, those accursed instruments of his cruelty, the expulsion of Herod's high-priest, and the appointment of a man of more piety and integrity to that sacred and dignified office.

Archelaus was highly incensed at these mutinous proceedings; but restrained himself from taking vengeance on the ringleaders, as his journey to Rome required expedition, and immediate severity might be productive of disastrous consequences. Thinking it more advisable to have recourse to soothing admonitions, he sent a principal officer of his army to quiet the seditious by persuasion, rather than by force. But the ringleaders of the tumult drove him away away by stones from the temple, without suffering him to speak a word. Archelaus sent other officers on the same errand, but they were treated in the same manner, inasmuch, that it plainly appeared, they wanted only numbers to commence an open rebellion.

A tumult at the passover. The feast of unleavened bread, or the passover, being near at hand, and annually celebrated by abundance of sacrifices, crowds of people resorted from all parts to the metropolis, on account of being present at that solemnity. Amongst the rest were divers of the faction of the two rabbies, Judas and Matthias, who came thither to lament the death of those two venerable martyrs, and wait an opportunity of inflaming the multitude to sedition.

A party of soldiers sent to suppress it, but are repulsed. Archelaus had the prudent caution to send a tribune, with a band of soldiers, with orders to seize the ringleaders if they should continue refractory, as the most effectual means of obviating the danger of a general riot. The multitude made head against this party: some they slew with stones, and dangerously wounded the tribune, and afterwards betook themselves to their sacrifices as if nothing had happened. Archelaus, finding that the riot could not be suppressed without bloodshed, turned the whole army loose upon them; the foot by way of the city, and the horse before the walls. The former fell suddenly upon them as they were sacrificing, and killed near three thousand at the very altar. The remainder dispersed and fled to the mountains; and Archelaus causing proclamation to be made, commanding all people to depart to their own habitations, put an end to the festival.

Archelaus goes for Rome. This sedition being quelled, Archelaus, with his mother, and his three particular friends, Poplas, Ptolemy, and Nicolaus, embarked for Rome, leaving Philip behind him, both as viceroy and trustee for his private affairs. Salome, with her sons, accompanied him, as did several of his kindred, under pretence of assisting him in the confirmation of his succession, but, in reality, to prefer an accusation against him for his breach of the laws in the violation of the holy temple.

Upon their arrival at Cesarea, they were met by Sabinus, governor of Syria, who was then going up to Judaea, to secure the effects that Herod had left behind him. But Varus, at the instance of Archelaus, and mediation of Ptolemy, restrained Sabinus from proceeding any farther. So that, to gratify Varus, he neither demanded the castles or the treasure to the prejudice of Archelaus, and passed his word that he would do nothing in the business without the approbation of Cæsar, and remained where he was.

Sabinus returns to Ptolemy. But as soon as Varus was gone for Antioch, and Archelaus for Rome, Sabinus, upon the removal of these obstacles, went to Jerusalem, seized on the palace, and sent from thence to the governors of the castles, and the officers of the treasury; the former to deliver up to him possession of the castles, and the latter the accounts of the treasure. But the officers, faithful to the trust reposed in them by Archelaus, evaded compliance with this answer, "That what they had in charge was rather the property of Cæsar than Archelaus."

Antipas goes to Rome, and becomes competitor for the kingdom. In the mean time Antipas went to Rome also, in order to prefer his claim to the kingdom, insisting upon the validity of the former testament, in which the succession was settled upon him. Besides, he was promised the interest of Salome, and others of their kindred that sailed with Archelaus, in the support of his claim. He was accompanied by his mother and Ptolemy, the brother of Nicolaus, an approved friend of Herod, a circumstance of some weight: but his chief dependence was upon Irenæus, a shrewd and subtle logician. Antipas, relying on the ability of these advocates, totally disregarded those who advised him to pay some deference to the seniority of Archelaus, and the authority of his father in his second testament, and seemed perfectly secure of the kingdom. When they came to Rome, he was joined by all the pretended friends of Archelaus; those especially who were desirous of shaking off the yoke of monarchy, and being immediately under the Roman government, who, in case they could not obtain their wishes, preferred Antipas for their king.

Antipas had great dependence on the interest of Sabinus, who had already exhibited an accusation against Archelaus, by letters to Cæsar, and, on the other hand, highly commended his character. Salome and her adherents stated their charge against Archelaus, and presented it to the emperor. Archelaus then drew up the grounds of his claim, and the several heads of his justification, which, with his father's signet, and an account of the bequests he made him, were transmitted to Cæsar by the hands of Ptolemy.

Sabinus accuses Archelaus to Cæsar.

When the emperor had duly weighed the respective allegations, the greatness of the kingdom, the variety of large revenues, the numerous family of Herod, together with the contents of the letters of Varus and Sabinus, he called a council of the Roman nobility, where Caius Cæsar, the son of Agrippa, and his daughter Julia, was, for the first time, called to take his place at the board, and then proceeded to the trial. The cause was opened by Antipater, the son of Salome, an advocate of great ability, who urged his plea against Archelaus by stating, "That Archelaus had long since exercised sovereign authority in effect, and that it was now but matter of form to contend about the name. A hearing before Cæsar was nothing to him that has already refused him for a judge. That Herod was no sooner dead, but people were immediately engaged, and suborned, to set the crown upon his head; while he himself did not only sit like a king in royal state, and upon a golden throne, but acted like one too; as in changing the order of the militia, disposing of charges, receiving and granting petitions, exercising the power of life and death in public crimes, setting his father's prisoners at liberty, &c. which are all regal privileges. That this person, that has already engrossed to himself the powers and ensigns of royalty, coming to Cæsar only for the title of it, makes Augustus but a shadow of a prince, and a king in name, not in effect. Farther, (says Antipater,) what avails all the solemnity of his mourning weeds for his dead father? He looks sorrowfully all day, and then sits up feasting and making merry all night. What was it, at last, but the detestation the people had for this hypocrisy, that raised the late sedition? But the main stress of the charge was yet to come, which was a horrible slaughter about the temple. It was a festival day; the people gathered together to worship, and pay their devotions, and they themselves were made the sacrifice. Their throats, in short, were cut; and such heaps of dead bodies piled up in the temple, as, in the most implacable and merciless of foreign wars, was hardly ever heard of. Herod was so well acquainted with the cruelty of this man's nature, that it was almost impossible for him ever to give him the least hope of a crown, so long as he was in his right mind. And that, alas! was the king's case in the latter testament: his mind was more out of order than his body; and he did not know what he did. Beside that, after all this, there was no inability or defect charged upon Antipas, the successor, by the former will; but people gave him the character of a prince very well qualified for the royal function. Or if it should be supposed that Herod was, in truth, found, and in his right senses, Archelaus has as good as abdicated the royal dignity, by acting against the laws of the constitution. What havock would he make now, if he had Cæsar's authority to cover him in his cruelties, that does all this upon his own account, without any power at all?"

Antipater counsel for the plaintiff.

When Antipater had thus powerfully argued the point, and produced a great number of the kindred of Archelaus to prove the several parts of his accusation, he sat down; and Nicolaus rose in behalf of the defendant, alledging, "That the slaughter committed in the temple was not only of absolute necessity, but the people that were killed were Cæsar's

Nicolaus for the defendant.

“far’s enemies. He shewed likewise, that, for the other pretended crimes, the present opposers of Archelaus were themselves the advisers of them. As to the validity of the second testament, he argued, that it ought to stand, in regard that Herod had, at that time, the consideration and respect to refer the confirmation of it to Cæsar. Now he that had the judgment to know the right lord and master, had certainly sense enough to appoint the right heir.”

Archelaus graciously received by Cæsar.

Nicolaus having thus spoken concisely, but pointedly, in vindication of Archelaus, the latter suddenly cast himself at Cæsar’s feet, who raised him with such singular grace and benignity, as indicated that he thought him worthy of the succession: but no positive resolution was entered into at that time. This being done, Cæsar dismissed the council for that day, and entered into consultation with his friends respecting the decision of the case; whether it were fitting to constitute any of those named in Herod’s testaments as his successor, or make an equal participation of the principality amongst the whole family, as they were numerous, and would require a great revenue to support them with honour.

C H A P. II.

Death of Malthace, the mother of Archelaus. Great uproar amongst the Jews. Sabinus inflames it. The feast of Pentecost. The Jews draw up in form. Sabinus presses Varus for relief, and takes sanctuary in the Tower of Phasael. A bloody conflict between the Jews and the Romans. The Romans set fire to the galleries of the temple, which makes great slaughter amongst the Jews. The soldiers plunder the sacred treasure. The Jews summon the palace to surrender, and sit down before it. They offer Sabinus conditions, which he refuses. Factions and broils throughout Judæa. Exploits of Judas, a notorious robber. Ambition and courage of Simon. Atbronges and his four brothers enterprising men.

Death of the mother of Archelaus.

BEFORE Cæsar came to any positive determination as to the succession, Malthace, the mother of Archelaus, fell into a distemper, and departed this life. Letters also at the same time were received from Varus out of Syria, containing information of a revolt amongst the Jews, and of his going up to Jerusalem upon Archelaus’s journey to Rome, to restrain the incendiaries, and restore peace and good order. When he found advice and remonstrance ineffectual, and that the multitude were still refractory, he quartered one of the legions he brought out of Syria in the city, and so returned to Antioch.

Sabinus raises tumults amongst the Jews.

But when Sabinus came afterwards to Jerusalem, he furnished them with new occasion for tumults: for depending on the reinforcement of the troops of Varus, and a band of his own domestics well armed, and at hand, to subserve the purpose of his avarice and rapine, his design was to get possession of the castles and Herod’s treasures by force, and menace upon the governors and officers who had them in charge. It was now the feast of Pentecost, or fiftieth day, so called from the term of the revolutions, after seven times seven days after the passover; so that the people assembled in great numbers, not from religious motive, but discontent with the present situation of affairs. They repaired to Jerusalem from Galilee, Idumæa, Jericho, and the country beyond Jordan, with the inhabitants of Judæa, who, for number and courage, surpassed all the rest. They divided themselves into three bodies, and pitched their tents in three quarters; one upon the north side of the temple, another upon the south towards the circus, and the third to the westward of the palace; so that the Romans, by these means, were beset on all sides.

The feast of Pentecost.

The Jews prepare to attack the Romans.

Sabinus, alarmed at the number and resolution of the enemies, pressed Varus, by divers messengers, to come to his succour immediately, or his legion would be cut to pieces. He reached, however, the highest tower of the fortress, that commands all the rest, and, from the name of Herod’s brother, that was slain by the Parthians, is called Phasaelus, and then gave a signal to the soldiers of that legion to break in upon the enemy; for such was his pusillanimity, that he durst not lead on the very men he was appointed to command.

Sabinus takes refuge in the Tower of Phasael.

The Romans, according to order, made a vigorous attempt upon the temple, and a desperate engagement took place between them and the Jews, in which the latter, while they had no help from above, either with darts or arrows, were worsted; but when once the Jews got possession of the galleries, and galled the Romans from thence, many of them were cut off; and the rest were too far distant to take their revenge; though, if they had been hand to hand, they would have been much too hard for them.

A battle between the Romans and the Jews.

After this the Romans set fire to the galleries, which, for workmanship, proportion, and ornament, were incomparable. Many of the Jews perished in the flames: some were cut off by the enemy upon their fall; others pushed from the battlements: some again, in despair, choosing rather to die by the sword than by fire, laid violent hands on themselves. Those that made an attempt on the Romans from the walls, were destroyed without any difficulty; till, at length, they were either slain or scattered. The soldiers plundered the sacred treasure, carrying off four hundred talents, and leaving to Sabinus the remainder.

The galleries were, and many Jews perished in the flames.

The holy treasure plundered.

This loss of men and treasure brought a more powerful reinforcement of the Jews upon the Romans than the other, both for valour and number. They summoned the palace to surrender, and set down before it, with a menace of giving no quarter unless they immediately quitted it, and offering Sabinus liberty if he would depart with his legion. There were many of the king’s party who deserted the Romans, and assisted the Jews. But the most warlike body, amounting to three thousand men of Sebalte, went over to the Romans, under the command of Rufus and Gratus. The Jews still pressed the siege, and attempted the walls of the fortress, calling upon Sabinus to retire, without opposing himself to the resolution they had taken of recovering their liberty. Sabinus was inclined to provide for his safety, but distrusted the assurances the Jews gave him, and suspected their preferred lenity as bait laid to ensnare him. This consideration, together with the hope of relief from Varus, induced him to stand the siege.

Rufus and Gratus go over to the Romans.

Judæa was at this time involved in tumults and factions, an opportunity now offering for pretenders to start their claim to government. A band of two thousand veterans in Idumæa, who had served under Herod, had several encounters with the king’s troops, and in particular with Achiab, Herod’s kinsman, who often sallied upon them out of strong holds, but could not cope with them in the open plain.

Several tumults in Judæa.

In Sepphoris, a city of Galilee, one Judas, the son of Hezekias, leader of the band that was taken by Herod, assembled a considerable party, forced the king’s magazines, and arming himself and companions out of those stores, set opposition at defiance, and ravaged the country.

Exploits of Judas the robber.

In Perea also, on the other side of the river, Simon, one of the late king’s domestics, relying on the symmetry, agility, and strength of his person, placed a crown upon his head, and, assisted by a band of robbers he had collected, burnt down the palace at Jericho, laid several stately buildings in ashes round about it, and procured immense booty by rapine. Nay, he would have laid waste the whole country, if Gratus, who commanded the king’s foot, had not brought the Trachonite archers, and a warlike body from Sebalte, to their relief. In fine, they came to action, when the robber was overcome, and great part of his foot cut off. As he himself was upon the flight across a steep bottom, Gratus felled him by an oblique Ravages of Simon in Perea.

lique stroke on the neck, and thereby put an end to his life and depredations. The royal palaces, about Amathus and the borders of Jordan, were also burnt down by another seditious gang that came out of Perea.

There was also at the same time a certain shepherd, named Athronges, who had the confidence to set up for king. He had strength of body, and resolution of mind, equal to any enterprize; and was aided and abetted by four brothers of the same qualifications, who served him in his incursions both as officers and counsellors. Upon affairs of moment, he ascended a throne, with a crown upon his head, pronounced judgment without appeal, and in every instance assumed regal authority. Under this usurped sanction he continued to over-run the country for some time, destroying whatever he met with, and exercising hostilities towards the Romans, the king's troops, and even the Jews themselves, if there was a probability of gaining any booty. These freebooters once met, near Emmaus, a convoy with corn and arms, which the Romans were carrying to one of their legions, and encountering them, killed Arius, their centurion, with forty of his best men; and would have destroyed the whole, if Gratus, with his troops from Sebaste, had not come speedily to their relief. Having thus plundered both foreigners and their own countrymen for some time, three of the brothers at length were taken; the eldest by Archelaus, the two next by Gratus and Ptolemy, and the fourth surrendered himself to Archelaus upon conditions. Thus ended the enterprizes of these desperadoes, while Judæa might be said to be over-run with depredations and rapine.

C H A P. III.

Varus joins the Romans against the Jews. Sepphoris burnt to the ground. Sappho taken and plundered. Emmaus laid in ashes. Upon the approach of Varus to Jerusalem, the Jews quit the siege in consternation. The citizens disclaim all seditious practices, and welcome Varus into the town. Near 2000 of the ringleaders are punished with crucifixion. Varus discharges the Arabian auxiliaries for their non-conformity to military discipline. His generosity towards the Jews of Idumæa.

VARUS having received intelligence from Sabinus, and the chief officers at Jerusalem, that the Roman legion there was in danger of being cut off, he hastened with all expedition to their relief, and marched with the two other legions he had under his command, and four troops of horse, to Ptolemais, ordering the auxiliaries, that were sent by the kings and governors of cities, to join him there at the rendezvous. The people of Berytus, as he passed through their city, furnished him with a reinforcement of fifteen hundred men, well armed. Upon his coming to Ptolemais, Aretas, king of Arabia, (a bitter enemy to Herod,) joined him with a considerable body of horse and foot. When he had mustered his forces, he sent a detachment into Galilee, under command of his friend Gallus, who soon after encountered a party, totally routed them, entered the city of Sepphoris, burnt it to the ground, and made all the inhabitants slaves.

Varus himself marched with the main army into Samaria, but spared the city, because he found the inhabitants had not joined in the late commotions. He encamped at Arus, a village belonging to Ptolemy, which the Arabians plundered, merely because he was a friend to Herod. The army advanced next to Sappho, a fortified place, which they took, rifled, and pillaged. The Arabians carried all before them with fire and sword. Emmaus was abandoned by its inhabitants, and then burnt by command of Varus, in revenge for the deaths of Arius and his companions.

Thence he marched to Jerusalem, where the Jews, upon the very tidings of his approach, quitted the siege, dispersed, and took shelter in the fields and woods; but the citizens, on the contrary, maintained their ground, and received the conqueror with due honors. They cleared themselves from all suspicion of joining in the late revolt, alledging that they had raised no commotions, but had been forced to admit the multitude on account of its being the day of a grand festival, so that they were rather besieged themselves, together with the Romans, than accessory to the least mutiny or sedition.

Varus had been met on his entrance by Joseph, the nephew of Archelaus, with Rufus and Gratus, the king's generals, at the head of the Roman soldiers and the troops of Sebaste, all in their military habits. Sabinus, from conscious guilt, to avoid the presence of Varus, had stolen away out of the city, and lurked about the sea-side. Varus, in the mean time, dispersed his troops up and down the country, in quest of the ringleaders of this tumult. They apprehended great numbers, of whom those who appeared to have the least concern were put into custody; but such as were most criminal he ordered to be crucified, to the amount of about two thousand.

Varus was informed that there remained in Idumæa ten thousand Jews still in arms. Finding, however, the Arabians did not act like soldiers and men of honour, but gave themselves wholly up to spoil and rapine, laying the country waste wherever they came, in opposition to his will, he dismissed them, and, at the head of his own legion, marched against the revoltors: but, before it proceeded to blows, at the instance of Achiab, they surrendered, and laid down their arms. The Roman governor treated the commonalty with lenity, but sent the officers to answer for their conduct to Cæsar. Finding some of Herod's kinsmen in the number of revoltors, he proceeded against them as traitors, for taking up arms against their king; and having thus restored tranquillity to Jerusalem, he left the former legion as a guard, and then returned to Antioch.

C H A P. IV.

The Jews accuse Archelaus before Cæsar, and petition for the free exercise of their religion. The emperor calls a council upon the occasion. Hears the allegations of the Jews, by their deputies, on the one hand, and those of Archelaus, and his adherents, on the other. Nicolaus pleads the cause of Archelaus. Cæsar, having duly weighed the whole matter, settles the government, and makes the dispositions according to the will of Herod.

AFTER matters had been thus accommodated in Judæa, the pretensions of Archelaus were delayed by an accusation which the Jews had preferred against him at Rome, by fifty deputies, who had been sent from Jerusalem before the tumults broke forth, and that with the permission of Varus. The purport of their embassy was to address the emperor for the liberty of their country, and the exercise of their religion; and their petition was signed by 8000 Jews, principal inhabitants of Rome.

This being a point of importance, Cæsar called a council of the Roman nobility, and his own particular friends, to meet in the temple of Apollo, upon mount Palatine, a stately and superb structure of his own erecting. The council being assembled, the Jews and their ambassadors were ranged on the one hand, and Archelaus and his adherents on the other. His kindred maintained a neutrality; as, from their envy and hatred, they would not espouse his cause; nor would they be seen to take part with his accusers; so that they acted from a two-fold motive. Amongst others was Philip, the brother of Archelaus, whom Varus sent before for two reasons: the one that he might be enabled to assist his brother upon the occasion; the other, that, in case Augustus Cæsar should think fit to make a distribution of the possessions of Herod amongst his children, he might come in for his share.

Varus comes to Jerusalem, and punishes the authors of the sedition.

Dismisses the Arabian auxiliaries.

Archelaus is accused by the Jewish deputies.

A council summoned by Cæsar.

The deputies of the Jews being called upon to set forth their complaints, and then prefer their petition, addressed the court to the following effect:

Principal heads of the accusation.

"That Herod never demeaned himself like a king; but, on the contrary, as the most intolerable tyrant upon the face of the earth. That his cruelty did not stop at the profusion of innocent blood, and the violation of justice; but that he made the very living with themselves dead. That he did not only tear the bodies of his subjects to pieces with torments, but stript his towns and cities of all that was choice and precious, and gave it away in ostentation to foreigners; sacrificing the very lives also of the Jews to strangers. Instead of the blessings of their ancient laws and liberties, he left his people nothing but beggary and iniquity in exchange; inasmuch that they suffered more plagues since his coming to the crown, than their forefathers ever felt since their deliverance from Xerxes out of the captivity of Babylon.

"The Jews (they said) had been now so used to slavery, that they were grown modest and patient under the yoke, even to the degree of entailing a voluntary servitude upon their posterity in the person of Archelaus, the son of the late tyrant, whom they saluted as king immediately upon the death of his father. They mourned for Herod together, and offered up their joint vows for the long and prosperous reign of his successor; and then, to put it out of doubt that he was the true son of this inhuman father, he made his auspicious entrance upon the government with the slaughter of three thousand citizens: and, the better to entitle himself to the succession, this massacre was his oblation to God of three thousand victims: and all this upon an holy day, and the carcases piled up in the holy temple.

"What wonder is it for men that have outlived so many miseries, and escaped so dangerous a rock, to own their aversion to this man, and to fall (if perish they must) like men of honour with their faces to the enemy? All the Jews desire at the hands of the Romans, is only that Cæsar will judge the wretched remainder of them so far worthy of pity, as not to expose them to the rigour of their merciless oppressors; but rather to annex Judæa to Syria, and range them under the laws and rules of the Roman government. It will then be seen whether the Jews are, in truth, so turbulent and seditious a sort of people as they are given out to be; when they fall once into the hands of humane and temperate governors."

With this petition the deputies closed their charge.

Nicolaus pleads for Archelaus.

Nicolaus rose in behalf of Archelaus, and, in his reply, cleared both him and Herod from the accusations brought against them, and then proceeded, in very pointed language, to characterize the nation of the Jews, as averse to any government, and more particularly to that of monarchy; concluding his speech with some sarcastic remarks upon the relations of Archelaus, who had deserted his cause, and joined his accusers.

Cæsar distributes the possessions of Herod, and executes his will.

When the emperor had heard the arguments on both sides, he dismissed the court, and, after some few days deliberation, bestowed upon Archelaus one half of Herod's kingdom, under the title of ethnarch, with a promise of making him king, if he should appear worthy of that dignity. The other half he divided into two tetrarchies, which he gave to two other sons of Herod; one to Philip, the other to Antipas, who had contested the sovereignty with Archelaus. There fell to his lot the country beyond the river, and Galilee, producing a revenue of two hundred talents. But Batanæa, Trachon, Auranites, and some part of the land of Zenon, about Jamnia, were assigned to Philip, and yielded a revenue of an hundred talents. In Archelaus's ethnarchy were comprized Idumæa, all Judæa, and Samaria; which last was remitted a fourth part of its tribute, as a reward for not joining in the rebellion with their neighbours. Straton's Tower, Se-baste, Joppa, and Jerusalem, were all cast into the share of Archelaus; but Gaza, Gadara, and Hippon, Grecian cities, were detached from the kingdom, and annexed to Syria. The revenue of Archelaus amounted, upon the whole, to four hundred talents.

Cæsar bestowed upon Salome, besides what was bequeathed by will of Herod, Jamnia, Azotus, and Phasaelis. He gave her also a palace at Ascalon, which was valued at sixty talents, but was subjected to the jurisdiction of the ethnarchy. When Cæsar had thus discharged all Herod's bequests, he granted to his two virgin daughters 500,000 drachmæ, and gave them in marriage to the sons of Pheroras. But after this family distribution, he made a liberal division of a thousand talents more, which were bequeathed to himself, reserving only some particular presents in memory of the deceased.

His liberality to Salome.

CH A P. V.

Exploits of a spurious Alexander. His impostures are detected, and he is sent to the galleys. The first projector put to death.

AT this time there was a man, by birth a Jew, but brought up at Sidon with the freeman of a Roman citizen, who falsely pretended, on account of the resemblance of their countenances, to be that very Alexander who was slain by Herod. This man came to Rome to practise his imposture; and had with him, for countenance and counsel, another Jew, who was perfectly acquainted with the attendants and intrigues of the court of Herod. His companion instructed him to give out, that the people who were employed by his father to put him and Aristobulus to death, had so great a compassion for them, that they substituted other bodies in their places, and conveyed the brothers out of the way. This passed current with many Jews in Crete, who furnished the pretender with plentiful supplies for travelling in splendour. From thence he proceeded to Melos, where he experienced more respect and bounty: nay, he so far imposed upon the public credulity, that he took several of his friends along with him to Rome. Upon his arrival at Puteoli, the Jews of that place made him sumptuous presents; and the friends of his father treated him as a sovereign prince. The striking resemblance, in fine, procured him such credit, that as many as had seen Alexander would not hesitate to swear this was the man. The report was so prevalent, that the whole body of the Jews, who were at Rome, came in crowds to see him; and innumerable multitudes stood in the avenues, through which he was carried in a sedan by the inhabitants of Melos, who kept him a negroe train at their own proper charges.

The resemblance of the countenance to Alexander.

He is sent on the Jews.

But Cæsar, who knew perfectly well the lineaments of Alexander's face, because he had been accused by Herod before him, suspecting the fraud, sent for one Celadus, and ordered him to bring the young man to him. When Cæsar saw him, he immediately discerned the fallacy in his countenance; and when he discovered that his whole body was of a coarser texture, and more robust form, like that of a slave, he was convinced that the whole was an imposture. But he was most astonished at the effrontery of his reply, on being asked concerning Aristobulus, which was, "That he was living, but left on purpose at Cyprus, for fear of treachery, as it would be more difficult for plotters to get them into their power while they were separate."

Cæsar perceived the fraud, and sent for him.

Cæsar then took him by himself privately, assured him he had discovered the fallacy, and that he would spare his life, if he would own to him who had persuaded him to adopt that mode of imposture. Having promised compliance, he went with Cæsar, and pointed to the Jew that had advised him to it in order to get money: for, in fact, the sum he raised upon this piece of chicanery, was more than Alexander himself could have procured had he

The impostor condemned to the galleys; the projector to death.

he been alive. Cæsar smiled at the contrivance; and condemned the spurious Alexander to the galleys on account of his strength, and the projector of the imposture to death: but the people of Melos had been sufficiently punished for their folly, by the expences they had been at on his account.

Archelaus is accused of oppression to Cæsar, and banished to Vienna, a city of Gaul. A foreboding dream. The exposition. Another very extraordinary dream of the princess Glaphyra, who has a vision of her first husband. Her death.

WHEN Archelaus took possession of his ethnarchy, he treated not only the Jews but the Samaritans with great rigour, from a resentment of former disputes betwixt them. His dream.

The interpretation.

A report prevailed that Archelaus, before his summons to attend the emperor, dreamt he saw nine ears of corn, large and full, devoured by oxen; and that when he sent for several who were supposed to be skilled in divination, some said one thing, and some another; till at length Simon, one of the sect of Essenes, gave it this interpretation: "That the ears of corn denoted years, and the oxen the vicissitude of things, as the earth is overturned by the plough; that therefore he should reign as many years as there were ears of corn, and, after many revolutions, depart this life." It fell out that, five days after this interpretation, Archelaus was called upon his trial.

There was another memorable dream of the princess Glaphyra, daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and wife of Archelaus, the present subject of our history. Her first husband was Alexander, the son of Herod, by whom he was put to death. This princess, after his death, married Juba, king of Lybia, and, upon his decease, returned home, and lived with her father in a state of widowhood. Archelaus, the ethnarch, became so enamoured of her at first sight, that he put away Mariamne, and married her. Soon after this she came back into Judæa, and had there a vision of her first husband Alexander, who thus seemed to reproach her: "Could not your marriage with one husband after me suffice, but you must take a third, and this under my own roof? and, to add to thy criminality, my own brother? These are injuries not to be borne. But you shall soon return to me again." Glaphyra survived this dream but two days.

C H A P. VII.

The ethnarchy of Archelaus is reduced into a Roman province. The sedition of Judas, of Galilee. Three sorts of Jews, Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes. Of the Essenes. Their temperance and opinion of marriage; their effects in common; their apparel, charity, and mode of living; their scruples of conscience, peaceable disposition, and fidelity. The method of introduction into the society, and of punishing offenders. Their piety, virtue, and contempt of death. Their opinion of the soul. Veneration for the ancients. A different sort of Essenes. Brief description of the sects of the Pharisees and Sadducees.

Coponius, a man of equestrian rank, was vested by Cæsar with full commission to govern it. Under his administration a certain Galilean, named Judas, stirred up the people to revolt, on a suggestion that, in submitting to the Romans, and paying them tribute, they acknowledged a supremacy due to God alone.

This Judas was leader of a peculiar sect, and entertained tenets peculiar to himself.

There are among the Jews three philosophical sects, distinguished by the different denominations of Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes, which last maintain a more rigid discipline than the rest.

Three sects of Jews.

The Essenes are Jews by birth, and seem to have a greater affection for one another than the rest of the sects. They reject pleasure as an evil; but esteem continence, and a conquest over the passions, as a cardinal virtue. They neglect wedlock; but select the children of others, while they are young and docile, and adopt and train them up as their own. They do not absolutely deny the moral fitness of marriage, and the succession of mankind continued thereby, but guard against the frailty of women, and can hardly admit an inviolable attachment to one man.

Peculiar tenets, forms, and manners, of the Essenes.

Their opinion of marriage.

They hold wealth, and what are called the good things of this world, in contempt; so that they are equally strangers to riches and poverty, as they have all things in common; or, in other words, the whole society live like brethren, being all equal sharers in one common patrimony: upon such a principle no man can be contemptible for being poor, nor honourable for being rich.

They share equally in the goods of this world.

They think oil a defilement, and value themselves upon the simplicity of their appearance, provided their garments are white and clean.

Their apparel plain and clean.

They appoint stewards for the management of their common stock, and leave it to their discretion to make distribution out of it to every man in proportion according to his need.

Their philanthropy.

They have no certain place of abode, but disperse themselves through different cities, towns, and villages, where they are ever ready and open to receive and entertain any of their own sect, and treat them, though strangers, with the same familiarity as if intimately acquainted.

Manner of living.

They carry nothing with them, when they travel, but arms for the security of their persons. They appoint, in every place, some one to take care of their strange brethren, and provide them with lodging, food, apparel, and necessities in general. The dress they wear resembles that of children when they are under the charge of masters and governors. Nor do they change their garments or shoes, but when one is torn, and the other worn out.

Of travelling.

They neither buy or sell among themselves, but supply each other's wants; not by way of exchange, but an obligation on the one party to give, and the other to receive.

They neither buy or sell with one another.

Their piety towards God is extraordinary; as they never speak a word of the common affairs of life before sun-rise, but upon certain traditional forms of prayer, imploring the Divine protection for the day. After this act of devotion, they betake themselves to their several occupations and employments, in which they labour with great diligence till an hour before noon, when they assemble in white veils, and bathe in cold water. Upon this purification they retire to their apartments, into which it is not permitted to any one of another sect to enter. From thence they enter into a refectory, or dining-hall, as into an holy temple, and sit down without uttering a word. The attendants place their loaves in order, and bring each one a single plate of one kind of food, which is not touched before the priest pronounces a blessing; as in like manner he returns thanks to the divine donor after meat. This duty performed, they lay aside their white garments, as in some degree sacred, and resume their ordinary avocations till evening, when they return to supper in the same manner; and if there be any strangers they sit down with them. Their houses are free from clamour or disturbance. They speak by turns, and observe a gravity and silence which excite the veneration of strangers, and arise from a constant course of moderation and sobriety.

Their piety and scruples in matters of conscience.

They

Their reverence for superiors.

They are not allowed to do any thing without the advice of their superiors, except in offices of compassion and assistance, in which they are left at liberty; for every man is free to help the virtuous; though they are restrained from relieving their kindred without permission from their superiors. They curb their passions, and are eminent for their fidelity, and preserving peace and good order. Their word is as sacred as an oath, which they avoid as worse than perjury, accounting a man, who cannot be believed without bringing God for a witness, as a liar, and unworthy of confidence.

Their fidelity.

Their reverence for antiquity.

They hold the works and writings of the ancients in great veneration, and select from them what is conducive to the benefit of their minds and bodies, as in the cases of ethics, or morals, or remedies for diseases, the virtues of plants, metals, minerals, and the like.

Form and method of entering into the society.

When any person is disposed to become a member of the society, he is not immediately admitted, but prescribed the mode of living for one whole year, and presented with an axe, a girdle, and a white garment. If, in that course of time, he has given evidence of his continence, they, in some respect, change his diet, and allow him the benefit of the water of purification. But he is not permitted to enter the refectory till he has passed a two years probation of his integrity; upon which trial he is taken into the society upon the following conditions:

Conditions specified.

He is first to bind himself, by solemn oaths, to love and worship God, and observe justice towards man; to injure no one of his own accord, nor at the command or persuasion of others; to declare himself an enemy to the wicked, and a friend to the righteous; to shew fidelity to all men, and especially to those in authority, as they are the ministers of God by his own appointment. He is likewise to declare, that if ever he should attain to an elevated station, he will never abuse that power to the injury of those who are subordinate to him, nor distinguish himself by any peculiar ornament of dress; that he will love and embrace the truth, and reprove those who speak falsehood. He binds himself also to keep his hands clear from theft and fraudulent dealing, and his mind from the desire of unlawful gains. He swears that he will not conceal from those of his own sect any of the mysteries of his religion, nor communicate any of their doctrines to others, though it should be to save his life: and finally, that he will communicate their doctrines in no other manner than as he received them himself; and will preserve the books belonging to their sect, and the names of those by whom they are written.

Those who are detected in heinous offences are excluded the society, and generally come to a miserable end, as they are bound by oath not to receive even a morsel of bread from the hand of a stranger, and thus compelled to graze like beasts till they perish. In this distress the society sometimes compassionates a case, and receives the delinquent again, deeming the punishment, in some degree, an atonement for the offence.

Their strict justice.

In the administration of justice they are singularly strict; determining nothing without the concurrence of at least an hundred voices; and from their sentence once passed there is no appeal.

Their reverence for their legislator.

Next to the supreme authority of God himself they hold in reverence that of their legislator, (Moses,) whom if any one blasphemes, he is punished with death. They ascribe great honour to their elders, and to the majority of the people; deeming it highly reasonable to obey the one, and hearken to the other. When there are ten members in council, no particular one is to speak if the other nine are against it. They hold it indecent, and even immoral, to spit towards the middle of the assembly, or upon the right hand of it.

Peculiar strictness in the observance of the sabbath.

They observe the sabbath with greater strictness than any other sect of the Jews; as they not only prepare their food the preceding day, to avoid kindling a fire upon that day, but will not move an utensil from one place to another.

Those who profess these tenets and practices, are divided into four sorts, according to their respective obligations. The younger are reputed so much inferior to their elders, that if the senior is touched by the junior, he must purify as it were upon the contact of a stranger.

Precedence to seniority.

They live to a great age, many of them an hundred years and upwards, which must be ascribed to the simplicity of their diet, and their temperance in general. They are also firm and hardy, contemning the miseries of life, and accounting an honourable death more desirable than an inglorious existence. Indeed our war with the Romans abundantly proves this part of their character; as, upon divers occasions, neither burning, or the most exquisite torture, could force from them an irreverent word of their legislator, or the breach of one of their rites or ceremonies. Tortures they also endured not only without supplication and tears, but with cheerfulness of countenance, defying the tormentors, and yielding up their breath with serenity and composure, in the assurance of exchanging the present life for a better in future.

Their longevity owing to temperance.

Their firmness and resolution.

They firmly believe the mortality of the body; and that the soul, being of the same nature with the subtlest air, is incorruptible and immortal, and by a kind of attraction enclosed in the body as in a prison; but that when it shall be freed from these corporeal bonds, or from a long slavery, it shall ascend to the region of bliss. This tenet seems to correspond with a certain opinion of the Greeks, who conceit that there is a region beyond the ocean, where there are neither rain, sun, or raging heats, but only gentle refreshing breezes: this they make the residence of the blest in a future state. As for the wicked, on the other hand, they stand, in their opinion, condemned to impetuous tempests, destroying frosts, and everlasting agonies and groans.

Their notion of the soul.

This is analogous to what Grecian fabulists relate of the fortunate islands, describing them as places set apart for the beatific enjoyment of those glorious spirits they call heroes and demi-gods. They have also their hades, or hell, which their fabulists inform us is an infernal pit, where Sisyphus, Tantalus, Ixion, Tityus, and the like, are consigned to different, but eternal, plagues and torments. This is built on the first supposition that souls are immortal, and from thence are derived exhortations to virtue, and dissuaves from vice; for good men are rendered better, even in this world, by the hopes of reward in another; and the vehement inclinations of bad men are restrained by the fear and expectation they are in, although their wickedness may be, in some measure, concealed in this life, of suffering eternal punishment after death. These are the doctrines of the Essenes concerning the subject of the soul; and we find very few, when once they have imbibed the same, that ever depart from it.

There are amongst the Essenes those who pretend to the spirit of prophecy, founding their pretences upon holy writ, and using preparatory purifications to fit them for the work; and it is observable that they seldom fail in their predictions.

Their claim to the spirit of prophecy.

There is another order of Essenes, agreeing with the former as to meats, manners, and laws, but differing from it in the point of marriage, as thinking that, by not marrying, they cut off succession, and thereby tend to extinguish the human race. The woman, however, must be subject to a three years probation; and if she should be found in a condition for child bearing, she is to be reputed, after that trial, qualified for wedlock. Thus much for the Essenes.

Agreement with the former order.

The Pharisees are professors of the law, and learned in the Jewish rites and ceremonies. The first article of their creed is, in effect, that fate and Providence do all; and yet that, whether we do well or ill, it is much in our own power, only that destiny interposes sometimes in this or that particular. They believe the soul to be immortal. They likewise believe a transmigration of the souls of good men into other bodies; but, at the same time, that the souls souls of the wicked are transmitted to a state of everlasting woe.

Their doctrine of fate and Providence.

The Sadducees, on the other hand, absolutely deny fate, affirming that God can do no ill, and that he leaves men at liberty to do what they list. They have good and evil before them, and they take their choice. The former sect are sociable, and live upon good terms with one another; while the latter are harsh and ill-natured among themselves, and absolutely inhuman and intolerable to strangers. But to return to the main subject.

C H A P. VIII.

Death of Augustus Cæsar. Succession of Tiberius. Pilate made governor of Judæa. A tumult upon conveying Cæsar's ensigns into Jerusalem. Pilate summons the Jews under a colour of hearing. Is induced, by the generous behaviour of the Jews, to remove the ensigns. Another tumult occasioned by a tax upon the holy treasure. Agrippa complains of Herod to Tiberius, and, in consequence of an expression to Caius, is kept prisoner till the death of that emperor. Caius Cæsar succeeds Tiberius, and advances Agrippa. Herod, at the instance of Herodias, seeks the favour of Caius. Deaths of Herod and Herodias in exile in Spain.

THE ethnarchy of Archelaus being now reduced into a province, the two brethren, Herod and Philip, (called Antipas,) continued in the administration of their tetrarchies. Salome, upon her demise, bequeathed her toparchy to Livia, the wife of Augustus, together with Jamnia, and a plantation of palm-trees at Phasaelis.

Augustus dying after a reign of fifty-seven years, six months, and two days, Tiberius, the son of Livia, succeeded to the Roman empire. Philip, the tetrarch, built a city in Paneas, which he called Cæsarea, and another in Gaulanitis, which he called Julius. Tiberias in Galilee was built by Herod, as was Julius in Perea.

Pilate being appointed governor of Judæa by Tiberius, secretly conveyed, by night, into the city, certain ensigns, with the image of Cæsar inscribed upon them. This excited a tumult amongst the Jews, who were alarmed at so flagrant a profanation of their religion, and violation of their liberties, as the introduction of images to the city was a thing totally forbidden. This tumult in town was speedily inflamed by a vast concourse of people from all parts of the province; in consequence of which the Jews went in a great body to Cæsarea, to move Pilate for relief, and there earnestly besought him to be tender of their laws, and order the removal of the images out of the city. Upon Pilate's inattention to their request, they fell prostrate, and in that posture continued immoveable five days and as many nights.

On the sixth day Pilate mounted the tribunal, which was in the great court, and called to him the multitude, as if desirous of giving them an answer; when suddenly, upon a signal given, the Jews were surrounded with armed troops; and Pilate, in the instant of their consternation, declared that every man should die, unless they admitted the images into the city, and gave intimation to the soldiers to draw their swords. The Jews, in this state of terror, cast themselves prostrate one and all before him, stretched out their necks, and offered themselves to the execution, crying out with one voice, that they would rather die than see the profanation of their laws. Pilate was so astonished at the daring zeal of these people in defence of their religion, that he gave immediate orders to have the statues removed.

This tumult was followed by another. The Jews have a sacred treasure, which they call corban, and Pilate laid a tax upon it towards the charge of aqueducts for the bringing in of water at the distance of three hundred furlongs. The common people were so irritated at this imposition, that they came with complaints to Pilate about it as he sat upon the tribunal. But he had caution to provide against a tumult, by intermixing soldiers in disguise with the multitude, to be in readiness to fall on whenever a signal should be given; but, in case of riot, to use staves only, and not their swords. The people growing clamorous, Pilate gave the soldiers the signal, who did execution according to their orders. Many of the Jews were destroyed, some dying by blows, some crowded and trampled to death, and others perishing in the pursuit. The multitude, alarmed at this chastisement, ceased from murmuring; so that this severity put an end to the tumult.

Another tumult excited by raising a tax on the sacred treasure.

In the mean time Agrippa, the son of that Aristobulus who was put to death by his father Herod, went to Tiberius with a complaint against Herod the tetrarch. Tiberius did not attend to the accusation; so that Agrippa continued at Rome in the condition of a private man, and made his court to persons of the first quality, and in particular to Caius, the son of Germanicus. Regaling him upon a certain occasion with a collation, Agrippa took an opportunity, in the hour of conviviality, of exclaiming, "how joyful he should be in seeing Caius emperor of the world instead of Tiberius." This being told to the latter by one of the company, he ordered him to be put in chains, and hardly treated in prison for the course of six months; at the expiration of which he departed this life himself, after a reign of twenty-two years, six months, and three days.

Death of Tiberius.

Caius Cæsar, upon his succeeding to the empire, discharged Agrippa, and gave him the tetrarchy of Philip, who was now dead, with the title of king annexed. The advancement of Agrippa excited the envy and ambition of Herod the tetrarch, which were not a little inflamed by his wife Herodias, who reproached him for his sloth, and told him it was only because he would not attend Cæsar, that he was deprived of greater dignity; for since the emperor had made Agrippa king from a private person, it was much more probable that he would promote him from a tetrarch to that rank. These arguments so far prevailed with Herod, that he repaired to Caius; but was followed by Agrippa, in order to prefer accusations against him. The emperor was so far from gratifying his ambition, that he reproved him severely, and gave his tetrarchy to Agrippa, in consequence of which he retired to Spain with his wife, and there died in exile.

He is succeeded by Caius, who liberates and advances Agrippa.

Herod and his wife die in exile in Spain.

C H A P. IX.

Caius Cæsar arrogates divine honours. His horrid cruelties. He orders Petronius, one of his generals, to set up his statue in the temple, and put all malecontents to the sword. Petronius advances with an army from Antioch towards Judæa. Description of Ptolemæus. The Jews repair thither, and petition Petronius, who summons them to Tiberias, and there reasons the case with them. He relents, and dismisses the court without coming to any resolution. Promises his mediation with Cæsar. Writes to the emperor to that purport. He orders him to be put to death, but his own premature fate prevents the execution.

SO elated was Caius Cæsar with his fortune, that he had the vanity to assume the name of a god, and aspire to divine honours. His cruelty also kept pace with his blasphemy, for he cut off great numbers of the Roman nobility, and extended his barbarity to Judæa, whither he sent his general Petronius, charged with a commission to set up his statue in the temple, and put every individual to the sword who should dare to make the least opposition, and make slaves of all the rest of the Jews. But the Divine Providence interposed and defeated his designs.

The blasphemy and cruelty of Caius Cæsar.

He sends Petronius to Jerusalem to set up his statue.

Petronius marched with all expedition from Antioch towards Judæa with three legions, and a considerable number of auxiliaries out of Syria. The report report of this expedition gained no credit with the greater part of the Jews, nor were those who believed it in a condition to put themselves in a posture of defence: but when the army advanced as far as Ptolemais, they were struck with an universal consternation.

Description of Ptolemais

Ptolemais is a city upon the coast of Galilee, situated on an extensive plain, and encompassed with mountains. That on the east side, at the distance of sixty furlongs, belongs to Galilee: that on the south to Carmel, which is distant an hundred and twenty furlongs: that on the north is the highest of them all, called, by the people of the country, "The ladder of the Tyrians," and distant also an hundred and twenty furlongs. The small river Belus runs by it at the distance of two furlongs. Not far from it stands Memnon's sepulchre, bordering upon a prospect of near an hundred cubits over, which has something in it well worthy of observation. There is the appearance of a round valley, that yields a kind of glassy sand. It is carried off by shipping; and as fast as they fetch it away, the winds from the summit of the mountains fill the place again. It is the nature of the soil to turn every thing to glass that comes into it; and, what is more extraordinary, that glassy sand, which is superfluous, once removed out of the place, becomes common sand again.

The Jews

mais, for relief.

In this state of consternation the Jews, with their wives and children, went to Petronius at Ptolemais, and there besought him for their country's sake, and their own, not to enforce the violation of their laws, to the utter destruction of so many wretched people. Petronius was prevailed upon by the number of the supplicants, and their deplorable condition, to leave his army, and the statues of Cæsar, at Ptolemais, advance towards Galilee, and summon the Jews, of all ranks and degrees, to attend him at Tiberias. Being there assembled, he entered upon detail of the strength and power of the empire, and the menaces of Cæsar, adding, that this request was a tacit affront, as they could claim no right to dispute these orders, to which all the subjects of the Roman empire, besides themselves, had submitted; which was the placing of the emperor's statues in the temples amongst those of their other gods. He added, that their opposition was little short of a revolt, and would be considered by Cæsar as the most palpable indignity.

He expostulates with them.

Allegation of the Jews.

They had only to alledge, that the laws and customs of their country would not allow them to set up any images whatever, either of God or man, or in any place whatsoever, either sacred or profane. Petronius replied, that he was under as indispensable a necessity of obeying the injunctions of the emperor his master, as they were of those of their legislator; so that, in consequence of transgressing in their favour, he must be liable to punishment, being as much under command as they were. Hereupon the whole multitude exclaimed, that they were ready to lay down their lives in vindication of their laws.

Answer of Petronius.

When the outcry subsided, Petronius demanded if they were resolved to take up arms against Cæsar? They not only replied in the negative, but declared that not a day passed but they offered up sacrifices for the prosperity of Cæsar, and the whole Roman people; but that, if he was determined to place images in the temple, he would make the nation of the Jews one common sacrifice, as they were ready to expose themselves, with their wives and children, to the severest torments. Petronius was so affected by this demonstration of invincible ardour, for the preservation of their religion, in the unanimous resolution of so vast a multitude, that he dismissed them without coming to a final decision.

Petronius then assembled the higher class in private, and the multitude in public; and sometimes had recourse to persuasion and advice, but chiefly to threatenings, insisting upon the power of the Romans, the high displeasure of Cæsar, and the necessity he was under of obeying his injunctions. But when he found that no consideration would prevail with them, and that the seed time was almost elapsed, having employed fifteen days in urging their suit, he told them that, for their sakes, he was determined to expose himself to a desperate hazard, in attempting to satisfy Cæsar, in failure of which his life would be at stake. He then dismissed the multitude, who offered up a thousand prayers for his prosperity, and drew off his army from Ptolemais to Antioch. From thence he immediately transmitted to Cæsar an account of the manner in which he entered Judæa, of the petition in which the whole nation joined, and the danger to which the whole province would be exposed in case of denial. They desired nothing more, he observed, than the maintenance of their laws against all innovations.

Caius very concisely answered the epistle of Petronius, by an order for putting him to death for not executing his command; but it so fell out that the bearers of this order were detained three months by contrary winds; and, in the mean time, Petronius received intelligence of the death of the emperor by a quicker passage, twenty-seven days before the arrival of the other.

C H A P. X.

Claudius declared emperor by the army. He is opposed by the senate. Agrippa courted both by Claudius and the senate. Espouses the interest of Claudius. Harangues in justification of Claudius and the army. Answer of the senate to Agrippa. Of Claudius to the senate. A soldier stands up for the honour of Claudius. Desertion of the soldiers followed by that of the senate. Agrippa prevents the destruction of the partizans of Claudius. Claudius acquires popularity. Sacrifices in form. Bountifully rewards Agrippa and Herod. The immense wealth and power of the former. Jerusalem is walled in. Death of Agrippa at Cesarea. Descendants of Alexander and Aristobulus.

CAIUS Cæsar being taken off by treachery, after he had maintained the imperial sway three years and six months, Claudius was advanced to the government by the army, which was then at Rome. The consuls Sentius Saturninus and Pomponius Secundus appointed, according to the resolution of the senate, three regiments of soldiers for the guard of the city, whilst they met in the capitol, determined to oppose the elevation of Claudius, on account of the barbarous treatment they had met with from Caius, as well as from a design of restoring the aristocratical form of government, when men of rank and integrity were taken into administration. At this time Agrippa happening to be at Rome, he was invited into the council by the senate, and into the camp by Claudius, as a considerable addition to what party soever he espoused. Agrippa finding Claudius emperor in effect, espoused his interest, and was immediately employed upon an embassy to the senate. He represented to them, upon the occasion, "That the army's setting him up as emperor was an act of absolute force, in which his will was totally unconcerned; that it being passed, he could not recede with honour or safety, it would provoke them to revenge if he should seem insensible of the obligation; insisting, again and again, on the danger he must inevitably incur by a pusillanimous resignation of the power vested in him by the grand bulwark of the empire. He added, that since the main point was gained, and he was in possession of the government, Claudius had determined with himself to attend and execute the office, not as a tyrant to domineer at will and pleasure, but as a prince to express the tenderest regard for the welfare and prosperity of his people. That he should content himself with the honour of the name of emperor, and, in cases of importance, be ever ready to hearken to the advice of the senate, as the exemplary fate of Caius was a warning to him to exercise moderation."

When Agrippa had proceeded thus far in his address, the senate, relying upon their credit with the army, and the prudence of their own councils, gave him him this concise reply, "That they were not a body to be made voluntary slaves." Agrippa reported the answer to Claudius, who sent him back to assure them, "That Claudius was not a man to betray his friends that raised him to the empire: that he was much concerned at the thought of entering into a dispute with the senate; but if it must come to a decision by dint of arms, he desired they would appoint some spot of ground without the city for the place of action, as it would be dreadful, beyond conception, to have Rome laid in blood and ashes to gratify the humour of a few rash and turbulent people." With this message Agrippa was charged by Claudius to the senate, and he accordingly delivered it.

A soldier

nour of Claudius.

At this very critical juncture of affairs, one of the soldiers then present, belonging to the senate, stood forth, and drawing his sword, thus exclaimed: "My brave companions, why are we thus at daggers with our best friends, and upon the brink of a civil war only for adhering to Claudius, an emperor of spotless character, and a prince whom we should rather treat with duty and respect as our protector, than threaten with arms as an enemy?" Having thus spoken, he marched through the whole senate, followed by the rest of the soldiers. This desertion so alarmed the nobility, that, to avoid more serious consequences, they gave over opposition, and following the example of the soldiery, went their way, and declared for Claudius. In the mean time divers of the male-content party lay upon the watch, with their swords drawn, under the walls, to dispatch them at their coming out; and they would have been all cut off, before Cæsar could have had any knowledge of the matter, had not Agrippa given timely notice to prevent it; telling Cæsar plainly, that if he did not restrain the licence of the army, especially toward the nobility, an universal massacre would shortly ensue, and, instead of being master of a glorious empire, it would leave him only prince of a depopulated nation. Claudius, prevailed on by the advice of Agrippa, restrained the violence of the soldiery, received the senate into the camp with due honours, and then went out with them, according to custom, to offer vows and sacrifices for the prosperity of the empire. He bestowed upon Agrippa not only his father's kingdom entire, but, over and above, those places that Augustus had conferred upon Herod, as Trachon and Auranitis, with what was called the kingdom of Lyfania, appointing the particulars of this grant to be notified by proclamation to the people; and giving it likewise in charge to the senate, to have it cut in brass, and set up in the capitol. He gave the kingdom of Chalcis to Herod, the brother of Agrippa, who was become his son-in-law, by his marriage with Berenice, his daughter.

Herod's
will is executed.

The wealth and power of Agrippa now exceeded the bounds of imagination; nor did he squander what he had acquired in vain and trifling objects. His first undertaking was the walling in of Jerusalem, which, had it been brought to perfection, would have rendered it impracticable for the Romans to take it by siege. But, after three years reign as king, he died at Cesarea, and left the work unfinished, having governed three years before in quality of tetrarch. He left three daughters by Cypris, Berenice, Mariamne, and Drusilla; and one son, whose name was Agrippa. Being very young when his father died, Claudius reduced the kingdom into a province, and made Cuspius Fadus governor; and after him Tiberius Alexander, who making no innovations in the laws and customs of the country, preserved the public peace. A little after this died Herod, governor of Chalcis, and left, by Berenice, the daughter of his brother, two sons, Berenicianus and Hyrcanus; and by Mariamne, his former wife, Aristobulus. There was another brother named Aristobulus, who died in a private station, and left a daughter, whose name was Jotapa. These, as before observed, were the children of Aristobulus, the son of Herod; but Alexander and Aristobulus were the sons of Herod by Mariamne, who were slain at the instance of their father. The posterity of Alexander ruled afterwards in the Greater Armenia.

CHAP. XI.

Herod of Chalcis dying, is succeeded by Agrippa; as is Tiberius Alexander by Cumanus. An insult offered by a Roman soldier to the Jews occasions a tumult. Ten thousand Jews are taken off. A Roman soldier tears the books of the law. The offender put to death by order of Cumanus. A dispute betwixt the Jews of Galilee and those of Samaria. An universal tumult in Jerusalem. Eleazar and Alexander ravage and murder in the villages. Judæa infested with robbers. Complaint made to Quadratus, who goes to Jerusalem to be farther informed. Cæsar gives Cumanus and the Samaritans an hearing at Rome. He passes judgment against the Samaritans, and orders the execution of it. Death of Claudius, and succession of Nero, a most flagitious and abandoned prince.

ON the death of Herod, who reigned in Chalcis, Claudius introduced Agrippa, the son of Agrippa, into the kingdom of his uncle; and Cumanus succeeded Tiberius Alexander in the government of Judæa. During the time of his administration the Jews fell into new grievances and disturbances. The people being assembled together in vast numbers at Jerusalem, to celebrate the feast of unleavened bread, and a band of soldiers being stationed at the gate of the temple, as was customary upon those occasions, to prevent tumults, one of the soldiers turned his back, and stood in an indecent posture towards the Jews. This put the whole multitude in such a rage, that they pressed in throngs to Cumanus for justice upon the soldier for that affront; and those who were most tumultuous amongst them began to stone the soldiers. Cumanus, apprehending further mischief from a popular outrage, sent a reinforcement of men to support the former band. This so alarmed the Jews, that they pressed to get out of the temple with all haste, inasmuch that the passages were so crowded, that ten thousand of them were trodden and squeezed to death. This accident rendered it a melancholy solemnity to the whole nation. Tears and wringing of hands were seen in every house; nor was there a family but had a share in the mourning.

There soon followed another calamity, which arose from a tumult occasioned by robbers. One Stephen, a domestic of Cæsar's, carrying some furniture from Bethoron, was set upon and robbed by a band of thieves. Upon this Cumanus sent a party to apprehend the people in the neighbouring villages, and bring them bound to him, making them responsible for not pursuing and taking the robbers. While they were upon this enquiry, a soldier happening, in the search, to lay his hands upon the books of Moses, rent them in pieces, and threw them into the fire. The Jews assembled in an instant as if the whole country had been in a flame, and, actuated by the most fiery zeal for their religion, hastened to Cumanus at Cesarea, and there pressed him most importunately not to suffer the wretch to escape unpunished, who had offered so daring an insult to God and his sacred laws. Cumanus, finding there was no appeasing the enraged multitude without some sort of satisfaction, commanded the soldier to be brought out, and put to death in the sight of the whole field, which putting an end to the tumult, the Jews departed.

There happened, at the same time, an unfortunate difference between the Jews of Galilee and those at Samaria. There was a certain Jew of Galilee passing through a village called Geman, in the great plain of Samaria, that was there killed as he was going up to Jerusalem to worship at a solemn festival. The people of Galilee, upon this, drew out a body to revenge themselves upon the Samaritans by arms: but the better sort applied to Cumanus, and advised him by all means, before the dispute went too far, to go over to Galilee, and, upon strict enquiry into the matter, see justice done on the murderers.

derers. Cumanus having other concerns in hand, dismissed the petitioners without entering into the cause. The report of this outrage afterwards reaching Jerusalem, so enraged the whole multitude, that, leaving the business of the day, they determined, without either officer or order, to fall upon Samaria, in spite of the efforts of superiors to restrain them. The ringleaders of this robbery and murder were Eleazar, the son of Dinæus, and Alexander, who breaking into the borders of Acrabatena, laid waste all before them, and put men, women, and children to the sword.

to the rout.

Cumanus, upon receiving intelligence of this ravage, came with a party of horse to the relief of the country, took many of Eleazar's band, and cut off many more. The remainder of this rabble committed such depredations in Samaria, that the great officers and leading men of Jerusalem went out with mournful appearance, and used every art and argument to prevail with them to desist from their outrages. They entreated them not to destroy Jerusalem to be revenged of Samaria, to have pity upon their country, their temple, their city, their wives, which were all at stake, and not to sacrifice all that was dear to them in this world in revenge for the loss of one poor Galilean. The Jews at length became cool, and the tumults subsided.

Judæa overrun with robbers.

It might now be said to be the period of universal rapine, in which the main business of the people was to prey upon each other; and the most powerful plundered the lower class of their countrymen. Numidius Quadratus being then governor of Syria, several of the heads of the Samaritans applied to him at Tyre, with a heavy complaint against the robbers that infested that country. There were divers of the leading men of the Jews then present, and amongst the rest Jonathan, the son of Ananus, the high-priest, who turned the blame upon the Samaritans as the first authors of the tumult in the death of the Galilean. He charged the consequences also upon Cumanus, for not bringing the offender to justice in due time.

Quadratus, having heard the cause, deferred the further consideration of it till he came into Judæa, where he might receive more particular information. He then went to Cæsarea, and there caused all those that Cumanus had taken alive to be put to death. From thence he proceeded to Lydda, where he heard the Samaritan cause over again, and ordered eighteen leading men of the Jews to be beheaded, as they were found to have been abettors of the tumults. He sent the two high-priests, Jonathan and Ananias, with Ananus, the son of Ananias, and some other Jews of the first rank, to Cæsar, together with some noble Samaritans. He also ordered Cumanus, and Celos, the tribune, away to Rome, to give an account of what had been done to Claudius. Having thus finished these matters, he went up to Jerusalem from Lydda, and finding the multitude celebrating their feast of unleavened bread without any tumult, he returned to Antioch.

He constituted Felix, the brother of Pallas, governor of Judæa, Samaria, Galilee, and Perea; and preferred Agrippa from Chalcis to a greater dominion, giving him the tetrarchy that had belonged to Philip, which contained Batanea, Trachon, and Gaulanitis, superadding the kingdom of Lyfania, and the province which Varus had governed.

Death of Claudius
and succession of Nero.

When Claudius Cæsar had reigned thirteen years, eight months, and twenty days, he departed this life, and left the succession to Nero, whom his wife Agrippina had artfully introduced to the empire, notwithstanding he had at that time a legitimate son, Britannicus, by his first wife Messalina, and a daughter, Octavia, whom he married to Nero. He had also another daughter, by Petina, called Antonia.

No man, perhaps, perverted power and wealth more than Nero to the injury of others, as appears from the imbruing his hands in the blood of his brother, his wife, and his mother. He merited the complicated character of tyrant and buffoon, incompatible as they may seem; for he not only exercised the most horrid barbarities towards his nearest relations, but introduced subjects of dignity and importance in a most ridiculous point of view upon the public stage. But as the history of this emperor is so generally known, I shall pass over trivial matters, and confine myself to those particulars in which the Jews were chiefly concerned.

Nero's liberality to Aristobulus and Agrippa. Felix chastises the robbers. A new set of free-booters, called Sicarii. Jonathan, the high-priest, the first that fell by their hands. Anarchy and confusion prevail throughout Jerusalem. Dangerous effects of enthusiasm, seduction, and imposture. A magician pretends to the spirit of prophecy, and marches with thirty thousand followers towards Jerusalem. Felix meets and totally routs him. A lawless banditti persuade the Jews to revolt. An outrageous tumult between the Jews and Syrians. The matter in dispute finally referred to Cæsar. Felix is succeeded by Festus.

NERO, soon after his accession to the imperial dignity, conferred upon Aristobulus, the son of Herod, king of Chalcis, the government of Armenia the Lesser, and annexed four more cities to the territory of Agrippa; that is to say, Abila and Julias in Peræa; and in Galilee, Tarichee and Tiberias, with their dependencies. The remainder of Judæa he gave to Felix, who was no sooner vested with his commission, than he went in quest of the robbers, took Eleazar, their leader, with several others, and sent them all bound to Rome, after they had ravaged the country for the space of twenty years, so that the number of robbers whom he caused to be put to death, and the country people that joined them, was almost incredible.

These ruffians were no sooner suppressed, than there sprang up another set of robbers, under the name of Sicarii, from sica, the weapon they used. They made no scruple of executing their destructive practices in the open day, and in the very streets of Jerusalem. Their custom was to carry short daggers under their garments, and mixing with the multitude at festivals in particular, deal death around them without being detected. They continued this horrid practice some time, not only without discovery, but without being so much as suspected. The first man slain by these assassins was Jonathan, the high-priest; after which not a day passed without several executions of the same kind. This occasioned a general alarm, inasmuch, that the apprehension was almost as dreadful as the mischief itself; and it was as dangerous to walk the streets as to be in a field of battle. Every man at a distance was suspected for an enemy; nor could even reputed friends be trusted upon their approach to each other. Nor was the utmost watchfulness, and minutest caution, a sufficient security, so dexterous were these bravos in the exercise of their profession.

There started up at this time another sort of miscreants, who did more mischief with their tongues than the others did with their weapons. They shed no blood, indeed, but caused more destruction by their pernicious doctrines than the others did with their daggers, raising disorder and confusion throughout the city. These were impostors and seducers, who, under pretence of divine inspiration, inculcated vague opinions and absurd innovations. They drew the multitude into woods and solitudes, pretending that God would there set them at perfect liberty, and reveal himself to them by such tokens from heaven.

as would give them infallible assurance of it. Felix foresaw the design of this proceeding, and was convinced of the necessity of nipping the attempt of a revolt in the bud; so that he sent out a body of horse and foot in pursuit of these enthusiasts, which destroyed great numbers of their disciples and followers.

vices of an

phet.

These mischiefs were followed by those of an Egyptian pretender, that proved more fatal to the Jews than the former. He was a magician, but passed for a prophet, and raised a set of followers, to the number of about 30,000, whom he inveigled into his trammels. These deluded people he led, by the way of the wilderness, to mount Olivet, proposing to march thence to Jerusalem, expel the Roman garrison; and make himself master of the city and country, having his followers and guards about him to assist in the enterprize. Felix, finding it to be a growing evil, advanced up to the Egyptian with his Roman legions, and a considerable body of Jews that joined him. He then gave him battle, and totally defeated him; the Egyptian himself, and some few of his followers, saving themselves by flight. Great numbers of them were slain, others taken and put into chains, and the rest dispersed to their own habitations.

New dis-
arise.

The state of a nation resembles the state of the body, in which one disease is generally followed by another; for these magicians and freebooters were now concerting a scheme for asserting absolute liberty, and engaging the multitude in a resolution to shake off the Roman yoke. This they attempted both by argument and menace, threatening death, without mercy, to any man who acknowledged the Roman jurisdiction; and proposing to reduce those by terror, that would otherwise subject themselves to a voluntary slavery. They formed themselves into different bodies, and dispersed throughout the country, diffusing slaughter and devastation; so that Judaea was brought to the very extremity of desperation, and the destructive flame raged more and more every day.

At first quarrel between the Jews and Syrians.

At the same time a disturbance happened at Cesarea, upon a commotion started there betwixt the Jews and Syrians living promiscuously together. The Jews claimed it as their city, arguing, that a Jew was the founder of it, referring to king Herod. The Syrians could not deny that a Jew had been the founder of it, but insisted, on the other hand, that it belonged to the Gentiles, since, if it had been a Jewish city, they would never suffer statues to be erected in it. The contest between the parties became so warm, that they had recourse to arms; and not a day passed, but there was mischief done by the most resolute of each party. The elders exerted their authority and counsel to quiet the Jews on the one hand; and the Greeks had too exalted an idea of their own importance to submit to the Jews. The latter were deemed to possess more wealth and courage than their competitors, who had, however, greater interest with the soldiery; for a considerable part of the Roman army being drawn out of Syria, they were the readier to assist them, both as their countrymen and kindred. The magistrates and officers did their utmost, by severity of discipline, to suppress the tumult, taking the incorrigible into custody, and inflicting punishment with rigour. But the exemplary sufferings of a part had no effect upon the whole; on the contrary, that which was designed to intimidate, served but to harden them in their daring pursuit.

When Felix found that no means would bring them to reason, he commanded the factious out of the city, by proclamation, at their utmost peril; but divers remaining there in contempt of authority, the governor sent a party of soldiers amongst them, who slew many, and seized on their effects. But the sedition still prevailing, he dispatched some of the principal men of both parties to Nero, as commissioners to plead their cause before him. Festus succeeded Felix, and was very active in suppressing these disturbances, and bringing the authors to condign punishment.

Festus is succeeded by Albinus, who proves a corrupt and tyrannical governor. His successor, Gessius Florus, is more flagitious. Their characters compared. Florus is accused to Cestius Gallus, governor of Syria. He endeavours to excite the Jews to rebellion. The rise of the Jewish war.

ALBINUS, who succeeded Festus, did not tread in the steps of his predecessor. He was a man universally depraved, addicted to corruption, avarice, extortion, and oppression; so that the nation groaned under most intolerable burthens during the time of his government. He adopted the most destructive system of policy, was influenced in every measure by venality, would pass or revoke sentence as bribed; in fine, as money was his god, so it swayed his conduct in general, to the utter perversion of justice, and abolition of every principle of virtue.

Albinus a most disorderly governor.

There prevailed, at this time, a faction in Jerusalem, which had determined to introduce an innovation, and compounded with Albinus to connive at their practices. The ringleaders of this sedition had each of them a band of resolute at command; while the governor himself, as an arch-robber, with his guards about him, perverted his authority in the plunder of those who were not in a condition for resistance or defence. These iniquitous proceedings came at length to that pass, that those who sustained the loss of their property durst not complain; and those who escaped, were under a necessity of giving up a part of what they had to secure the rest: in fine, all good faith was banished, tyranny and oppression universally prevailed, and proved eventually the foundation of slavery.

Rapine universally prevails.

Such was the character of Albinus; but Gessius Florus, his successor, exceeded him in iniquity; for the former had recourse to privacy and dissimulation in his nefarious practices, while the latter gloried in his shame, valued himself upon the enormity of his crimes, and vaunted in professing himself an enemy to the whole nation. In the province he acted the part of an executioner rather than that of a governor, treating the whole body of the people as common criminals, without setting any bounds either to his rapine or his tyranny. He was as void of pity as of sense of honour, merciless to the miserable, lost to shame, and incapable of a blush at the foulest actions. He possessed the art of disguising truth with paradox and chicane, and working mischief under the sanction of plausibility. Injuries to individuals would not satisfy his rapacious desires, but whole cities must be laid desolate to gratify his more than savage barbarity. He gave as much liberty and encouragement to rapine as if it had been publicly tolerated; nor was any one prohibited from plundering, if he might be admitted to share in the booty. Such, in effect, was his avarice, that the whole province was drained, and consequently deserted by its inhabitants as a dreary waste.

Characters

compared.

Cestius Gallus was at this time governor of Syria, and so much attached to Florus, that not a Jew, even of the first rank, durst prefer a complaint against him; but, upon his coming up to Jerusalem, at the feast of unleavened bread, the multitude, to the number of three hundred thousand, made their application to take pity of a miserable people, and deliver the province out of the hands of Florus, that pest of society, and tyrant of a governor. Florus was within hearing of this complaint, but so far from being moved at it, that he turned it into ridicule. Cestus used his utmost efforts to pacify the people, assuring them that Florus should treat them with more lenity in future, and then returned to Antioch. Florus attended him on his way as far as Cesarea, and amused him with many vague reports as they passed, in order to induce him to act in an hostile manner towards the Jews, as the only means of lying undiscovered, and bringing himself off. In case of a peace, the Jews, he thought, would embrace that opportunity for bringing the cause before Cæsar, which would subject him to danger; whereas, if he could but once work them up to a revolt, the greater mischief would divert their attention from the lesser; and therefore his only means were to force them, by degrees, into a rebellion in his own defence.

The rise of the Jewish war.

The Cæsarean Greeks had, at this time, carried their cause against the Jews before Cæsar, and obtained a decree in their favour, which sentence gave rise to the Jewish war. It bore date the twelfth year of Nero, and the seventeenth of Agrippa, in the month Artemisius.

C H A P. XIV.

A violent dispute between the Jews of Cæsarea and the Greeks. Bribery and perfidy of Florus. A mock sacrifice occasions a tumult. Jucundus endeavours to suppress it, but in vain. The Jews petition Florus for relief, and are punished for so doing. He incenses them to outrage. His barbarous proceedings. The sobriety and moderation of the Jews. Florus becomes worse for good council. His cruel orders. Several of the nobility whipped and crucified. Florus causes 630 Jews to be massacred in one day.

THE tyranny of Florus was a dangerous temptation to a rebellion, but the Jews stood firm against that provocation, till, at length, it was brought about by an incident that fell out in Cæsarea.

A certain Greek had a house in Cæsarea, near the spot upon which stood the Jewish synagogue. The Jews were desirous of making a purchase of this house, and treated with the proprietor several times about it, offering much more for it than the intrinsic value. But the proprietor was so far from complying with their proposal, that, from a spirit of aggravation, he raised other buildings, and so blocked up the avenues, that there was scarcely room for a single person to pass to the synagogue. Upon this, some of the Jewish youths applied to the inspector of the buildings, and warned them, at their peril, to order the workmen to desist. Florus countermanded the prohibition; so that the Jews had only to tamper with the governor by the offer of a sum of money. Several of their principal men met about it, and, amongst the rest, John, a publican, or collector of revenues, who contracted with Florus, for eight talents, to forbid the prosecution of the work. They delivered him the sum according to a stipulated agreement, and he promised to fulfil the conditions; but immediately after, upon the receipt of it, he went from Cæsarea to Sebaste, and left the parties at liberty to contend the point, as if he had taken the money to furnish an opportunity for them to massacre one another.

The Jews insulted at Cæsarea by a mock sacrifice.

A violent commotion.

The Jews remove the books of the law.

The next day, being the Jews sabbath, when the people were assembled in the synagogue, a seditious Cæsarean placed an earthen vessel just at the entrance, with a sacrifice of birds upon it. This contemptuous mockery incensed the Jews to a degree of madness, as it was in open derision of their laws, and a profanation of their most sacred rites. The more moderate and substantial men of their party were for appealing to government for redress; but the younger, and more hot-brained, determined on revenge; and the Cæsareans being as ready for an encounter, which was the design of the insult, the contest accordingly took place.

Jucundus, an officer of horse, who was left to keep the peace, coming up at this juncture, ordered the earthen vessel to be taken away, and endeavoured to put a stop to the tumult. But the Jews finding Jucundus overbore by the Cæsareans, took up the books of their law, and carried them off to Nabata, a place about sixty furlongs distant from Cæsarea. John, abovementioned, and twelve of their principal men, went to Florus at Sebaste, with a complaint of what had passed, and a petition for redress, reminding him, though with the utmost delicacy, of the eight talents he had received. But Florus, notwithstanding, ordered them to be apprehended, and put in prison, for presuming to remove the books of the law from Cæsarea.

Prosecution of the Jews.

Rejoice in the multitude.

The multitude, however, notwithstanding the indignities offered them, assumed the appearance of an officious respect in going out to receive him upon the way, and preparing to entertain him with all the tokens of honour and esteem usual upon such occasions. But, as an anticipation of their very submissive design, Florus sent Capito, a centurion, before hand, with a band of fifty horses, to stop their progress, and deliver them a message to the following purport: "I am to command you, in the name of Florus, to return home, and to let you understand, that the man with whom you have so freely sported, is not to be cajoled into a better opinion of you by plausible appearances. If you are as you would be thought to be, men of courage and resolution, aver your reproaches to his face; and assert that liberty by dint of arms, you have so vainly endeavoured to do by tumult and clamour." This message alarmed the multitude; so that, upon the approach of the centurion with his band of horse, they dispersed, without waiting for the ceremony of saluting Florus, and manifesting their submissive disposition. They retired to their own habitations, and passed the night in disquieting apprehensions.

Florus took up his abode at the palace, and the next day ascended the tribunal, the high-priest and great officers of the city being there present. He animadverted, with great severity, upon some reproachful and sarcastic speeches that had been thrown out against him; peremptorily insisting that the authors should be produced, and threatening to take vengeance upon those that were on the spot, if they did not find out the guilty.

The heads of the Jews assured Florus, that the people in general were peaceably disposed, and implored pardon for those who had uttered sarcastic and reproachful expressions; observing, that, in so vast a multitude, there must be some rash and headstrong men; nor was it possible to distinguish the guilty; for even those who repented of what they had done, would not make confession. They submitted it to his consideration, whether any thing could tend more to the honour and interest of the Roman empire, than to consult the safety of the people and city, by preserving them firm in their allegiance to Cæsar; and whether it might not be more advisable to spare some few of the guilty for the sake of a great number of innocent people, than to destroy so many innocent for the sake of a few guilty.

Florus

Florus was so inflamed by this remonstrance, that he immediately ordered the soldiers to plunder what was called the upper market-place, and slay those who opposed them. The soldiery therefore, finding themselves supported in their claims to pillage by the concurring authority of their commander, not only executed their order upon the places and people they were sent to, but forcing themselves into every house, rifled at pleasure, and put the inhabitants to death without distinction, as well those they took upon their flight in bye-ways and secret passages, as those they found in their houses. In fact, no booty came amiss to them. Several men of rank, whom they seized and brought to Florus, were, by his order, whipped and crucified. The whole number of the slain upon that day, including women and children, (for they spared not infants at the breast,) amounted to six hundred and thirty. The calamity was aggravated by a new species of Roman severity; for before the time of Florus, it was never known that any of the equestrian order were whipped, or ignominiously nailed to the cross; for tho' the persons, thus disgraced, were, by extraction, Jews, they were, notwithstanding, of Roman dignity.

CHAP. XV.

Berenice, the sister of Agrippa, goes to Jerusalem to pay a vow. The form and manner of performing that duty. She intercedes with Florus in behalf of the Jews. The people are incensed against Florus. Afterwards brought to moderation. Florus re-kindles the flames of discord. The high-priests appease and bring them to reason. The project of Florus attended with most destructive effects. He attempts the castle, and is repulsed. Retires to the palace. The communication cut off betwixt Fort Antonia and the Temple. Florus quits his design, and returns to Cesarea.

AGRIPPA was at this time gone to Alexandria, to congratulate Alexander upon his having obtained the government of Egypt from Nero. His sister Berenice was then at Jerusalem, and in extreme concern for the barbarous outrages practised there, inasmuch that she sent several officers of her guards to Florus, earnestly to entreat him to desist from the effusion of human blood. But Florus was equally insensible of the atrocious nature of the sin, and dignified rank of the mediatrix. His heart was set upon lucre and pillage, that he looked upon all other considerations (the intercession of Berenice not excepted) with neglect and contempt. Nay, to such a degree did the violence of the soldiery proceed, that they not only perpetrated their massacres before her face, but would have wreaked their cruelty on her person, if she had not made her escape into the palace, and remained there during the night, with her guards under the strictest watch for fear of a surprise.

The occasion of her coming to Jerusalem was to offer up a vow to the Almighty, as is customary in providential deliverance from sickness or any great danger. It is usual, with persons under these circumstances, to continue in prayer for thirty days before they sacrifice, abstaining from wine and shaving the head. Berenice was now in the regular performance of this duty, and took an opportunity of standing barefoot before the tribunal, to intercede with Florus in behalf of the people of the Jews. But as on the former, so on the present, occasion, she met neither with success or respect, but incurred imminent hazard of life for her pious offices.

What happened on the sixteenth day of the month Nisan, and upon the following day the people gathered together in the market-place in the upper town, outrageously exclaiming against the murderers of their friends who had been slain there the preceding day. The whole streets of their rage and indignity fell upon Florus. The leading men, and the high-priests, were so sensible of the danger of ad-garments, and, in humblest tone, besought the multitude to desist from exclaiming, as the exasperating of Florus would be attended with inevitable ruin to them all. This mode of interposition appeased them, and they ceased their outrages, partly through respect to the intercessions, and partly through hope that the governor would relent.

The tumult subsided.

Florus, who seemed to delight in broils, bethought himself of a device to rekindle the flame. He sent for the high-priests, and some of the chief men of the Jews, to come to him, and told them, that as there were two companies of soldiers coming from Cesarea, it would be a convincing evidence of the people's good affection to government, if they would go forth and meet them on the way. This being agreed upon, Florus sent beforehand, and gave it in charge to the centurions, that in case the Jews greeted them with any shew of compliment or respect upon their meeting, they should not make the least token of a return; and that, upon the smallest appearance of disgust, they should betake themselves to their arms. The high-priests assembled the people in the temple, and there adjured them, by all means, to go out and compliment the Romans upon the way, giving them a friendly salutation to prevent future mischiefs. The more rash and resolute opposed this counsel; but some of them, revolving in their minds the horrid massacre of their relations and friends, were disposed to compliance.

Project of Florus for reviving it.

While this was in agitation, the priests and Levites entered, exposing the sacred vessels, and other ornaments of the temple, and filling the choir with their musical instruments, and addressed themselves to the people with earnest entreaties to preserve the honour of the temple inviolate, without provoking the Romans by contumacious affronts to rouse it. There were also divers of the high-priests, who, covered with sack-cloth and ashes, and with garments rent, applied themselves to all the men of rank, both individually and collectively, repeatedly importuning them not to betray their country for to trivial a consideration to those very people who were continually meditating its destruction. They justly observed, "That the Roman soldiers would derive no benefit from a salutation from the Jews; nor the Jews, on the other hand, any advantage from neglecting the salutation. That, on the contrary, if they treated them with honour, and according to the punctilios usual upon such occasions, Florus could have no pretence for urging hostilities; so that, in effect, it would tend to the redemption of their country from the calamities they had otherwise reason to apprehend; and further, that they should consider the disproportion betwixt the peaceable majority of the multitude and a few flagrant mutineers, and the propriety of the greater part over-ruling the lesser."

The priests and Levites are peaceably disposed.

These arguments had such an effect, that, betwixt authority and menace, the most resolute were brought to attend to the dictates of reason; so that when matters were brought to this moderate pass, the priests, and heads of the people, marched out to meet the soldiers, and the multitude followed them in good order.

When the Jews were advanced within distance of exchanging ceremonious salutations, they addressed them with every expression of respect; but receiving no return, the more choleric part reviled Florus as the author and contriver of mischief. The soldiers took the hint, and began to fall upon the Jews, threw them into confusion, and, upon the pursuit, trampled great numbers under the horses' feet; so that betwixt those that died of blows and wounds, those that were crushed to death in the crowd, or smothered in the gate by pressing to get out, a horrid carnage ensued, and exhibited to dreadful a spectacle, that from bruises, maims, and suffocation, the bodies were so disfigured, that one relation did not know the face of another, in order to provide a decent funeral. In fine, the enemy slew all they came up with in the pursuit, showing no mercy. But their main design was to get betwixt the Jews and the gates of Bezeth, being a passage that led to the castle of Antonia and the temple.

The Roman soldiers thus drove the Jews, and slew many of them.

A terrible destruction and bloodshed.

Florus, at the same time, made a sally out of the palace, with what troops he had, upon the back of the Jews, with a view of forcing the castle; but the people immediately rallying, and making head against him, he failed in his attempt. Having got possession of the houses, they annoyed the Romans to such a degree with their darts from the roofs, that, finding no defence against that mode of attack, nor any possibility of breaking through the throng which stopped up the narrow passages, Florus was obliged to retire with the remainder of his army to the palace.

The Jews being now under some apprehension that Florus would return to the assault, and make an attempt upon the temple by the way of Fort Antonia, they cut down a certain gallery of communication betwixt the fort and the temple, which so mortified Florus, that, finding his project hopeless, and his avarice disappointed, (the sacred treasure being all his aim,) he gave up the enterprize.

Cesarea.

Upon this he conferred with the high-priest and Sanhedrim, assuring them that he was now leaving the city, and ready to assign to them as large a garrison as they should desire. They promised, in consequence of this liberal proposal, that they would make no innovations, provided he would leave them one company; but not that which had maintained the contest against them, on account of the prejudices the people had imbibed from the injuries they had sustained from them. Florus changed the company according to their desire, and, with the rest of his forces, returned to Cesarea.

C H A P. XVI.

Florus accuses the Jews to Cestius, governor of Syria, as enemies to Cæsar. Cestius deliberates on the matter, and charges Politianus to make strict enquiry concerning it. The people of Jerusalem represent to him the destructive measures pursued by Florus. Give proof of their obedience to other governors. Address themselves to Agrippa for his concurrence in sending deputies to Nero to prefer a complaint against Florus. Agrippa calls an assembly, and, in an elaborate speech, dissuades the Jews from prosecuting a war with the Romans. His speech produces a momentary effect; but the Jews lapsing into their former outrages, he leaves them, and retires to his own kingdom.

Florus
charges the Jews falsely to Cestius.

FLORUS, upon his arrival at Cesarea, pursued other means for inflaming a war, which was by sending a letter to Cestius, and charging the Jews falsely with a design of revolting from the Roman government, and imputing to them the very misdemeanor of which he had been guilty himself. But the queen Berenice, and the principal men of Jerusalem, were so equitable and candid in this matter, as to state the particulars in the clearest light, and represent to Cestius, without exaggeration or palliation, the government of Florus.

Upon receipt of this intelligence, Cestius consulted with his principal officers respecting the most expedient method of proceeding. Some were for his advancing with an army immediately into Judæa, in order to bring the offenders to justice, if the report should appear true; or otherwise to encourage them in their loyalty, if they were falsely accused. Cestius was of opinion that it would be more advisable to send some person of honour and address beforehand, to investigate matters, and transmit to him a faithful account of their present state. He accordingly made choice of one of his tribunes, named Politianus, who meeting king Agrippa near Jamnia, on his return from Alexandria, told him by whom he was sent, and what was the purport of his mission.

Cestius sends Politianus to learn the true state of Judæa.

There were then present several high-priests, as well as members of the Sanhedrim, and others of the first rank amongst the Jews, who came to congratulate the king upon his safe return. These had no sooner paid their obedience in due form, than they proceeded to lay before him a lamentable detail of the piteous condition to which they were reduced by the barbarities of Florus. Agrippa felt for their distress; but, from secret designs, apparently turned his invective against the Jews rather than the governor, in order to restrain the impetuosity of their passion; as the less they might seem to suffer, the less provocation they could pretend to revenge. Those who had most property at stake, and consequently most reason to desire a peace, looked upon this gentle reproof as intended by the king for their good.

The people of Jerusalem met Agrippa and Politianus upon their way sixty furlongs from the city, to escort them with all respect and honour; while the women bewailed the loss of their murdered husbands, and the whole multitude joined in one general lamentation; some imploring Agrippa generously to compassionate the calamities of the nation, and others entreating Politianus but to go into the city, in order to be an eye-witness of the desolations of Florus. Upon this they took him into the marketplace, and pointed out to him its abandoned and forlorn state. They then prevailed with him, through the means of Agrippa, to make the tour of the city as far as Siloah, with only one servant, that he might thereby have demonstrative proof how obedient the Jews were to all other Romans in authority, though the horrid cruelties of Florus were utterly intolerable. When he had taken a view of the city, and informed himself sufficiently of the loyal disposition of the Jews, he called the people together, and went up to the temple, where he entered into a declamation of commendations of their approved fidelity to the Romans, earnestly exhorted them to keep the peace, and, having performed such parts of Divine worship as he was allowed to do, returned to Cestius.

Immediately upon the departure of Politianus, the multitude addressed themselves to the king and high-priests, importunately soliciting permission to send deputies to Nero with a complaint against Florus; alledging, that their silence would afford suspicion that they had been the occasion of the havoc which had been made, that they were disposed to revolt, and were the authors of the war, and thence inferred the expedience of stating these matters to the emperor. It was evident, on the one hand, that nothing would satisfy them but the grant of this liberty; and it appeared an invidious prosecution on the other, to suffer the multitude to prefer such an invective against their governor under the sanction of an embassy. So that Agrippa, in this dilemma, called the multitude together in a large gallery; and having placed his sister Berenice in a chair of state in the Asmonean palace, which overlooks that gallery from the upper part of the town, he addressed them in words to the following import:

“If I found you under any sort of disposition to make war upon the Romans, as I am at this time clearly convinced of the contrary, and that the greater part of your profession are men of peace and order, I should have saved both you and myself this trouble. For what would any application or advice signify to a body of men that labour under an incurable prejudice? But as some people are unquiet for want of an experimental knowledge of the miseries of war, some out of a vain and inconsiderate hope of liberty, others out of avarice for the advantage of the booty, and making profit to themselves out of a general confusion, I have now thought fit to call you together, and tell you what I think convenient to be done under your circumstances, in order to the rectifying of your errors, and to prevent the ruin of a loyal majority by the intemperate heat of a few desperate libertines. All I desire is your patience and silence, and to be heard without murmuring and noise, whether you approve what I say or not. As for those that are abandoned to the spirit of disorder and confusion, and irreverently lost, they are still at liberty to go their own way.”

“own way, let my opinion be what it will. But it “is to no purpose for me to speak at all, unless I “may be heard by those that desire to hear me.

“I well know that the faults of governors, and “the blessings of liberty, are two common topics
“for men of art and passion to work upon. Before “I enter upon the disquisition of what you your“selves are, and the force you are pretending to en“counter, I must, in the first place, divide two “points that you confound, by taking them into “one. If revenge upon your oppressors (or let it “be called justice) be the thing that you contend “for, what is the meaning of your crying up li“berty at such an extravagant rate? Or, if sub“jection be in itself so intolerable, why quarrel “with your governors? Subjection is but subjec“tion still.

“Consider upon what ground it is that you pre“tend to calumniate and cavil, and in what manner
“you are to behave yourselves, even if your go“vernors should be to blame. It is your interest, “as well as duty, to moderate things with offices of “tenderness and respect, and not to treat your su“periors with unbecoming language. When you “make things greater than they are, you provoke “those that are over you to make things worse “than they would otherwise be; and to turn that “mal-administration, that they were half-ashamed “of before, into a bare-faced tyranny. Nothing “takes off the edge of oppression like patience: “resignation is enough to put persecution out of “countenance, even let it be ever so violent and “unjust.

“Suppose it the case now, that you are, in truth, “extremely abused by the Roman government,
“will you have this to be the act of all the Romans, “nay, and of Cæsar himself too? There’s your “quarrel. You cannot imagine that those gover“nors have it in their commission to oppress you, “or that Cæsar himself can look east and west, and “go through the four quarters of the world, all at “a time, when it is no easy matter for him to get a “faithful account, at Rome, even of what is done “here. How great a madness is it, then, to run the “risque of so dangerous a war for trifles? and, in “fact, for we know not what? Besides, matters may “mend in time; for governors are neither im“mortal, or perpetual, but take their turns; and “it is reasonable to hope, and promise ourselves, “that the succession will be better. When a war is “once commenced, it is neither to be given up, or “to be continued, without inconveniencies. As for “those that set up for liberty, let them beware, in “the first place, not to run themselves out of it;
“for the last slavery is always the most burthensome;
“and to avoid that yoke must be acknowledged a “just cause of war. He that is once a subject, and “then falls off, is rather a stubborn slave, than a “generous advocate of freedom.

“If any thing could have been done against the “power of the Romans, why was it not done when “Pompey brake in upon us? But if your fore“fathers, and the princes of those times, (though “much your superiors in men, money, and conduct,)
“were not able to stand before so inconsiderable a “detachment of their power, with what face or “sense can you pretend, at this time, to bid defiance “to the whole body of the empire? To say nothing “of the obligation of an hereditary allegiance of “so long a continuance, that hath descended from “your predecessors to their posterity.

“What do you think of those brave and gene“rous Athenians that contended for the liberty of “Greece to the very extremity of laying their “country in ashes? those people that brought “down the proud heart of the vain and intolent “Xerxes, put him to flight at Salamis, and, hav“ing broken the whole power of Asia, forced him “to shift for himself in a boat: that haughty prince, “that turned the sea into land, and the land into “sea, to make room for his fleets and armies, that
No. 31.

“looked as if they would have swallowed Europe?
“and yet the nation, that did all this, are now sub“jects to the Romans; and Greece receives laws “from Italy.

“The case is the same with the Lacedæmonians, “after all their famous exploits at Thermopylæ and “Platea, and Agesilaus’s carrying their victorious “arms into the heart of Asia; and yet, at present, “these heroes own the same masters still.

“To come now to the Macedonians, with their “Philips and their Alexanders, a people that, to this “very day, propose little less to themselves than “the empire of the universe: has not fortune re“duced these people also to the same fate, and of “conquerors made them subjects, and subjects
“also to the same governors? I might reckon up a “great many other nations now, much more confi“derable than yourselves, that, in the vanity of an “ambitious contention for liberty, have been forced “to submit and obey: and are you the only men “in the world that are too good to serve the love“reign lords of all other people? Where is your “militia, or the arms that you depend upon? your “fleets to secure the Roman seas? Where is your “treasure to answer the expence of this under“taking? You fancy an Egyptian or an Arabian “war, perhaps: but you proceed altogether upon “false measures, without comparing the dispro“portion betwixt your ability and your under“taking, and the inequality betwixt a weak and a “disorderly people, and the stability of a formi“dable empire. It is a common thing for you to “be over-run and surprized by your next neigh“bours, when, at the same time, the Romans carried
“the whole world before them.

“Nay, and the known world would not content “them neither; for though they were possessed of “the course of the Euphrates to the east, the Da“nube to the north, the Libyan desert to the south, “and as far as Cadiz to the west, nothing would “serve them but another world beyond the ocean, “and the carrying their arms into Britany, which,
“at the same time, was looked upon as inaccessible.
“What is it that you pretend to? Would you be “thought richer than the Gauls, hardier than the “Germans, or wiser than the Greeks? Or do you “take yourselves to be hard enough for all man“kind beside? Upon what ground is it that you “are thus bold and confident against the Romans?
“It will be said, perhaps, that it is an uneasy and “irksome thing to serve; but if it be so to you, “what must it be to the Greeks, who, over and “above a large extent of territory, are looked upon “as men of the noblest extraction of any people “under the sun? And yet these men, great and no“ble as they are, live in obedience to the Romans;
“as do the Macedonians also, who have un“doubtedly more right to a claim of liberty than “you can pretend to. Or what say ye to the five “hundred cities of Asia, that peaceably submit “themselves to a consul, without any guard or “garrison to over-awe them? To say nothing of “the Heniochians, the Colchians, the nations about
“the Bosphorus, and the inhabitants of the coasts
“of Pontus, and the lake of Mæotis; people so “free in former times, that they never had so much “as a master among themselves: and yet three “thousand Romans were enough to keep them all “in subjection: and forty gallees sufficient to pre“serve all those seas in peace and obedience, which “no power durst venture upon before.

“Had the Bithynians, Cappadocians, Pamphy-“lians, Lydians, and Cicilians, nothing to say for “themselves upon the point of liberty? They are,
“at present, all tributaries, and pay their duties “without soldiers to compel them. How is it with “the Thracians, in a large country of seven days “journey in length, and five over, and much more “rude, and more defensible than yours, being al“most impassable for the bitter frosts and deep “snows there; and yet a guard of only two thou“sand Romans keeps them all in order? And then “for

“ for the Illyrians, from beyond the Danube, ■ far “ as Dalmatia; and so likewise the Dacians; they “ are all under the guard only of two legions. Nay,
 “ the Dalmatians themselves, after so many con“ tests for liberty, so many baffles in the attempt,
 “ and so many rallies and reinforcements afterwards,
 “ in prosecution of the same design, how quiet “ and easy are they under the command of one single “ legion !

■ But, after all this, if any pretence whatsoever “ might justify ■ revolt, the Gauls, of all men living, “ have the greatest encouragement and temptation
 “ to do it, from the very situation of their country.
 “ They are naturally fortified; on the east with the “ Alps, the Rhine on the north, the Pyrenæan “ mountains on the south, and on the west with the “ Ocean. But, notwithstanding all these advantages, “ three hundred and fifteen nations in the same “ interest, an inexhaustible source of all good things “ within themselves, both for use and commerce, “ not only for their own, but likewise for the “ common benefit of mankind, we find these “ people under the Roman allegiance, and pro-“ pounding no other happiness to themselves than “ in that of their masters. This resignation does “ not arise from the want of courage, either natural “ or aquired, or from the want of brave examples “ in their ancestors, who had stood a dispute of “ eighty years for the maintenance of their liberty;
 “ but finding so admirable a concurrence of for“ tune and virtue in the actions of the Romans, the “ Gauls were so awed betwixt the veneration they “ had for the one, and their dread of the other, that “ the Romans gained as much upon them by their “ goodness as by their arms; insomuch that, at this “ day, with only twelve hundred men, they secure “ almost as many cities in their allegiance.

“ What was Spain the better for their golden “ mines, when they came to contend with the Ro“ mans for their freedom? Or I might instance na“ tions more remote from Rome, both by sea and “ land; as the Lusitanians and Cantabrians, where “ neither valour, distance, or position could war“ rant them against the power of Rome; though “ bordering upon ■ sea so impetuous that it cannot “ be so much as named, or thought of, without dread
 “ and horror. What signified Hercules's pillars, “ or the Pyrenæan mountains, so many warlike “ nations in the way, distance, or any other diffi“ culty, to the obstructing the progress of their “ victorious arms? But they were reduced as well “ as the rest, and one single legion served for a “ guard upon them all.

“ I need not tell you that the Germans are a po“ pulous nation, and that their country is of vast “ extent, the people strong, their courage answer“ able to their size and stature, and firm to the very “ contempt of death itself. But part of this you “ are eye-witnesses of, for the Romans have slaves
 “ of that nation all over the earth. In their anger “ they are more outrageous than brutes, and the “ Rhine is at this day their frontier. They have a “ guard of eight Roman legions upon them, that “ make slaves of as many of them ■ they take, and “ the rest save themselves by flight.

“ As for those that place so much confidence in “ the walls of Jerusalem, they would do well to “ consider the walls of Britain, where the inhabi“ tants are surrounded by the sea, in a kind of a “ new world, not much inferior to the other. They “ have made themselves masters of this vast island “ too, and assigned only four legions for a guard
 “ upon it. What shall we say of the Parthians,
 “ a powerful and warlike people, that have here“ tofore given laws to so many great nations them“ selves? Why do they send the flower of their no“ bility for hostages to Rome, but ■ a tacit ac“ knowledgment of subjection under the colour of “ peace? Are we the only men in the world to make “ war upon the empire, when all other nations trem“ ble under the apprehensions of their arms?

“ Call to mind the fate of Carthage, a people that “ valued themselves as branches of the noble race
 “ of Phoenicians, that had the honour of the fa“ mous Hannibal for their commander. What was “ the end of that brave people, but to fall under “ the conquering arms of Scipio?

“ But neither the Cyrenæans of the Lacedæmonian “ race, or the Marmaridans, that stretched their “ dominions as far as the parched deserts, or the “ Syrtes, so frightful to our apprehensions, or the “ Nasamonians, or the Moors, or the number“ less multitude of the Numidians, were able to “ check the Roman courage. They had reduced, “ in fine, the third part of the world to their sub“ jection, so large that the very nations are hardly to “ be numbered, beginning from the Atlantic sea, “ and the pillars of Hercules; to the red sea, and “ comprizing all Æthiopia. All this they took by “ arms, reserving, over and above to themselves, a “ yearly tribute of corn, sufficient to maintain the “ people of Rome for eight months, besides other “ duties that they pay chearfully and readily, tho' “ there be but one legion in garrison to raise the “ contribution.

“ But there is no need of recourse to remote ex“ amples for proof of the uncontrollable power of “ Rome, when we may have instances so much “ nearer at hand; as in Egypt, a kingdom that “ stretches out as far as Æthiopia and Arabia “ Felix, contiguous to the Indies, and an infinite “ multitude of people in it, besides those of Alex“ andria; and yet this mighty populous kingdom “ submits to be rated by the poll towards the ser“ vice of the state, and as a tributary to the Ro“ mans, and suffers imposition, though not with“ out plausible ground to murmur at it.

“ How comes it about that Alexandria does not “ revolt too? a strong, large, and opulent city, “ thirty furlongs in length, and ten in breadth; “ peopled, and fortified round about, either with “ deserts, seas without ports, deep rivers, or boggy “ quagmires. But the fortune of Rome surmounted
 “ all these difficulties; for two legions, in the city, “ were enough to secure the peace of Egypt, and “ to bridle the Macedonian nobility. This city “ paid more tribute in a month than you do in a “ year, and four months provision in corn for the “ people of Rome, beside money.

“ If this be the case, what deserts do you pro-“ pound to repair to for companions in your under“ taking? For all the habitable part of the world “ is clearly against you, and, in effect, Romans;
 “ unless you flatter yourselves with hopes of assist“ ance from your countrymen, the Adiabeniens, on “ the other side of the Euphrates. Supposing that “ they could be guilty of so gross an oversight as to “ engage in a war so desperate, upon so unreason“ able a ground, the Parthians themselves would “ never endure such disrespect towards the Romans,
 “ as must inevitably end in ■ rupture, by counte“ nancing a war against them. So that you have “ no retreat left but a recourse to God's power “ against his providence, which is most evidently “ seen in the advancement, establishment, and pro“ tection of the Roman empire.

“ Consider war in ■ religious view, even if you “ yourselves were the stronger of the two. How “ can you pretend to dispense with the violation “ both of God's and of your own laws, or to expect “ a blessing from heaven in the very act of your dis“ obedience? If you keep the sabbath-day as strictly “ and religiously as you profess, and as your laws “ bind you to do, you will most certainly be caught “ in the same snare over again, that your predeces“ sors were hampered in by Pompey heretofore;
 “ that it is to say, by taking advantage of your scru“ ples, and falling upon you on those days when “ you dare not so much as move an hand to de“ fend yourselves. If you make no conscience of “ breaking the laws, in fighting one day as well as “ another,

"another, how do you fight for the maintaining of them, and how can you look for any favour from God in the deliberate breach of his own commandments? Whoever made war but in hope of assistance either from God or man? and when both fail, what can be the consequence but a voluntary wilful slavery? If this be your resolution, what have you more to do than to lay violent hands upon your wives and children, and to lay your glorious country in ashes? The extravagant madness of the action will be some sort of excuse for it; besides, that it will save you the dishonour of falling by the hands of an enemy."

"It is a high point of wisdom, my good friends, and a very necessary point, to foresee and to provide for a storm while the ship is yet in the harbour; and it is as dangerous, on the other hand, to put off the consideration of it till the tempest is upon you, and then to stand trembling, and at a loss which way to turn yourselves. As for those calamities that threaten us unawares, and by surprise, people that fall into them are to be pitied, for there is no preventing of evils not to be foreseen; but for men that run headlong into visible hazards, they fall not only unlamented, but with infamy also and scandal."

"Your way of proceeding, in this affair, would almost persuade one that you have already agreed upon terms with the Romans, how they are to behave themselves in case of gaining their point; that is to say, with tenderness and moderation, and not according to the practice of other nations, with fire and sword, burning your sacred cities, extirpating your whole race, and destroying every man upon the pursuit that outlives the battle: for which way can you fly, but in the very mouths of your enemies, who are either the subjects of Rome already, or such as live in fear of being quickly made so?"

"Nor are you to flatter yourselves that this calamity will stop here: all the Jews upon the face of the earth are to expect your fate, and the whole universe will join as one man to the punishing of this rebellion. You will remember what I tell you now, when you shall see the streets run with blood to gratify the impetuous violence of a few turbulent and hot-brained councils. The Romans are not to be blamed at last, for doing only that which you yourselves have forced them to; and you are to consider, on the other side, in case they should spare you, what an impiety you have to answer for, in the abuse of so much humanity and goodness."

"If you have no longer any sense of natural tenderness for your wives and children, have at least some compassion for your capital city, and the sacred wall of it: have mercy even upon the temple, your law, as the holy sanctuary, which you yourselves are now about to destroy with your own hands; for you are never to hope for mercy again from the Romans, after so ungrateful an abuse of the indulgencies you have formerly received from them."

"But, to conclude, I hereby call God and our whole country to witness, that I have done the utmost in my power towards your preservation. If you will follow my counsel, you may yet live in peace; but if you are determined to persist in tumult and outrage, I have only to consult my own safety."

This address, which was enforced by tears from his sister Berenice, in some degree abated the rage of the multitude, who acknowledged that they were not inimical to the Romans, but to Florus, for the indignities he had so repeatedly offered them. Agrippa replied, "that what they had already done was, in effect, professing enmity to the Romans, as they had broken down the galleries of the castle of Antonia, and refused paying tribute to Cæsar." He added, "that if they would obviate all suspicion of revolt, they had only, without further delay, to discharge the one, and rebuild the other; since neither the citadel or the tribute belonged to Florus."

The people hearkened to this advice, and went with the king and Berenice into the temple, where they applied themselves to the rebuilding of the galleries; and, at the same time, sent the proper officers up and down the province, to collect the duties which were deficient, and then paid in the whole arrears, amounting to forty talents. Having brought them thus far to reason, Agrippa counselled them to submit to the government of Florus till Cæsar should appoint a successor. But this incensed them to such a degree, that they not only reviled him in the most opprobrious language, but stoned and drove him out of the city. The king, sensible of this contemptuous behaviour in the highest degree, and finding the rabble irreclaimable and desperate, sent several men of rank to Florus at Cæsarea, in order that he might make choice of collectors of the revenue for the whole province, and then retired to his own kingdom.

The multitude treat Agrippa with the greatest indignity.

C H A P. XVII.

The Jews surprize Massada, and put the Roman garrison to the sword. Reject the Roman sacrifices at the instance of Eleazar, who heads a faction. This refusal the ground of the war. The leading men contend for moderate proceedings. Representation of the impiety and injustice of the refusal. Of its being an insult to Cæsar. Precedents and reports in favour of the practice. The leading men apply to Florus and Agrippa for relief. Agrippa sends troops to Jerusalem. Disturbances excited in the city betwixt the loyal and the malecontents. Great slaughter ensues. The festival called Xylophoria. The king's troops worsted. The seditious quit the upper town, and lay all in ashes. The nobility compelled to seek shelter in subterraneous places. Antonia taken by assault. The seditious Jews headed by Manahem. An artful device frustrated. The loyalists obtain permission to depart.

SOON after this, a strong party of those who excited the people to a revolt made an assault upon Massada, a Roman garrison, took it by surprize, put all the Romans to the sword, and substituted for them a guard of their own people. There happened, at the same time, another disorder in the temple at Jerusalem. One Eleazar, the son of Ananias, the high-priest, an intrepid youth, and military officer then in command, pressed some of his friends amongst the priests to receive neither offering or sacrifice but from the nation of the Jews. This was the very foundation of our war with the Romans; for, at the instance of Eleazar, the sacrifices of Cæsar, which were daily offered up for the welfare of the Roman people, were rejected. The high-priests, and men of the first rank, declared their disapprobation of the novelty of such prohibition, and importunately desired the continuance of so pure a custom as the offering up of prayers for princes and governors. But the factious party were resolute and inexorable, relying upon their numbers; and all those who were desirous of innovation espoused their cause, which, as before observed, was principally supported by Eleazar, an officer bold in enterprize, and high in command.

The Jews seize upon the strong hold of Massada.

Rejection of the Roman oblations the ground of the war.

This occurrence brought together the rulers, the high-priests, and the Pharisees of the first quality, to deliberate the most expedient measures to be taken at this juncture; for they plainly foresaw the calamities which the continuance of the tumult must entail upon the city. They debated the point, and came to this resolution, to attempt, by representation and counsel, to pacify the minds of the people. In order to this, they called a general assembly before the brazen gate, on the inside of the temple to the eastward, and there pointed out the rashness of the enterprize, and, indeed, madness of involving their country in so destructive a war. From thence they proceeded to shew the unreasonable ground of the dispute, and the injustice of the cause; observing, that their predecessors were so far from prohibiting any oblations from strangers, (which was the highest instance of impiety,) that, in some sort, they made it a part of their worship, as appears from their donations being preserved in the temple as ornaments, and in honour of the memories of the donors. It was represented, that, to provoke the Romans to a dangerous war, to the scandal, if not ruin, of Jerusalem itself, by setting up new modes of religion, to the exclusion of all sorts of people, but Jews, from offering up prayers and oblations to God in his holy temple, was so extravagant a measure, as could not admit of excuse, even in the instance of a private person; but further, to make it general, to the absolute excommunication of Cæsar himself, the insult would justly be deemed unpardonable. It was inferred from these premises, that the contempt would revert to themselves; and that, in consequence of their refusal to offer up prayers and oblations for others, they would not be allowed the liberty of worshipping themselves, when the city would be left without all discipline and good order. This it was concluded they must expect, unless they gave up so idle a project, and relinquished so impious a design before it came to the knowledge of Cæsar.

These representations have no influence upon the seditious.

After these representations, several of the sophists, versed in the Jewish rites and ceremonies, produced precedents and reports of the practices of former times upon the point in question; and their concurring opinion was, that their ancestors never refused oblations from strangers. But those who were bent on innovation, and therefore for stirring up contention, would not hearken to their opinion; nor would the Levites attend Divine service, being wholly intent upon the war.

Deputies sent to Florus and Agrippa.

The men of rank finding the multitude too strong for government, and that the resentment of the Romans would first fall upon them, deliberated upon the matter, and agreed upon sending deputies, some to Florus, of whom Simon, the son of Ananias, was to be chief; others to Agrippa, the principal of whom were to be Saul, Antipas, and Costobarus; which last was the kinsman of Agrippa. Their commission was to solicit them to come with some troops to Jerusalem, and crush the sedition in time.

This message was grateful to Florus, who was disposed to inflame the war at all events, as appeared by the delay of his answer to the deputies, in order to give the seditious an opportunity to collect their force. But Agrippa, who was for the common interest, was desirous of saving both parties as much as lay in his power, the guilty as well as the innocent, and by that means securing the Jews to the Romans, and Jerusalem to the Jews. Finding also his own interest at stake, he sent two thousand auxiliary horse, collected from Auranites, Batanæa, and Trachon, with Darius at the head of them; and Philip, the son of Joachim, their general.

A war begun in the city.

The rulers of the people, with the high-priests, and all that were disposed for peace, received these deputies into the upper town, the lower part of the temple being in the hands of the faction. They began a skirmish with slings and darts, bows and arrows, and maintained it without intermission. Sometimes they made sallies and excursions, and sometimes fought hand to hand. The seditious were the more resolute and daring, but the king's soldiers were superior in military skill. Their principal aim was to force the sacrilegious faction out of the temple; while Eleazar, and his accomplices, laboured as hard, on the other side, to make themselves masters of the upper town. The contest lasted seven days, without any material advantage on either side, but with great slaughter on both.

Attended with great slaughter.

The festival of Xylophoria now drawing on, which took its name from the custom of carrying wood to the temple, to keep fire all the year round, they excluded the seditious from their worship. But while a party of the Jews were abroad upon this office, a band of assassins, called Sicarii, fell in amongst them, and improving the advantage of the king's troops being overborne both with hardness and numbers, they forced them out of the upper town, and the faction immediately took possession of it. They then set fire to the house of Ananias, the high-priest, and to the palaces of Agrippa and Berenice, proposing, in the next place, to burn the offices of record, and the contracts belonging to their creditors, and thereby dissolve their obligations for paying their debts. This was done to gain to their interest multitudes of debtors, who might then join in an insurrection with safety against the more wealthy. The keepers of the records, in fine, abandoned their trust, and consulted their own personal safety, and both writings and offices were all burnt. After this stab to the strength and credit of the city, they applied themselves more particularly to the prosecution of the war.

The seditious part the king's party.

In this scene of confusion many of the rioters, and high-priests, were forced to fly for safety to subterraneous caverns; while others got amongst the king's troops into the upper palace, and immediately shut the gates. In this number were Ananias, the high-priest, Hezekias, his brother, and the deputies of Agrippa.

The seditious contented themselves, for the present, with the advantage they had obtained, and the mischiefs they had done, and proceeded no farther. But the day following, being the fifteenth of the month Lous, they attacked the castle of Antonia, after two days carried it by assault, cut off the whole garrison, and set fire to the place. Passing from thence to the palace, where the troops of Agrippa had taken sanctuary, they divided themselves into four bodies, and attempted the undermining of the walls; but the defendants were obliged to keep close, not being strong enough to venture a sally. The assailants plied their works, and several of the faction, as well as the Sicarii, perished under the walls. In fine, they fought day and night, without respite: the faction, in hopes of rendering the besieged despond by starving them; and the besieged thinking to tire out the faction with the fatigue of unremitting duty.

There was amongst the seditious one Manahem, the son of Judas of Galilee, a subtle and specious orator, who had formerly upbraided the Jews, under Cyrenius, for professing to worship one God, and at the same time acknowledging the supremacy of the Romans. This Manahem, having a design upon Herod's arsenal at Massada, inveigled several men of rank into his party, took them with him, and forced the place, armed a band of vagrants, and marched with the state of a king to Jerusalem, where he set up as head of the mutineers, and gave orders in form for carrying on the siege of the palace.

But they wanted proper instruments; for it was impracticable to undermine the wall, as the enemy showered darts upon them from above; so that they began to break ground at a distance, and carried on a covered way to the foot of one of the towers, which they undermined at the foundation, and then propped it up with timber to support the weight. When they had finished the work, they set fire to those timbers, and so withdrew; and the pillars being consumed, the turret fell to the ground. But the king's troops, it seems, were aware of this stratagem, and ran up another wall immediately behind the turret to make the place good. This discovery, upon the fall of one of the towers, and when they deemed their work accomplished, threw the besiegers into the utmost consternation. The king's people in the palace, however, sent to Manahem, and the other heads of the faction, for permission to depart, and those of his religion, who forthwith took their departure.

An armed force sent down.

The Romans, in consequence of this, were greatly dejected, as they were incapable of coping with so vast a number; nor could they, in honour, descend to treat with rebels. In this extremity they quitted the camp camp as indefensible, and betook themselves to the king's forts, as Hippon, Phasaelis, and Mariamne. Manahem's party brake in as fast as the soldiers quitted, slaying all that came near them, plundering whatever was left behind, and, in the conclusion, burning the camp. This action bare date the sixth of the month Gorpiaeus.

C H A P. XVIII.

Death of Ananias and Hezekias. Eleazar and his party assault Manahem in the temple. Two factions oppose each other. Metilius, a Roman general, treats upon terms with Eleazar. The agreement ratified upon oath and articles. The barbarity and perfidy of Eleazar. Leading cause of the destruction of the Jews. Execution upon a sabbath day.

ON the day following Ananias, the high-priest, and his brother, Hezekias, were taken out of one of the aqueducts, wherein they had concealed themselves, and both put to death by some of the Sicarii. The faction let a strict guard also about the forts, insomuch that none of the soldiers could make their escape. Manahem was so elated with the ravaging of so many fortified places, and the death of Ananias, the high-priest, that he became a most inhuman and insupportable tyrant, and behaved as if he had engrossed to himself the government of the universe. These overbearing tyrannies gave occasion to Eleazar, and some of his confidants, to reason amongst themselves upon the subject. It was observed, that it was by no means consistent that those who had revolted from the Romans, from a desire of asserting their liberty, should betray that liberty to any of their own people, and admit of a supreme governor, who, though he should be guilty of no violence, was inferior to themselves; concluding from thence, that if there was an absolute necessity of setting up one man above the rest, it should by no means be Manahem. In the heat of this resolution they went up to the temple, where they found Manahem at his devotion, arrayed in royal robes in all the state of a prince, both as to dress and train, with all his guards about him.

While he was vaunting himself in all his glory, some of Eleazar's party made a violent assault on his person. The multitude then began to stone him, thinking that the death of the sophist would bring about the revival of their liberty. His guards made a slight resistance, till they found he was opposed by the people, when they respectively shifted for themselves. They slew all they took, and made diligent search for the rest. Some few got privately into Massada, and amongst the rest Eleazar, the son of Jairus, and Manahem's near kinsman, who afterwards exercised a tyrannical government in that place. Manahem himself was taken lurking in a place called Ophlas, dragged out, exposed, tortured, and then put to death. His deputies and assistants were treated in the same manner, and amongst the rest Abfalom, who was the chief abettor of the tyranny.

The people espoused the cause of the opposers of Manahem, imagining, as before observed, that it would be a ready means of effecting an accommodation; whereas the party, in truth, was only an antipathy to Manahem, that were setting up for themselves, not so much with a design of suppressing one tyranny, as promoting another. The multitude earnestly pressed the prevailing faction not to bear so hard upon the Romans, but rather to raise the siege, and suffer them to depart. But the more they pressed it on the one side, the more it was opposed on the other. When Metilius, the Roman general, and his people, had exerted their utmost power for the defence of the place, and were now reduced to the last extremity, they offered to capitulate with Eleazar, to deliver it up with all that was in it, upon condition only of sparing their lives. The terms were readily accepted; and Gorion, the son of Nicodemus, Ananias, the son of Saddaca, and Judas, the son of Jonathan, were appointed to ratify the treaty, and sign and seal the articles. As soon as the agreement was confirmed, and the due formalities had passed, Metilius drew off his soldiers, without interruption, or the least suspicion of danger, as long as the Romans were under arms. But when, according to compact, they came to deliver up their swords and shields, Eleazar's guards broke in upon them, seized and barbarously assassinated them, without resistance or supplication on the part of the Romans, or so much as one word of reproach, except those of "oaths and articles." Metilius was the only man that begged it, which, however, was granted him upon promise of turning Jew.

Barbarous
perfidy of Eleazar.

The Romans sustained no real detriment by this stroke, as their loss, upon the occasion, was trifling, when put into comparison with their vast armies. But it was manifestly the leading cause of destruction to the Jews; for a war now became inevitable, and that upon just grounds; and that very city which took so principal a part in the contest, was so polluted with perfidy and rebellion, that, if it might escape the vengeance of the Romans, it would certainly fall a victim to Divine justice. Never did the state of the Jews wear so melancholy an aspect; despair universally prevailed, and the innocent were involved in the dread of the common fate, as they were to be answerable for the guilty; and the slaughter being perpetrated on the sabbath day, rendered it the more horrid and heinous, as upon that day we are not allowed to perform any work, though ever so laudable and praise-worthy.

C H A P. XIX.

Slaughter and calamities beset the Jews. Florus condemns many of them to the galleys. Shocking ravages in Syria and its environs. Pernicious effects of avarice. Civil dissensions bring on the massacre of 13,000 Jews at Scythopolis. Exploits of Simon, a man of singular strength and resolution. His confession and recantation. Puts his father, mother, wife, and children to death with his own hand; and finally himself, to avoid the stroke of the enemy.

UPON the very same day and hour, as if by the direction of Providence, there was a massacre of the Jews at Cesarea to the number of above twenty thousand: nor was there a Jew left in the place; for Florus caused those that fled to be apprehended, and sent in chains to the galleys. This horrid carnage incensed the whole nation, insomuch, that the Jews divided themselves into several bodies, dispersed, began their inroads upon some of the villages of Syria, and then laid waste several of the bordering cities, as Philadelphia, Gebonitis, Gerassa, Pella, and Scythopolis. After this they broke in upon Gadara, Hippon, and Gaulonitis, destroying some places, and setting fire to others. Thence they advanced to Cedasa, belonging to the Tyrians, to Ptolemais, Gaba, and Cesarea. They also over-ran Sebaste and Askalon without opposition; and when they had reduced these places to ashes, they demolished Anthedon and Gaza. They rifled also, and laid waste, several villages upon the frontiers; and put to death as many of the inhabitants as they could find.

The Syrians, on the other hand, made their reprisals upon the Jews, not only in the vast numbers of them that were put to the sword, but the persecution extended to the very inhabitants of their cities. The state of Syria was at this time most deplorable, as every city had, in effect, two armies in it; and there were no means of preserving either, but by destroying the other. The days were spent in bloodshed, and visionary fears rendered the nights more horrible. The pretence of the Syrians was to remove the Jews; but they were so divided concerning others, whom they suspected to be Judaizers, or favourers of their clan, that, as they thought it hard to put them to death upon suspicion, so they were fearful of suffering them to remain, lest they should afterwards prove to be Jews.

Pernicious
effects of avarice.

Those who before had discovered some degree of humanity and moderation, were now become inexorably cruel, from mere avarice, and the hope of lucre; for they plundered all they killed, and had the booty for a reward, reputing him the bravest man who obtained the greatest share, as having overcome the greatest number of his enemies. It was an horrid spectacle to behold the streets filled with dead bodies of men, women, and children, that lay there not only unburied, but uncovered. The provinces laboured under the same calamities, besides the dreadful prospect of various and much greater miseries in future.

The Jews
become enemies to one another.

The conflict had hitherto been maintained betwixt Jews and strangers, but drawing towards the borders of Scythopolis, they found the very Jews of that quarter inimical to them, so much did they prefer their interest and convenience to every other consideration; for the Jews of Scythopolis joined the inhabitants against the other Jews. Nay, such was their alacrity, that the citizens of Scythopolis suspected them, lest they should join against them with the other Jews, surprize the town in the night, and impute it, at last, either to a desire of revenge for their sufferings, or the necessity of their condition. The citizens, upon this account, told the confederate Jews, that if they would confirm their agreement, and demonstrate their fidelity to them, they should withdraw, for the present, with their families, into a certain grove adjacent. This they accordingly did, and for the two following days all was quiet at Scythopolis; but, upon the third night, their scouts bringing them intelligence that they lay in a careless, easy, and supine posture, the inhabitants fell upon and cut them all off, to the number of 13,000, seized the plunder, and so departed.

Exploits of Simon, a man of extraordinary strength and resolution.

Having given this general account, I cannot pass over some particulars relative to one Simon, who perished in this barbarous action. He was the son of Saul, a man of rank among the Jews, and distinguished from the rest of his contemporaries for the firmness of his mind, and the strength of his body, both which faculties he had employed in favour of the Scythopolitans, to the injury of his country. He did daily execution upon several of the Jews living near that place, and would frequently put whole troops to the rout, insomuch that his single person was held almost equivalent to an army. But in the end, a vengeance overtook him adequate to his crime; for when he saw the Jews surrounded by the Scythopolitans, and annoyed by arrows and darts all over the grove, he drew his sword, and, without giving a stroke, (which he found of no avail against such a multitude,) thus passionately addressed himself to the men of Scythopolis: "How justly am I punished for the wrongs I have done, and purchasing your confidence with the lives of so many of my fellow-citizens. As I am now to die, and it will not become a man of honour to fall by the hand of an enemy, but rather to do justice upon myself, I will not therefore put it in the power of an enemy to glory in my ruin, and triumph over me in my calamity."

He takes vengeance on himself and family

Having thus spoken, he surveyed his wife, his children, his aged parents, and whole family, with a mixture of rage and commiseration, and while gazing, as in suspense, he took his father by his grey hairs, and ran him through the body, and after him his mother, who willingly submitted to the stroke. After the father and mother, he did execution upon his wife and sons, who appeared rather to meet the weapon than avoid it, as by that means they prevented the enemy. When he thus put all his kindred to death, he piled them up, and ordering their bodies to be seen by all, he stretched out his right hand, and sheathed the sword in his own bosom. This man, from the strength of his body, and firmness of his mind, deserves to be remembered with compassion; but whoever considers his attachment to strangers, must confess that, in the end, he met with a deserved fate.

Massacre of the Jews at other places. Agrippa goes to Antioch, and leaves Varus his viceroy. Batanea sends seventy deputies to solicit for a garrison. Varus sends a band of armed men to cut them off upon the way. Agrippa deprives him of his commission. The seditious takes possession of the castle of Cyprus. The Romans surrender up Macherus to the Jews.

AFTER the massacre at Scythopolis, other cities rose up against the Jews that were amongst them. The people of Ascalon slew two thousand five hundred; those of Ptolemais two thousand; those of Tyre a considerable number, but kept more of them in bonds. In Hippon and Gadara they cut off all that were young and active, imprisoning the rest; and proceeded in like manner elsewhere, as they were actuated by hatred or fear. But in Antioch, Sidon, and Apamia, they were safe and quiet in the enjoyment of their lives and liberties: whether it was that they were not powerful enough to be dangerous, or from compassion to a people who did not seem to have any design upon the state, cannot be determined, but the latter seems the more probable cause. As for the Gerasenes, those who were dispersed were permitted to abide with them in peace, and they gave the rest safe conduct to their borders.

There fell out, at the same time, an unfortunate incident for the Jews in the kingdom of Agrippa, who, having occasion to visit Cestius Gallus at Antioch, committed the administration of his government to Varus, a kinsman of king Sohemus. The province of Batanea, during the king's absence, sent seventy deputies of the first rank to desire the indulgence of a garrison, to the end that, in case of any commotion or tumult, they might be able to suppress it. Varus immediately sent out a party of the king's troops to cut them off upon the way. This he had the confidence to do, not only without the knowledge of Agrippa, but entirely against his approbation. He was induced to this horrid outrage by his avarice; so that, after so flagitious a beginning, he stopped at no manner of tyranny or iniquity, but continued his havoc throughout the kingdom. When Agrippa had intelligence of his destructive proceedings, for the sake of Sohemus he spared his life, but removed him immediately from his government.

The seditious, in the mean time, got possession of the citadel of Cyprus, upon the frontier of Jericho, put the garrison to the sword, and demolished the fortifications. At the same instant another considerable body of the Jews treated with the Romans in Macherus to deliver up the garrison, who, choosing rather to part with it by agreement than compulsion, surrendered it upon conditions.

Instances of the Jews former favour with Alexander the Great, and afterwards with the Cæsars. A violent tumult at Alexandria between the Jews and the Greeks. It is composed by Tiberius, who turns his army loose upon them with a commission to kill, burn, and pillage at pleasure. Fifty thousand Jews slain upon the spot, and the rest beg their lives. The implacable rage of the Alexandrians

THE natives of Alexandria conceived a mortal antipathy to the Jews, from the days of Alexander the Great, who, in acknowledgment of the services they had done him against the Egyptians, made them free of this city, with the grant of all privileges in common with the Greeks. These privileges were continued to them by the successors of Alexander; a peculiar quarter was assigned apart to themselves, where they lived in a manner sequestered from from the converse of other people; being also entitled to the privilege of calling themselves Macedonians. When Egypt came afterwards to fall into the hands of the Romans, the Jews had their ancient privileges still continued by Cæsar and his successors: but they were perpetually at variance with the Greeks; and though they suffered justice on both sides for their misdemeanors, it had no other effect than to inflame the contention.

Things were extremely out of order at this time every where, but particularly so at Alexandria. The inhabitants being met in assembly about an embassy to Nero upon an extraordinary occasion, there came rushing into the amphitheatre a mixed crowd of Jews and Greeks. The latter immediately exclaimed that the Jews were enemies and spies, and at the same instant fell furiously upon them. They took three of them, and the rest made their escape; but these three they dragged away in order to burn them alive. This commotion brought in the whole body of Jews to their rescue. They began with casting stones at them; and after that ran with lights in their hands up to the amphitheatre, threatening the whole multitude to burn them to ashes, which they had certainly done, if Tiberius Alexander, the governor of the city, had not restrained their fury. He did not use violent measures, but employed some of the most popular men amongst themselves to attempt, by mild persuasion, to bring them to reason, advising them to moderation, and due caution how they incited the Roman soldiers. The seditious Jews, however, made a jest of the entreaties of Tiberius, and reproached him for the pacific measures he had pursued.

When the governor found the tumult was not to be suppressed without having recourse to arms, he sent out upon them two Roman legions that were then in the city, and five thousand Libyan troops, to harra's the mutineers. Their orders were not only to slay all that opposed them, but to seize their effects, and then fire their houses. The word of command was no sooner given, than they marched to a quarter of the town called Delta, where the Jews chiefly resided, and there executed their orders to the utmost extremity. The Jews placed their best armed men in the front, who, for some time, made an obstinate resistance, but, upon the first disorder, they were scattered and cut to pieces; though it proved to the conquerors a bloody victory. Death and destruction never appeared in more hideous forms: some were caught in the open field, others forced into their houses, which were first plundered, and then set on fire by the Romans. No mercy was shewn to age or sex, till the place ran with torrents of blood, and fifty thousand of them lay dead in heaps; nor had the remainder been preserved, had they not betaken themselves to supplication for their lives; so that the governor, commiserating their case, gave orders for the Romans to retire, which they did at the first word, out of the deference they paid to order and discipline. But the populace of Alexandria bore so implacable an hatred to the Jews, that it was with difficulty they were prevented from insulting the very carcases. Such was the consequence of the tumult at Alexandria.

CHAP. XXII.

Cestius marches with a powerful army against the Jews.

The inhabitants of the country come in to him upon his march to Ptolemais. He is joined by Agrippa. Zebulun, the strongest city of Galilee, plundered and burnt. Cestius returns to Ptolemais. The Jews cut off two thousand Syrians. Cestius removes to Cesarea. Total destruction of Joppa by the Romans.

CESTIUS finding the Jews, from their seditious disposition, become so totally obnoxious, determined on a vigorous prosecution of the war. To that end he drew out his troops, and marched for Ptolemais. He took with him the twelfth legion entire, which he had at Antioch; two thousand chosen men out of the other legions; four troops of horse; besides the king's auxiliaries, that is to say, two thousand horse, and three thousand foot, belonging to Antiochus, armed with bows and arrows; a thousand horse, and three thousand foot, belonging to Agrippa; a body of four thousand men from king Sohemus, a third part horse, and the remainder of them foot, chiefly archers. The people came flocking in to Cestius out of the cities through which he passed in his way to Ptolemais, who, though they might be deficient in military skill, were zealous in the cause, from their implacable hatred to the Jews.

Agrippa assisted Cestius not only with his troops, but his counsel; so that at his instance the general marched away with part of his army to Zebulun (otherwise called Andron, or the city of men) which divides Judæa from Ptolemais. When he came up to the place, he found it totally deserted by the inhabitants, who had all fled up to the mountains, abounding in all sorts of provision; so that he gave his soldiers the plunder of the city. Though he could not but admire the beauty of the buildings, which much resembled those of Tyre, Sidon, and Berytus, he caused them to be razed to the ground. From thence he over-ran the whole country, destroying whatever fell in his way. When he had laid waste the territory, and set all the adjacent villages in a blaze, he left them in ashes, and so returned to Ptolemais. The Syrians were so intent upon the booty, especially those of Berytus, that many stayed behind for the sake of plunder; so that the Jews, taking courage upon the retreat of Cestius, and falling upon them by surprize, cut them off to the number of near two thousand.

From Ptolemais Cestius removed to Cesarea, and from thence sent a detachment of his army to Joppa, with orders to preserve the place, if they could quietly get possession of it; but, in case the inhabitants should put themselves in a posture of defence, they should wait for the bringing up the rest of the army. The Romans, in fine, assaulted the place both by sea and land, and mastered it without much difficulty; for the inhabitants were so far from attempting to dispute it by force, that they had no opportunity for so much as an escape. They were all put to the sword, men, women and children, without distinction. The city was plundered and burnt; and the number of the slain was supposed to amount to eight thousand four hundred persons. Cestius also sent a body of horse into the adjacent toparchy of Narbatane, near Cesarea, where they laid the country waste, put great numbers of the inhabitants to the sword, seized upon their effects, and buried their cities in ashes.

CHAP. XXIII.

Cestius sends Cefennius Gallus into Galilee. Sepphoris, and the neighbouring parts, join with the Romans. The Romans overcome the freebooters. Gallus moves from Galilee to Cesarea, and Cestius marches with his army to Antipatris. Lydda destroyed. Cestius encamps near Jerusalem. The Jews make a furious sally on the sabbath day, and put Cestius and his army in danger. The Jews put to a retreat. The Romans draw off, and the Jews fall upon their rear.

CESTIUS now sent Cefennius Gallus, the commander of the twelfth legion, into Galilee, with such additional forces as he judged sufficient for the reduction of that province. The inhabitants of Sepphoris, the strongest city, opened their gates to him, and the rest of the towns had the prudence to follow their example. But the mutineers and free-booters withdrew to the mountain of Asamon, that crosses Galilee, and lies just opposite to Sepphoris. Gallus advanced upon them in their own post; but so long as they maintained the upper ground they were too hard for the Romans, and slew near two hundred of them in the encounter. But when the Romans came to take a compass, and, by degrees, had gained the top of the mountain, and were thereby enabled to cope with them upon even terms, the fugitives were presently routed, their light-armed men not being able to stand the shock, nor those that fled to escape the pursuit of the horse. Some few, indeed, concealed themselves in lurking places among the mountains; but upwards of two thousand of them were cut to pieces.

Gallus moves to Cesarea, Cestius to Antipatris.

Cestius encamps 50 furlongs from Jerusalem.

The Jews make a furious sally on the sabbath day.

Gallus, apprehending no cause for innovation in Galilee, drew off his troops to Cesarea; and Cestius, with his whole army, went to Antipatris. He was there given to understand, that a considerable body of the Jews were got together into the tower of Aphec, and sent a party thither to dislodge them. The Jews, not being in condition to stand the attack, left it to the Romans, who rifled it, and then setting fire to all the adjoining villages, took their departure. From Antipatris Cestius removed to Lydda, where he found only fifty men, the rest being gone up to Jerusalem to the feast of tabernacles. He put those fifty to the sword, burnt the town; and then advanced, by the way of Bethoron, to a certain place called Gaboah, fifty furlongs from Jerusalem, and there pitched his camp.

The Jews, finding the war approach their metropolis, left the festival, and betook themselves to their arms. They thought their number sufficient, and in that confidence sallied out upon the Romans, with hideous clamour, and in great confusion, regardless of any qualms, it being now their sabbath, which, as often mentioned, is by them most scrupulously observed. But the same rage which caused them to dispense with the observance of the sabbath, proved an advantage to them in the execution of their design upon their enemies; for they threw the Romans into disorder upon the first charge, broke into their ranks, and made so furious an attack upon their main body, that, if they had not been supported by a party of foot which was then entire, and a troop of horse that came up to their relief in the critical minute, Cestius, and his whole army, had been in danger of being lost. There fell five hundred and fifteen of the Romans in this skirmish; four hundred of them horse, the rest foot. Two and twenty only of the Jews were slain upon the spot. Those who signalized themselves upon the occasion were Monobasus and Cenedæus, two kinsmen of Monobasus, king of the Adiabeniens. The next in reputation to these two heroes were Niger of Perea, and Silas, the Babylonian, who went over from king Agrippa, whom he had formerly served, into the interest of the Jews.

The Jews press hard upon the Romans.

The Jews, at length, being forced to a retreat, retired into the city; while the Romans, drawing off likewise to Bethoron, were pressed upon the rear by Simon, the son of Gioras, who cut off several of them, seized their carriages and baggage, which they found upon the road, and so went off to Jerusalem. Cestius continued three days after this in the field, as the Jews had possessed themselves of the elevated parts of the city, set watches at the entrances, and appeared resolved to fall upon the Romans if they had quitted their stand.

C H A P. XXIV.

Agrippa proposes to the Jews an alliance with the Romans. The people rise upon it, and treat the ambassadors with severity. Cestius falls upon them, and pursues them to the walls of Jerusalem, bringing his whole army up to the city. He encamps near the palace. The Jews repair to the defence of the walls. The Romans are repulsed upon several assaults. An invention to secure the pioneers. Cestius raises the siege, and the revolvers fall upon his rear. A great slaughter of the Romans by the Jews. Cestius is in great perplexity. The miserable condition of the Romans. Cestius saves himself by a stratagem.

AGRIPPA, observing that the affairs of the Romans were in a dangerous situation, while such an immense number of their enemies had seized upon the mountains round about, determined to try if the Jews were to be influenced by words, flatter- ing himself that the parties might be reasoned into a better understanding one of another; or thinking, however, if he could not reconcile them, he might possibly be able to divide them, and abate something of the rancour of the quarrel. Pursuant to this design, he sent two of his officers, Barceus and Phebus, men of approved integrity, to offer them a treaty of alliance with the people of Rome, with an assurance of pardon and indemnity for all that was past, upon condition of laying down their arms, and coming over to Rome. The factious, upon hearing of this proposal, were so apprehensive of the people going over to Agrippa, in hopes of this amnesty, that they determined to assassinate the ambassadors. Accordingly they slew Phebus before he could open his commission; and Barceus was wounded, but prevented his fall by flight: but the multitude was so enraged at the baseness of this action, that they drove the seditious before them into the city.

This intestine division gave Cestius the fairest opportunity to break in upon the factious; so that he advanced upon them with his whole army, charged, routed, and pursued them to the walls of Jerusalem. He then marched off to a place called Scopus, seven furlongs from the city, and there pitched his camp. He remained three whole days in a state of inactivity, without so much as making an attempt upon the place, hoping, perhaps, that the people might become disposed to peace; but, in the mean time, sent out a party of soldiers into the neighbouring villages, to procure corn and other necessaries.

On the fourth day, which was the thirtieth of the month Hyperbereteus, he advanced with his whole army, in good order, up to the city, where the people durst not stir, through fear of the factious party. But their very leaders were so intimidated by the apparent order and discipline of the Romans in their march, that they retired from the suburbs, many into the inner parts of the city, and some into the temple. Cestius took his way by Bezetha, and, he advanced, burnt Cenopolis, and a place called the timber-market. Thence advancing to the upper town, he pitched his camp near the palace. If he had then made a vigorous assault, he might easily have carried the place, and put an end to the war. But Tyrannus and Priscus, and some other great officers, had been corrupted by Florus to divert him from his purpose. This false step proved the absolute ruin of the Jews, and the source of all their future calamities.

Under these circumstances divers of the principal men amongst the Jews, at the instance of Ananus, the son of Jonathas, invited Cestius into the city, proposing to open the gates to him; but he delayed his resolution so long, either through indignation or diffidence, that the design was discovered, and Ananus, with his party, forced, by stones from the walls, to fly for sanctuary to their own houses.

The Jews dispersed themselves upon this into the turrets, to the defence of the walls, which they made good for five days against the utmost efforts of the Romans, though pressed with the most impetuous violence. On the sixth day Cestius, with the choicest of his troops and bow-men, assaulted the temple on the northern quarter; but the Romans were so galled with slings and arrows from the porch and galleries, that they were not only obliged to give way, but in the end totally repulsed. After these disappointments the Romans had recourse to this invention: the first rank rested their shields upon the wall, and guarded themselves with what they called teltude, from its resemblance to the back of a tortoise, which being proof against all the enemies darts and arrows, they were at liberty to undermine the walls without further danger. They then made preparation for setting fire to the gate of the temple. This so alarmed the faction, that they gave up all for lost, and many of them quitted the town. But it was matter of joy to the moderate and peaceable part, in- so-much, that they called out to open the gates to Cestius, whom they deemed their friend and preserver. To such a plight were they reduced, that if Cestius

Cestius had prosecuted the siege but a little longer, the Romans would certainly have had possession of the city: but it seems not to have been agreeable to the Divine will, that this dreadful war should thus terminate: for Cestius, as if unconscious of the good disposition of the people in general, or the desperation of the seditious in the city, by a kind of judicial infatuation, drew off his men on a sudden, even when their hopes were at the fairest, and, contrary to all reason, quitted the siege. This unexpected retreat so emboldened the revolvers, that they fell upon the rear of the Romans, and cut off a considerable number both of their horse and foot. Cestius lodged that night at the camp he had fortified at a place called Scopus. The next day he continued his march, with the enemy at his rear, who, pursuing, cut off many of the hindmost of his men. They also fell upon the flank on each side of the army, and galled them with darts: nor durst they so much as turn their heads to look the enemy in the face, imagining the number of those that pursued them was immense. They did not even attempt to repel those that pressed them on each side, because their armour was heavy, and they were fearful of breaking their ranks; whereas they knew the Jews, on the other hand, were light armed, and ready for excursions and surprizes upon any occasion. Upon the whole the Romans suffered greatly, without being able to avenge themselves upon their enemies. The ways, in fine, were covered with dead and wounded bodies upon their retreat. Amongst the slain were Priscus, who commanded the sixth legion; Longinus, the tribune; and Emilius Jucundus, a principal officer of horse; so that, with difficulty, and the loss of their baggage, they got to Gabaoh, where they had encamped before.

Cestius remained here two days, doubtful how to proceed in his present embarrassed situation. Upon the third day he found the number of Jews greatly increased, insomuch that the country was overrun with them. From this he was sensible that his delay had not only hindered but endangered him, and that the longer he stayed the more enemies he should have.

Upon this he ordered the army to be discharged of all incumbrances, for the ease and expedition of the march. The mules, asses, and other beasts of burthen, he caused to be killed, reserving a few only of those which were to carry machines that he might have further occasion for, and which he was desirous also of retaining, lest they should fall into the hands of the enemy.

This was the state and posture of the army on their march to Bethoron. They were not annoyed by the Jews so long as they continued in an open country, but when they came into narrow passages, they charged their front and rear, to separate them from the main army, and force them further into the valley, while the multitude, from the rocks and craggs, galled them with their darts. While the foot were in this state of distress, not knowing how to defend themselves, the condition of the horse was much more desperate, as they could neither advance up to the Jews to attack them upon the mountains, or secure themselves against them in the valleys; nor could they keep their own troops in order against the shower of arrows that poured down amongst them. They were at length in such a situation, that they could neither fight or fly; and in this desponding extremity they had recourse to all the passionate extravagancies of tears, groans, and outcries, that are usual in such cases; whilst the rocks and the vallies rang, on the other side, with transports of joy, triumph, and vaunting.

Such was their advantage, that if the Jews had been favoured with day-light, the army of Cestius had been totally destroyed: but night coming on, the Romans escaped to Bethoron; and the Jews secured all the passes round about, to cut off the retreat of the Romans.

When Cestius found in what manner he was beset, he bethought of a stratagem to assist him in his escape. He selected about four hundred of his bravest men, and placed them at the strongest of the fortifications, giving orders that, when they went up to the morning guard, they should erect their ensigns, that the Jews might be induced to believe the army had not yet decamped. In the mean time Cestius shrunk away with the rest of his forces without any noise, about thirty furlongs during the night.

When the Jews perceived in the morning that the place was abandoned, and the main army withdrawn, they immediately fell upon the four hundred Romans who had deluded them, slew them to a man, and then went in pursuit of Cestius. But having availed himself of the night to prosecute his escape, they could not overtake him. The soldiers fled in such consternation, that they left behind them all their warlike instruments, which the Jews took up, and afterwards used against the Romans. They followed the pursuit as far as Antipatris; but finding it vain to continue it longer, secured their engines, stripped the dead, collected their booty, and so returned with joy and triumph to Jerusalem, for having obtained so important a victory with such very little loss. This defeat happened on the eighth day of the month Dios, and in the twelfth year of the reign of the emperor Nero.

mighty booty taken from the Romans, a considerable sum of money from Cestius, and a mass of public treasure to an immense value over and above, they did not think him worthy of having any commission conferred upon him, looking upon him as a man of an imperious, tyrannical disposition, and upon his specious friends and confidants rather as guards than companions. But this did not prevent Eleazar from insinuating himself, by degrees, into the affections and esteem of the people; for he so prevailed upon them by the popular means of money and address, that, in their professed opinions, no man was so well qualified for governor as himself.

Eleazar acquires popularity.

Governors are sent into Idumæa and other parts.

Josephus, the historian, made governor of both the Galilees, &c.

The commanders they sent into Idumæa were Jesus, the son of Sapphas, one of the high-priests, and Eleazar, the son of the new high-priest; at the same time enjoining Niger, the present governor of that province, to obey their orders. This Niger, coming from Perea, beyond Jordan, was called Peraites. Nor did they neglect the care of other parts of the country. They sent Joseph, the son of Simon, to Jericho; Manasses to Perea; John, the Essene, to Thamna; while Lydda, Joppa, and Emmaus, were to be governed in the form of toparchies. John, the son of Ananias, was made governor of Gophnitis and Acrabatena; and Josephus, the son of Matthias, governor of both the Galilees, adding to the command Gamala, the strongest place in the whole country.

He endeavours to acquire popularity.

His plan of policy.

He institutes a council of seventy.

These governors discharged their duty with alacrity and prudence, according to the extent of their respective commissions. The first care of Josephus, when he came into Galilee, was to obtain the goodwill of the people, an interest which he knew to be most conducive to the preservation of order and good government. He was also conscious that the certain way to make great men his friends was, to admit them to a share in the government; and that the most effectual means to conciliate the esteem of the multitude, was to employ natives, and popular instruments in popular cases. His plan was therefore this: he selected a council of seventy out of the elders and ablest men of the nation. To this council of seventy he committed the whole government of Galilee, under some few restrictions; appointing seven to every city, to hear and determine all common causes, in such manner and form as he had prescribed; reserving to himself the judgment of capital causes, and matters of greater importance.

Provides for the security of the cities of Galilee.

Having thus regulated affairs at home, so far as related to domestic policy, he took into consideration the necessary means of securing his people from foreign injuries and insults. Taking it for granted that the Romans would break into Galilee, he took care, in the first place, to wall in all the defensible cities, as Jotapata, Bersabee, Selamis, Perea, Japha, Sigoh, Tarichee, and Tiberias, with the mountain Itabyr. He fortified also the caves about the lake of Genezareth, in the Lower Galilee; and in the Upper, Petra of the Achabarians, Seph, Jamnith, and Mero; and Seleucir, Soganes, and Gamala, in Gaulanitis. The people of Sepphoris being wealthy and warlike, had liberty to build their own walls. John, the son of Levi, by order of Josephus, walled in Gischala. As to the rest of the castles, they were fortified by the direction and assistance of Josephus himself. He collected an army out of Galilee of more than an hundred thousand young men, and armed them with old weapons, which he had collected together, and prepared for them.

Furnishes the Galileans with arms.

Adopts the Roman military discipline.

The next thing that occurred to him was the mighty power of Rome, and the means by which it became invincible, which evidently appeared to be their strict attention to military discipline. Observing, therefore, that their readiness in obeying orders was owing to the multitude of their officers, he made partitions in his army after the Roman manner, dividing and subdividing offices of command into several subordinations. He had his officers over tens, hundreds, and thousands, and all these subjected to other superiors. He taught them the discipline of signals, the points of war in the sound of the trumpet, to distinguish an alarm, a charge and a retreat, the disposition of an army and form of battle, the order of bringing off or on, seconding the weak, or relieving the weary. He explained to them the nature and effects of fortitude, mental and corporeal; and whenever he treated on military subjects, held forth the Roman discipline as the grand instance of authority and example. He told his soldiers, that, if they would lay a foundation for success in their military undertaking, they must renounce before-hand, all violence, robbery, fraud, pilfering, and the like; that they must do justice to all people without exception, nor seek to raise themselves upon the downfall of others; observing, upon the whole, that a good conscience is the only real foundation of genuine courage.

Excellent instruction both martial and civil.

Josephus had now raised his complement of forces: they consisted of sixty thousand foot, and two hundred and fifty horse; and besides these four thousand five hundred mercenaries, with six hundred select men for the guard of his person. These men were no very great charge to the country, for all but the mercenaries were maintained by the different cities, which, as they sent out one half of them to the war, employed the other half in providing necessaries, so that one part wrought for the other; and those that were in arms protected their purveyors.

The amount of the army of Josephus.

C H A P. XXVI.

Character of John of Gischala. He obtains the confidence of Josephus, and then abuses it. Raises a sedition against him. Josephus is deserted by all his friends but four. His address to the seditious Jews. He gains upon the multitude, and thereby puts John upon other treacherous practices. Silas gives notice of it to Josephus, who hastens away to Tiberias. John counterfeits sickness. Josephus set upon, and narrowly escapes. John is execrated for his perfidy. All Galilee reconciled to Josephus. Terms of accommodation proposed and accepted. Secret plots against Josephus. Four cities go over to the enemy.

WHILE Josephus was engaged in his administration in Galilee, there started up an extraordinary kind of impostor. He was a native of Gischala, the son of one Levi, and his name was John. He possessed cunning and fraud in an extraordinary degree, and was capable of the most flagitious practices. His poverty for a long time prevented the execution of his wicked designs. Though he was a notorious liar himself, he was as credulous as those he imposed on. Fraud by him was estimated a virtue, and his best friends were the objects of his delusion. He made great pretence to humanity, but was barbarously cruel where he had hopes of gain. His ambition had no bounds, and the foundation of his hopes was laid in his crimes. He was so naturally addicted to theft, that he acquired its various tricks, and particularly of alluring others, insomuch that he collected accomplices, by degrees, till they amounted to a train of four hundred, in which number there was not one irresolute man, or inexpert in the use of arms, so scrupulously careful was he in his choice for mental and corporeal qualifications. The greatest part of this band was raised from the villages and borders of Tyre. With this banditti, however, he made great ravages, and put many of those to the sword who had withdrawn upon the apprehension of a war. But he aspired to far greater things, and wanted only money to put himself at the head of a well formed party.

John of Gischala as an impostor.

When he found that Josephus was greatly pleased with the activity of his disposition, he employed his influence with him to obtain the superintendence of the re-building the walls of Gischala, upon which pretence he drew large sums of money in contributions from all the citizens of the property. He had then recourse to another invention, concerted with wondrous shrewdness. He procured an order from Josephus to all the Jews in Syria, forbidding them expressly to send any oil into the bordering parts, but of the produce of their own nation. Upon this prohibition John engrossed the oil, and sold it again at eight times the price it cost him.

He introduces the Jews into the city of Gischala.

This being a plentiful year, and Galilee a country abounding with oil, the monopoly which he practised in sending so much abroad, where there was a great scarcity, brought an incredible sum of money into his coffers, which credit he converted afterwards to the mischief of his benefactor. Persuaded at this time, if he could once overthrow Josephus, he should himself obtain the government of Galilee, he gave it in charge to the ruffians under his command to harraiss the inhabitants more and more, which would either exasperate the people into practices upon his person, if he controuled them, or else expose him to accusations and complaints, if he let them alone. As an introduction to his design, he caused a report to be circulated far and near, that Josephus was in a plot to betray the province to the Romans; and many other stratagems did he contrive to effect his ruin.

There was at that time a party of young men of the village of Dabarith, who kept guard on the great plain; and as Ptolemy, king Agrippa's and queen Berenice's steward, was travelling that way, set upon him, and took away all his boxes and baggage, to a great value, in rich robes, silver plate, and six hundred pieces of gold. This was a prize not to be concealed, so that they carried it whole as it was to Josephus at Tarichee, who checked them for the violence they had offered to the king and queen, and ordered the booty to be deposited in the charge of one Eneas, an eminent man of that city, and to be forth coming upon demand. This act of justice had well nigh cost Josephus his life; for when the pillagers came to understand that they were excluded from all share in the prey, and that the governor reserved it entirely for the king's use, they ran through all the neighbouring cities and villages, exclaiming that Josephus had betrayed them.

This outcry raised such an uproar, that, by daylight next morning, there was a body of an hundred thousand people assembled, who ran to the Circus at Tarichee, exclaiming against Josephus; some being for deposing, some for stoning, and others for burning him as a traitor. The tumult at the same time was encouraged by John, and Jesus, the son of Sapphas, who were magistrates of Tiberias. This violent outrage of the people threw the attendants and guards of Josephus into such a consternation, that all but four persons deserted him. He was at that time in a sound sleep; and as they were just setting fire to the house his four friends waked him. Josephus maintained an extraordinary degree of composure, nor discovered the least emotion, either at the number of his enemies, or the desertion of his friends, but frankly presented himself to the view of the people in rags and ashes, with his hands behind him, and his sword about his neck. This generous constancy moved his friends, and especially those of Tarichee, to the highest degree of commiseration. But the savage mob, both of the town and country, to whom his government seemed burthensome, reviled him for his treachery and oppression, calling upon him, again and again, to restore the money, and confess the fact. They concluded in fine, from his habit and behaviour, that he was now disposed to declare the truth, and that with a view of obtaining both pardon and pity. Under these circumstances he thought it most expedient to divide his enemies, and set them at variance, and to this end promised them a frank confession of the whole matter; so that having obtained an hearing, he spake to this effect:

"I neither did intend to send this money back again to Agrippa, or to convert it to my own use; as it never was my design to court the friendship of any prince that was inimical to you, or propose to myself any benefit to your prejudice. But (addressing himself to the people of Tarichee) considering the defenceless state of your city without walls, your own inability to rebuild them, and the avidity with which the people of Tiberias, and several other cities, have beheld this prize, I thought I could not do better than increase it for the accomplishment of so laudable a purpose. If you agree with me in opinion, you are bound in honour to justify me in what I have done; if otherwise, I am ready to lay all that I have taken at your feet, to be disposed of at your pleasure."

The people of Tarichee loudly applauded this speech; but those of Tiberias loaded him with calumnies, menaces, and reproaches, and their rage and animosity became fiercer than ever. In the heat of their division, however, they declined their quarrel with Josephus, and entered into a warm contest one with another.

When Josephus found he had secured the people of Tarichee in his interest, (who amounted to near forty thousand,) he addressed them with more freedom, pointed out to them their error, and assured them that, for his part, he was absolutely for employing the money they had in the fortification of the town. He recommended to them to leave to him the care of the other cities also, assuring them, if they would follow his direction, nothing should be wanting towards the charge of the work.

This carried so fair a face, that part of the mutineers, though still dissatisfied, withdrew; but, at the same time, another party of two thousand armed men advanced furiously towards Josephus, who escaped into the house, while the rioters stood pressing and menacing without. Josephus was now under necessity of having recourse to another invention: he went up to the top of the house, and waving his right hand as a signal for silence, when the uproar subsided a little, thus addressed them: "I cannot understand the drift of your desire, nor is it possible for us to understand each other in this confusion of noise. I stand here ready to fulfil your commands, if you will depute any person to come to me, that we may treat on the matter with composure and temper."

Upon this proposal some of the leaders repaired to Josephus, were admitted into the house, taken into a remote quarter, and there scourged with the utmost severity. The rabble thought they had waited long enough at the door for the issue of the conference, imputing the delay to some difficulties in the case, when, on a sudden, the doors were thrown open, and the commissioners dismissed in their bloody hue after the flagellation, which struck the people with such terror, that those who were highest in their menaces before, were the first to cast down their arms, and betake themselves to flight.

This disappointment so mortified and exasperated John against Josephus, that he concerted other practices to gratify his revenge. He counterfeited sickness, and desired permission of Josephus to go to the hot baths at Tiberias for the recovery of his health. Josephus, upon this, gave him recommendatory letters to the governor of the city, to afford him assistance in what might be requisite for his accommodation, without the least suspicion of treachery. But John was no sooner possessed of the advantages he desired, than he tampered with some, and corrupted others with money and fair words, to abandon Josephus. When Silas, who, at that time, had charge of the city, received information of this practice, he forwarded advice of it to Josephus, who, upon the very instant of receiving the letter, (though late at night,) hastened away for Tiberias, and arrived thither early the next morning. The people in general received him with the utmost deference, John only excepted, who suspected the matter, and the faction which he had corrupted. He sent him, however, a complimentary excuse for not doing himself the honour of waiting upon him, pretending to be confined through sickness. The people of Tiberias were now assembled by order of Josephus, with an intent to acquaint them of the advice he had received.

received. John, having notice of it, sent a band of bravos to destroy him; but, at the instant of their drawing their swords, the people gave a shriek, and Josephus taking the alarm, when the weapons were just at his throat, leaped down from a standing of six cubits high, which he had mounted for his harangue, and made his escape to a little boat upon the lake, with only two of his guards to protect him.

His moderation.

The soldiers immediately betook themselves to their arms, to avenge their general upon these traitors. But Josephus, fearful lest a civil war should be raised by the envy of a few men, and involve the city in ruin, sent a messenger to his people, with a positive command to proceed no farther with the traitors than was necessary for their own preservation; and they accordingly followed his orders with the strictest punctuality.

The Galileans flock to Josephus.

When the rumour of the plot, and the author of it, was spread throughout the country, the people assembled in great multitudes, and went in quest of John; but he prevented their design by flying to Gischala, his native place. The cities of Galilee went over in general to Josephus upon this occasion, and with them many thousands of armed men, who offered their best services against John, whom they reviled as a traitor, and the common enemy of mankind, and declared him deserving of being committed to the flames, with the city that protected him. Josephus assured them that he was highly sensible of their kindness and good-will, but inclined to moderate proceedings where the case would admit, as he had rather save an enemy by candour and prudence, than destroy them by force. He declared, however, at the same time, that he would wish to find every man out of the respective cities excepted by name from pardon, his goods confiscated, and his family destroyed, who should not, in five days after the publication of such a decree, abandon the interest of John, and return to his allegiance.

He proposes terms of accommodation.

They accepted.

The heads of several cities were unanimous in the promotion of these conditions: proclamation was made in form, and all things pursuant duly executed. This declaration brought over three thousand of John's party, who cast themselves and their arms at the feet of Josephus. But John, with the remainder, which consisted of about a thousand Syrian fugitives, betook himself to secret practices, when he found he could not carry his point by open attempts. He sent private emissaries to Jerusalem to calumniate Josephus for extravagant levies, and insinuate that he would soon become tyrannical, unless restrained by a superior power. The people in general disregarded this intimation; but some of the leading men supplied John with money towards maintaining the contest with Josephus. Nay, they even passed a decree for re-calling him from his government; nor did they think that decree sufficient, but sent a detachment of two thousand five hundred armed men, and four persons, eminent as lawyers and orators, in order to supplant Josephus in the credit he had with the people. They were directed to offer him no violence, if he would come away by fair means; but, in case of refusal, to treat him as an enemy. These commissioners were Joazar, the son of Nomicus, Ananias, the son of Sadduc; and Simon and Judas, the sons of Jonathas.

Four cities of Galilee revolt from Josephus.

The friends of Josephus gave him intelligence that an army was coming against him; but the design of the enemy was kept so close, they could not form the least judgment of it. For this cause four cities immediately revolted from him: these were Sepphoris, Gamala, Gilchala, and Tiberias; but he soon recovered them without bloodshed. Four of the principal men he had taken, both for arms and counsel, he sent back to Jerusalem, which enraged the people to so violent a degree against them, that, if they had not escaped in time, they would have been all cut to pieces, both those who were sent, and those that sent them.

C H A P. XXVII.

Tiberias again revolts, and is recovered by a notable stratagem. The inhabitants surrender, and send hostages for the performance of articles. Clytus does justice to himself, and cuts off the one hand with the other, according to sentence.

DURING this time John was in such dread of Josephus, that he kept himself close within the walls of Gilchala. Within a few days Tiberias revolted again, invited Agrippa to take possession of the town, and acknowledged him for their king. But, as he did not come at the time appointed, some Roman cavaliers appeared, and expelled Josephus out of the city. When the news of this desertion reached Tarichee, Josephus was in a very embarrassed situation, as he durst not venture himself alone among the whole body of the deserters, nor could he stay in town for fear of being surprized by the king's soldiers: besides, as the next day was the sabbath, no plan could be carried into execution. Thus circumstanced, he found himself under a necessity of circumventing the revoltors by a stratagem. He ordered the gates of Tarichee to be all shut and guarded, to prevent any intelligence being conveyed to Tiberias of his design. Upon this he caused all the vessels in the lake to be got together, to the number of two hundred and thirty, and four men to be put in each of them. With these vessels he sailed early in the morning for Tiberias. When he was advanced within such a distance of the town that they might easily discern the number of the fleet, without distinguishing what men they had on board, he ordered all the vessels to come to anchor, and stay behind, while himself, with only seven of his guards, and those unarmed, rowed up towards the town within view of the place. His adversaries were still reviling him from the walls; but, upon sight of him in this situation, and taking for granted that the vessels were full of men, they threw down their arms in consternation, and, by tokens of the most submissive intercession, besought him to spare the city.

Josephus uttered terrible menaces against them; and reproached, that, when they took up arms against the Romans, they should spend their force beforehand in civil dissensions, and do that which their enemies desired above all things; that, besides, they should endeavour so hastily to seize upon him who took care of their safety; and had not been ashamed to shut the gates of their city against him who built their walls. He, however, told them, he would admit of such intercession from them as he could enter upon terms with for the security of the city.

Upon this they dispatched ten of their principal men as deputies, whom Josephus ordered to be put on board a vessel, and conveyed some distance from the city. He sent afterwards for fifty of the principal senators as a farther security for the performance of the conditions; and so proceeded, upon one pretence or other, till he had the whole senate in his hands, to the number of six hundred persons, besides two thousand of the inhabitants, who, as fast as the vessels could be filled, were all conveyed to Tarichee, and there kept in custody.

The people now exclaimed against Clytus as the author and ringleader of this tumult, desiring Josephus to make him an example, and to accept of his punishment for satisfaction. Josephus had no design of putting any man to death; but, however, on the supplication of the people, he ordered Levi, one of the guards, to cut off both the hands of Clytus. The soldier durst not venture upon the execution in such a crowd of enemies; on which Josephus was inclined to go on shore, and do it himself. Clytus, perceiving this, entreated Josephus to to content himself with one of his hands. The request was granted, upon condition that he himself should cut it off. Clytus drew out his sword, and with his right hand cut off the left. Such was the awe in which Josephus was held: and thus was Tiberias recovered by Josephus, seven soldiers, and a number of empty vessels.

Not many days after this, upon the revolt of Sephoris, and some other cities, Josephus gave his soldiers the plunder of that place and Gilchala; but, upon application of the inhabitants, he caused restitution to be made of all they could discover; and the like at Tiberias; proposing, at the same time, to chastize and oblige them.

The inhabitants of Jerusalem prepare for war. Ravages and cruelties of Simon, the son of Gioras.

The Jews
prepare for war.

THUS were the disturbances of Galilee quieted, and the Jews no sooner ceased the prosecution of civil dissensions; than they applied themselves to making preparations for a war with the Romans; Ananus, the high-priest, and the men of power in Jerusalem, that stood in opposition to the Romans, both repaired the walls, and procured numbers of warlike implements, such as darts, arrows, and the like. All hands were employed upon warlike preparations; and the youth, in general, were trained to the exercise of arms. In this confused state of affairs the more moderate and candid part of the people could not restrain from lamentation at the prospect of calamities to come. Those of a pacific turn beheld with horror the discord that prevailed; but public incendiaries were pleased with the expectation of mischief. The city, in fine, wore the aspect of destruction, before the Romans came against it. Ananus contended for laying aside these preparations for a war, and endeavoured to bring them to reason; but he miscarried in the attempt, as will appear from the sequel of this narrative.

Ravages of Simon, the son of Gio-ras.

Simon, the son of Gioras, was, at this time, at the head of a band of free-booters, who lived upon the spoil in the toparchy of Acrabatena, where they not only plundered great mens houses, but injured their persons also, and treated the masters themselves with the greatest ignominy, exercising, indeed, the most barefaced tyranny. He went on in this lawless manner till he was forced, by the troops sent against him by Ananus, and other rulers, to retire with the small party he had remaining to Maslada, where he continued till Ananus, and his other adversaries, were cut off. He made such ravages in Idumaea and its environs, and committed such horrid outrages, that, for the security of the country, government was under a necessity of putting garrisons into the very villages. This was the state of affairs in Judaea at this juncture.

CHAP. I.

Instances of the vanity and ostentation of the emperor Nero. Distracted state of the Roman affairs. Nero appoints Vespasian to the government of Syria. His qualifications for such a trust. Vespasian, and his son Titus, draw together a powerful army. The defeat of Cestius render the Jews rash and insolent. They advance towards Ascalon. The armies engage, and the Jews are totally routed, as incompetent to vie with the Romans. Great slaughter of the Jews upon two several occasions. Niger, their general, preserved in a wonderful manner. The inhabitants of Sepphoris are friendly to the Romans.

Nero is affected by the ill success of the Roman arms in Judæa.

WHEN Nero was informed of the ill success of the Roman arms in Judæa, a consternation and terror, as is usual upon such occasions, fell upon him; though he openly affected unconcern, intimating, that what had happened was rather owing to the negligence of the commander than to any valour of the enemy. It seems he thought it becoming him, who bore the burthen of the whole empire, to condemn such misfortunes, which he pretended to do, as possessing a soul superior to all the casualties of fortune. But, after all this ostentation of invincible courage, his solicitude for the want of a general equal to the necessities of the empire was plain and evident; for the east was now wavering and falling off; the Jews were in deep rebellion already; other nations prepared to revolt; and the state of affairs universally perplexed. The great points necessary to be attended to, were to keep the one quiet, reduce the other, and prevent the seditious spirit of the third from tainting the whole body. Vespasian was the instrument pitched upon as the only person Nero deemed competent to the discharge of so important a trust. He was now advanced in years, and had been exercised during the whole course of his life in military exploits. This was the man that settled the peace of the empire in the west, upon the revolt of the Germans. This was the man who completed the conquest of Britany, which before was neither perfectly subdued or known; and he presented his father Claudius with the honour of a triumph for it, without any danger or fatigue of his own. Considering Vespasian under all these circumstances, his years, resolution, faith, and conduct, the children he had, (hostages for his fidelity,) together with other incidental matters in favour of the empire, Nero was induced to constitute him general of his forces in Syria. For his further encouragement, his commission was accompanied with many fair words and alluring promises, according to the custom of the world in an hour of necessity.

Vespasian had no sooner received his commission from Nero, in Achaia, than he dispatched his son Titus for Alexandria, to draw off the fifth and tenth legions there; while he himself crossed the Hellespont, and so made his way by land into Syria, where he came to a rendezvous with all the Roman troops, and the auxiliaries sent in by the princes bordering upon that province.

The Jews, in the mean time, were so transported with the unexpected advantage they had gained over the Romans under Cestius, that they behaved in the most extravagant manner, carrying on the war beyond all the bounds of moderation and prudence. They collected with expedition a multitude of their most hardy troops, and marched towards Ascalon, an ancient city, distant near 520 furlongs from Jerusalem. They ever had an aversion to the inhabitants of this place, and therefore made choice of it for their first attack. They had for their leaders three celebrated commanders; Niger, of Perea; Silas, a Babylonian; and John, an Essene; men eminent for sagacity and resolution.

Ascalon had a wall of prodigious strength, if there had been but men to defend it; the whole garrison consisting only of one company of foot, and a troop of horse, under the command of Anthony. The Jews were impatient till they came to blows with the Romans, and therefore marched with more than ordinary expedition to fall upon them by surprise.

prize. But Anthony, being apprized of it, had drawn his horse out of the town before hand, to be in readiness for the encounter, without being intimidated either by their numbers or their courage. Upon their advance, he received their charge with great bravery, and so put a stop to their progress towards the walls of the town. The Romans, through the advantage of veteran horse to foot, order to confusion, troops well appointed to people without arms, counsel and conduct against rage and passion, and men, in fine, of obedience and resignation, against a loose headstrong multitude, made no difficulty of putting the Jews to the rout; for their first ranks were no sooner broken by the Roman horse, than they fled several ways; some towards the town, where they were crushed to death by crowds of their own people; while others were scattered all over the plain, with the Roman cavalry at their back, and spacious room for the horse to play in. These circumstances greatly favoured the Romans, and occasioned the slaughter of great numbers of the Jews; as which way soever they fled, the Romans were upon them, overtaking some, crossing others, while they surrounded many, and dispatched them with their darts. In this calamitous state of desperation their vast multitudes were no more than so many single men; and the Romans, greatly flushed with victory, out of their small number had enough to spare. The Jews, on the other hand, as they were ashamed of having turned their backs, so they did all that was possible towards the recovery of their honour: but the Romans, in the course of their success, without weariness or intermission, pursued their victory the greatest part of the day, killed ten thousand Jews upon the spot, two of their generals, John and Silas, being of the number. The rest were mostly hurt, and made their escape, with Niger, their only surviving general, to Salis, a town in Idumæa; and during the whole contest there were but few wounded on the Roman side.

But the Jews were so far from desponding under so great a calamity, that the losses they had sustained seemed rather to have quickened their resolution for other attempts. This confidence entailed on them a second overthrow. When they had paused a little, scarcely long enough to dress their wounds, they got together, in the most outrageous indignation, all the power they were able to make, and in a much greater body attempted Askalon once again, under the same disadvantages of want of skill and discipline, and with the same fortune as before; for they fell unawares into an ambush laid by Anthony in the way they were to pass, where they were beset, charged, and routed by the Roman troops, before they could put themselves in order of battle. Eight thousand were slain upon the spot. The rest got off with their general, Niger, who acquitted himself several times upon that occasion like a gallant officer: but the enemy pursuing them closely, they were driven, for sanctuary, into a strong castle, belonging to a village called Bezedel. This castle was deemed impregnable; so that Anthony, to bring matters to a speedy conclusion, set fire to the fort, as the only means of destroying the castle and the general at once. Upon this exploit the Romans went their way triumphing and rejoicing, making no doubt but Niger was destroyed in the flames. But it seems, to avoid the fire, he leapt down from the top of the castle into a deep vault; and as some of his friends were searching for his body, in order to give him a decent funeral, he presented himself before them yet living, which transported the Jews out of an affliction almost inconsolable into an excess of joy, to find their commander delivered by so signal a providence.

Vespasian being now come with his army to Antioch, the capital of Syria, and, without dispute, for beauty and situation, the third city of the Roman empire, he found king Agrippa with all his forces waiting his arrival. He passed from thence to Ptolemais; in which city the inhabitants of Sepphoris, a town of Galilee, were ready to attend him. These people had prudently provided for their own safety, and being sensible of the formidable power of the Romans, without staying for the arrival of Vespasian, to shew their good affection to the government, they had, by anticipation, promised as much to Cestius Gallus, receiving a garrison from him, acknowledging him for their governor, and binding themselves to serve him even against their own countrymen. Vespasian granted them, at their request, such a body of horse and foot for a garrison, as might be a sufficient security against incursions, if the Jews should make any such attempt. Sepphoris, indeed, being the largest and strongest city of all Galilee, Vespasian judged it a matter of high importance to have it in good hands.

CHAP. II.

Description of Galilee, Samaria, and Judæa. Division or distribution of Judæa.

THERE are two Galilees, known by the names of the Upper and the Lower Galilee, which are encompassed by Phœnicia and Syria. They are bounded on the west by the city of Ptolemais and mount Carmel, formerly belonging to the Galileans, at present to the Tyrians. To this mountain adjoins Gaba, or the city of horsemen, so called from the plantation of Herod's horsemen that settled there upon their dismissal. They are bounded, on the south by Samaria and Scythopolis, as far as the river Jordan; on the east by Hippene, Gadaris, and Gaulanitis, together with the borders of the kingdom of Agrippa; and on the north by Tyre, and the frontiers of the Tyrians.

Two Galilees. Their situation.

The Lower Galilee extends in length from Tiberias to Zebulon, near Ptolemais on the sea-coast. In breadth, from Xaloth, on the great plain, as far as Berlabe; and there begins the breadth of the Upper Galilee, which extends as far as the village of Baca, that divides it from the territory of the Syrians. Its length is computed from Thella, a village near Jordan, to Meroth.

These two provinces are of large extent, and surrounded by several distinct nations, but yet have ever been able to make powerful resistance upon all occasions of controversy; for the Galileans are inured to war from their infancy, and have been always very numerous. The men neither wanted courage, or the country provisions. Their soil is universally rich and fruitful, and full of plantations of trees of every kind, inasmuch that it invites the hand of cultivation, and courts the cherishing art of the husbandman. The grounds are every where dressed, and not a foot of it lies unmanured. There are cities, towns, and villages in abundance, which, in so plentiful a country, must be populous; for the inhabitants of the least of them are computed to amount in number to fifteen thousand. Though Galilee falls short of Perea beyond Jordan, in point of magnitude, it is much superior to it in strength and value; for, besides the fertility of the soil, every spot is so improved, that no ground is lost; whereas that vast track of land beyond Jordan is, in general, dry and barren, and not so proper for corn, and the milder kind of fruits. In some places, indeed, as Perea in particular, the soil is more fruitful, and produces excellent fruits, which appears from the vines, palm-trees, and other plants scattered up and down the fields in great abundance and perfection. They are all watered and refreshed with torrents from the mountains, and with quick springs in the season of excessive heat.

Strength and fertility of Galilee.

The length of Perea is from Machærus to Pella; the breadth from Philadelphia to Jordan; with Pella on the north; the river Jordan on the west; the land of the Moabites on the south; and Arabia, Silbonitis, Philadelphia, and Gerasa, on the east.

Samaria is situate betwixt Judæa and Galilee, beginning at a village called Ginea upon the plain, and extending to the toparchy of Acrabatena. The country is much of the same nature with that of Judæa, rich in soil; easily tilled and manured, abounding in trees and autumnal fruits, both those which grow wild, and those which are the effect of cultivation.

Description of the country of Samaria.

vation. It is naturally dry, but amply supplied with showers. The waters of those few rivers they have are exceeding sweet; and, as they have excellent grass, their cattle yield abundance of milk. But the superior advantage of these provinces is the incredible number of inhabitants. The boundary of Samaria and Judæa is Annath, otherwise called the village of Borcæus.

Jerusalem stands in the middle of Judæa.

The same village likewise bounds Judæa on the north. The length of it runs from the south side to a village, upon the borders of Arabia, called Jordan. The breadth is from the river Jordan to Joppa. In the midst of it stands the city of Jerusalem, which has been aptly denominated by some the "Navel," or center of the province. Judæa wants nothing to render it as delightful as it is fruitful, and that by sea as well as land, as far as Ptolemais.

Division of Judæa.

It is divided into eleven parts. Jerusalem, the first, as the sovereign head of all the rest, is called emphatically the royal city. The other ten are distributed into as many toparchies. Gophna is the second; and then Acrabatena, Tamna, Lydda, Emmaus, Pella, Idumæa, Engedi, Herodion, and Jericho. The neighbouring countries are under the jurisdiction of Jamnia and Joppa; as Gamala, Gaulanitis, Batanea, and Trachon, are comprized in the kingdom of Agrippa. This country, which is inhabited by the Syrians and Jews promiscuously, extends in breadth from mount Libanus, and the sources of Jordan, to the lake of Tiberias; and in length from the village of Arphas as far as Julias. Thus have we, with all possible brevity, described the country of Judæa, with its boundaries and confines.

C H A P. III.

Vespasian sends relief to the people of Sepphoris under the command of Placidus. Josephus attacks Sepphoris, but is frustrated in his attempt. Galilee is miserably harried. Titus comes with a great army to Ptolemais. The order of the Roman discipline. The Roman method of encamping and decamping. The order they observe in marches. Extent of the Roman empire.

Vespasian
sends assistance to the Sepphorites.

THE auxiliaries sent by Vespasian to the relief of the people of Sepphoris, being a thousand horse and six thousand foot, were distributed, after drawing them up on the great plain, into two divisions. The horse continued in the camp; but the foot were quartered within the walls, for the security of the city. They made daily excursions up and down the adjacent parts, which, though they committed no act of hostility, either by assault or surprise, was very disgusting to Josephus and his men. Besides, they pillaged all the places which were out of the liberty of the city, and intercepted all the inhabitants that durst venture out of the gates.

Josephus
frustrated in an attempt upon Sepphoris.

Upon this account Josephus made a bold attempt upon the city; but finding, to his cost, that he himself, before his going off from the Galileans, had made the place almost impregnable against himself, and that it was not to be gained from the Sepphorites by any means, he dropt his enterprize. This practice, however, as the Romans deemed it highly treacherous, rendered the war much fiercer, and the enemy more outrageous than before; depopulating the country, night and day, with fire and sword; pillaging whatever they could lay their hands on; putting all to death, without mercy, where they found resistance, and making slaves of the rest. Galilee, in fine, was one tremendous scene of fire and blood, not exempt from any kind of calamity, with no refuge left but the places which Josephus himself had fortified.

Galilee is miserably harried.

Titus brings a great reinforcement to Vespasian.

Titus was by this time come up to Vespasian at Ptolemais, with the troops he brought from Alexandria; and his arrival was much sooner than could have been expected from a winter's march. He then joined the fifth, sixth, and tenth legions, which were reputed the choicest troops of the empire.

These legions were followed by eighteen cohorts. There came also five from Cesarea, with one troop of horse, and five troops of horse from Syria. Ten of these cohorts had a thousand men each, and the rest six hundred and thirteen, with an hundred and twenty horsemen. There was also a considerable number of auxiliaries from neighbouring princes, as Antiochus, Agrippa, and Sohemus, each of whom contributed two thousand foot and a thousand horse. Malichus, king of Arabia, sent five thousand foot, mostly armed with bows and arrows, and a thousand horse: so that the whole army, including the auxiliaries sent by the respective princes, amounted to sixty thousand horse and foot; besides the train of baggage and servants that followed the camp, who had been so trained to military exercises, that they could scarcely be distinguished from the professed soldiers.

The policy of the Romans, in thus training their servants, cannot be too much admired, or too closely imitated, as it renders them, at the same time, not only useful to private families, but also to the commonwealth, in the important particulars of war and government. Whoever attends to the excellency of the Roman discipline in military matters, will find that fortune had the least share in the success of their arms, and that they advanced themselves to the command of the world upon the foundation of their own honour and virtue. They were not to learn the art of war when they were under a necessity of exercising it; but they made it their practice in times of peace, and handled their arms with as much ease as if they were their constant appendages. Peace and war were in every respect the same to them, and they were ever in readiness for all occurrences, times, and seasons. Their very trials of skill resembled real combats: not a day passed but every man went through all his exercises, which kept them in disposition and in breath. By these means they were always in order, without feeling the inconveniences either of fear or fatigue. Their exercises are effectively combats without drawing blood, as their fiercest encounters are but bloody exercises.

To secure themselves from surprise, when entering into an enemy's country, the first thing they do is to pitch and fortify their camp, not slightly or disorderly, but with regard to the situation and condition of the place, levelling the ground where it is uneven, and making it in form resembling a quadrangle. To dispatch the execution of this business, they have their smiths, carpenters, pioneers, and other workmen for fortifications, to attend the army. The inner part of the camp is distributed into quarters, or lodgments, for the officers and soldiers. The outside bears the resemblance of a wall, where they raise turrets at an equal distance one from another. In the intervals they have all sorts of weapons to be used at a distance, as darts, arrows, stones, &c. as well as instruments and machines for casting them. The camp has four large gates, for horse and foot to pass and repass at pleasure. On the inside there are several streets, orderly disposed, with lodgments in the middle for the principal officers; and within them a tent erected for the general, after the form of a little temple; a market-place, with shops and standings for artificers and tradesmen; courts of justice and tribunals, for the hearing of causes, civil and military; so that, upon a general view, it looks like a city rebuilt on a sudden, to wonder is the dispatch where there are great matters to direct, and many hands to execute. If occasion requires, a trench is drawn round the whole, whose depth is four cubits, and its breadth equal.

When they have thus secured themselves, they live together in a kind of military brotherhood, orderly and peaceably one with another. Upon any occasion of foraging, they go out in parties: and as for their times of repast, they do not eat singly, but flatly, and all together; and the trumpet directs them when to sleep, when to rise, and when to let the watch; so that they do nothing but by rule and command. In the morning the soldiers wait upon their officers, from whom they receive the word or signal, and such other orders to be communicated to their subordinates.

subordinates ■ the occasion requires; to the end that every man may be instructed in his duty, and how to behave himself in action; how and when to fall out, or to retreat; and to do all things in order. The trumpet informs them when they are to decamp, and then they take up their tents, pack up their baggage, and prepare to be gone. Upon the second sounding they load their carriages, and stand ready for motion. They then set fire to the camp, which may be easily repaired by throwing up another, while it prevents the enemy from taking an advantage. Upon the third sounding the army marches, and all possible care is taken to prevent stragglers, and to move every man in his rank.

On the right hand of the general stands the herald, who, with an audible voice, puts the question thrice over to the army, whether they are ready for battle? The soldiers, in martial tone and action, return for answer thrice in the affirmative. Nay, they often prevent the very demand, by stretching forth their right hands, and giving other tokens of joy and satisfaction, in hopes of coming to that issue. After this the army advances with order and composure, as if in the face of the enemy.

The footmen are armed with breast-plates and head-pieces, and have swords on each side; but the sword on the left side is much longer than the other. Those that are chosen from the rest to be about the general have a lance and buckler; and all the rest pikes and long bucklers, a saw, ■ basket, a pick-axe, a hatchet, a rein, a scythe, a chain, and bread for three days; so that the men carry little less burthen than the beasts.

The horsemen were long swords girt to their right sides. They carry a lance in their hands; a buckler in a scarf hanging across the horse's side; a quiver, with three or more darts upon it, broad pointed, and about the length of a short javelin. Their helmets are like those of the foot. The arms of the cavaliers, that attend the person of the general, are the same with the rest, only being chosen by lot, the successful troop has the precedence.

This is the Roman mode of marching and encamping, with the various manners of their arming. They do nothing, in their military enterprizes and combats, that is rash and inconsiderate; but their actions are the result of deliberate councils, by which means either their failings are few, or those that happen are easily redressed: for, provided that matters are well digested, it is more eligible to suffer disappointment from the ill success of a well-grounded enterprize, than become indebted to fortune for an advantage gained from an ill concerted plan. These blind events give persons an ill habit of abandoning all to chance, without any precaution or foresight; whereas men become wiser and better for instructive examples, even in cases of miscarriage, and have the consolation of having acted with propriety, though ■ calamity may have befallen them, which human prudence could not prevent.

The constant exercise of arms not only tends to strengthen the bodies of men, but to fortify their souls for daring enterprizes. It is death, by the Roman martial law, for a soldier not only to desert his station, or betray his trust, but for being in the least degree remiss in any point of duty. Their officers, if possible, are more severe than their laws, and make amends for the punishment they inflict upon criminals, by the honours and rewards they confer upon men of merit. Such is the reverence in which they hold the authority of military discipline, that a Roman army exhibits a most glorious spectacle in time of peace; but when under preparation for action, it appears awful and tremendous. Every individual moves as ■ member of the same body; and there is such harmony of motion as if they were all governed by the same mind. Their ears are ever open to the word of command, their eyes watching for the signal, and their hands ready to execute the orders of their superiors, in contempt of all difficulty and danger.

No. 33.

When they come to the encounter, and a battle is once resolved upon, they are not at all solicitous ■ to the number of the enemy, or the danger of the passes, but break through all obstacles, and think themselves sure of the victory before the first onset. If their counsels are thus guided by political maxims, and executed with a proportionable degree of vigour, what wonder is it to behold the Roman empire give laws to the universe, and extend itself as far as the Euphrates on the east, the ocean on the west, the fertile climes of Africa on the south, and the Rhine and Danube on the north? And yet, after all, the dominion seems too narrow for the great souls of the possessors.

Discipline the chief cause of the success of the Roman arms.

I have not recounted these particulars from a motive of writing a panegyric in honour of the Romans, but by way of consolation to those who have been obliged to submit to their all conquering arms, and to divert rash innovators and male-contented from absurd and fruitless attempts. This summary of the Roman military discipline will also afford a very instructive lesson to such as may be disposed to enter into ■ martial life.

Placidus breaks into Galilee. Attempts to take Jotapata, but is repulsed.

WHILE Vespasian remained with his son Titus at Ptolemais, he gave all necessary orders for the supply and government of the army; and in this interval Placidus made an inroad into Galilee, over-ran the whole country, took a great number of prisoners, and put many of them to the sword. These were a timorous, pusillanimous people; but the more daring Galileans took sanctuary in the cities, and other strong holds, that Josephus had fortified. Placidus, observing this, resolved to set upon them by assault, and to begin with Jotapata, the strongest place they had, making no doubt of carrying it upon the first attack by surprise, acquiring a reputation among the rest of the generals, and opening a way to the taking of other places, as the very example of Jotapata would soon intimidate the rest to make a surrender. But Placidus was much mistaken in his conjecture; for the inhabitants, being apprized of his design, and that he was already upon his march, went out of the city to encounter him, and falling upon the Romans unawares, with a considerable body, and in high spirits, as deeming their country, wives, children, and all at stake, they put them to the rout; but killed only seven of them, they being well armed, and making an orderly retreat. Of the Jews there were only three slain, and some few wounded; for being light armed, they were obliged to throw their weapons from a great distance, without venturing a conflict at close quarters; and upon this repulse Placidus took his departure.

Vespasian comes from Ptolemais into Galilee. Description of the order of his march. Shews himself to the Galileans. Josephus is deserted by his soldiers, gives up the contest, and withdraws to Tiberias.

VESPASIAN, being resolved upon an incursion into Galilee, left Ptolemais, and gave the army their marching orders, according to the form of the Roman discipline. The auxiliaries, being light armed, and the bow-men, advanced before the rest, to keep the enemy at a distance, and, by scouting out into the woods, and other suspected passages, for the discovery of ambushes, to prevent surprise. These were followed by ■ party of Roman horse and foot; and after them marched a detachment of ten men out of every company, with their arms and necessary provisions for the forming of a camp. The next in course were the pioneers, to level and mend the ways, and cut down the trees and bushes that incommoded them in their march. After these came the general's baggage, with that of his principal officers, and a strong party of horse for their convoy. Next marched Vespasian himself, with a select body of horse and foot, some troops of lances, and six score of his own men, drawn out of so many squadrons. The engineers, with their machines and instruments for assault and battery, took their place next; then followed the tribunes and other officers, with a choice body of troops about them. These were followed by the imperial eagle at the head of all the rest of the Roman ensigns, as the prince of birds for authority and power; an emblem of government, and a good omen of success in arms. After the sacred ensign came the trumpets; and after the trumpets the main body of the army, six in front, with the proper officers to keep them in rank and file, according to order and good discipline. The servants of every legion marched along with the infantry, and took care of the carriages and baggage. In the last place were the purveyors, and other mercenaries for the service of the army, under a convoy of horse and foot.

In this order Vespasian advanced to the frontiers of Galilee, and there encamped with his soldiers about him, earnestly pressing for action; but, partly in confidence that the enemy's courage would fail upon the very approach of the army, or otherwise that they might change their minds before it came to a battle, he gave them time for reflection, and made the necessary preparations for a siege.

Such was the fame of this great general, that the Jews were struck with consternation at the very report of his approach; insomuch, that the soldiers of Josephus, who were then encamped near Sephoris, abandoned their commander, not only without striking a blow, but without so much as a sight of the enemy. Finding himself therefore thus deserted, and out of condition to encounter the Romans, the spirits of the Jews totally sunk, the greater part gone over to the enemy, and the remainder in all appearance ready to follow them, he declined all further warlike pursuits, and, consulting his own safety, withdrew to Tiberias.

C H A P. VI.

Vespasian, having taken Gadara, puts the inhabitants to the sword. Josephus refers to the council of Jerusalem to decide upon the propriety of fighting or treating with the Romans.

VESPASIAN marched to the city of Gadara, attacked it, and carried it without any difficulty, there not being men to make a necessary defence. The Romans, upon the forcing the town, put all to death without distinction, through hatred to the Jews, and revenge for the overthrow of Cestius. They set fire not only to the city itself, but to the small towns and villages about it, laying them utterly waste, and making the inhabitants slaves.

The retreat of Josephus to Tiberias, for sanctuary, greatly alarmed the inhabitants, as they concluded that nothing but desperation would have driven him to flight. Nor were they mistaken in their judgment; for he foresaw the tendency of the war, and that nothing but submission and repentance could save the Jews from inevitable destruction. With respect to himself, he made no doubt of obtaining lenity from the Romans, if he should request it; but rather than betray his country and his trust, he was determined to suffer a thousand deaths, without soliciting the friendship of a public enemy.

He wrote upon this to the principal and leading men of Jerusalem a plain state of the case, without extolling or depreciating the merit of the Romans, lest, by aggrandizing the power of the enemy, he might intimidate them, or, by representing it in an inferior light, he might encourage them to make resistance without ability. He, in fine, referred the whole matter to the council, requesting them, after due deliberation, to send him word if they were disposed to treat; or, if, on the contrary, they were determined to prosecute the war, to send him an army, without delay, to encounter the Romans. This was the purport of the letter which Josephus sent express to Jerusalem.

C H A P. VII.

Vespasian resolves to besiege Jotapata, whither Josephus had betaken himself. A desperate conflict between the Jews and the Romans for five successive days. The situation of Jotapata. Vespasian carries on the siege with all possible vigour. Manner of the attack and defence. Invention of Josephus to keep off stones and fire. The Romans under great disappointment.

JOTAPATA was deemed the strongest place in all Galilee, which Vespasian observing, and taking notice also that the Jews, in all their difficulties, fled thither for sanctuary, he determined to assault it, and to that end sent horse, foot, and pioneers across the mountains to clear the ways, which were, at that time, craggy, and extremely difficult for the foot, but utterly impassable for the horse. These pioneers, however, in four days, cut a passage for the whole army to march without any trouble.

On the fifth day, being the twenty-first of the month Artemisius, Josephus went privately out of Tiberias, and conveyed himself into Jotapata, which, in some degree, revived the spirits of the Jews. A certain deserter carried the news to Vespasian of Josephus being arrived in the town, and advised him, by all means, to hasten thither, as, if he could once get him within his power, the Jewish war must be at an end. Vespasian was so transported with the tidings, that he looked upon it as a particular providence to infatuate the most considerable enemy they had, and thereby inveigle them with a kind of voluntary bondage. He therefore commanded Placidus away with a thousand horse, and Ebutius, one of the best officers for counsel and execution in the whole army, along with him, giving them express orders, without delay, to invest the city, and take particular care that Josephus did not make his escape.

Vespasian followed the next morning with the whole army, and got up to Jotapata in the evening, when he drew up his army on the north side of the city, seven furlongs distant, encamping upon an hill within view of the enemy, in order to startle them with so tremendous a sight. This was accordingly effected; for the people were seized with such consternation, that not an individual durst so much as look over the walls. The Romans were so fatigued with the march of the day, that they made no attempt at present. Vespasian, however, ordered the encompassing the town with two great bodies, and a third troop of horse to be posted at a distance, to cut off all communication with the place. When the Jews found they were streightened and pent up, their very despair inflamed their courage, as daring enterprizes take their rise from necessity.

The next morning the Romans began to play upon the walls, and the Jews, at first, made a gallant resistance; but when Vespasian attacked them with slings and arrows, to force them from the walls, and when he himself, at the same time, with a body of foot, assaulted the wall upon an hill over against the other, that lay more exposed to the danger of a battery, Josephus was so alarmed for the safety of the town, that he fell most outrageously upon the Romans, at the head of the whole body of the Jews, beat them from the walls, and followed the advantage with a desperate resolution. The havoc they suffered was not inferior to what they did, both parties being equally provoked and inflamed; the Jews by desperation, and the Romans by shame and indignation, to find the others cope with them so powerfully. There were skill and valour on the one side opposed to fury and rage on the other. Of the Romans there were several wounded, and thirteen slain; of the Jews six hundred wounded, and seventeen killed upon the spot. The fight was maintained all the day, until night parted them.

The assailants renewed the conflict the ensuing morn, and in this encounter both parties performed wonders. The Jews took courage from the repulse they had given the enemy already beyond all expectations, and the Romans from the shame of being so long in play; for the very delay of a victory was little less to them than an overthrow. The combat continued five successive days, the assailants pressing still harder and harder upon them; the Jews, on the other hand, not only supporting the defence, but, at the same time, making occasional sallies, without being daunted by the prodigious numbers they had to encounter. Nor did the Romans abate any thing of the vigour of their attack from the difficulty and hazard of the enterprize.

With respect to the situation of Jotapata, it stands upon a rock utterly inaccessible, having only upon one quarter. It is encompassed, on three sides, with such precipices of steep and profound vallies, that, to look down from the top to the bottom, is enough to cause a vertigo of the brain. It cannot be approached but towards the north, where part of the city is built upon the brow of the mountain; and that way alone it is accessible. But Josephus had caused this place to be fortified, and taken into the town, to secure a mountain that overlooks and commands it; which, with other mountains adjacent, kept the place so close, that it was not discernible till the nearest approach. This was the situation and strength of Jotapata.

Vespasian, finding that he had the natural difficulties of the place, and the rugged hardiness of the people, to contend with, took up a resolution of prosecuting the siege with more vigour, and called a council of his officers to deliberate on the manner in which they should carry on the attack. The debate came to this issue, that a large terrace should be erected on the weakest part of the town; pursuant to which, Vespasian let the whole army to work, to provide necessary materials for raising such a mount; such as vast quantities of stone and timber from the neighbouring mountains, with provisions for hurdles to shelter the besiegers against the darts and shot from the town. Under the cover of these defences they advanced their design, though the weapons from above fell down in showers upon them. They procured the earth they used from the neighbourhood, and so handed it from one to another; so that, with the multiplicity of hands they had to assist them, and the undertaking going on without intermission, the work advanced with great expedition. The Jews, in the mean time, did their utmost, by darts and arrows from the walls, to divert them from their design; but all they were able to do could only interrupt the proceeding, without defeating or disappointing it.

Vespasian had by this time sixty engines at work, casting lances at the defendants; besides larger machines, to throw stones and javelins, arrows and artificial fires, which were all managed by the Arabians; and rendered not only the wall itself, but the whole space betwixt that and the terrace, too hot for the defendants.

This, however, did not hinder the Jews from sallying out upon the Romans, stripping them of all their defences, setting fire to every thing about them that was combustible, and by these means counteracting all their efforts. Vespasian, finding the mischievous contrivances of the Jews prevail more and more, and that there was no means of preventing their effects, but by filling up the intervals, so as to exclude their passage, joined his troops in a close body, and put a final end to their excursions.

The mount being now brought up almost to the height of the town wall, Josephus did not think it expedient to have more done on the one side to destroy the town, than on the other to defend it. He therefore called the workmen together, and gave orders for the raising of the wall, and keeping it up still above the height of the terrace. But, upon their representing the impossibility of advancing the work under such showers of weapons, he bethought himself of an invention to keep off both stones and fire. This was by driving several large stakes fast into the ground, and stretching up a number of raw hides against them; these were to be interspersed betwixt the enemy and the bodies of the besieged, as the moisture of the skins would resist and damp the flame, and their yielding temperature throw off the stones and lances with little or no impression.

Invention of Josephus to keep off stones and fire.

Under the protection of this cover, the workmen plied to hard day and night, without either fear or danger, that, in a short time, they raised a wall of twenty cubits, and fortified it with turrets and strong battlements. This greatly discouraged the Romans, who before looked upon themselves as masters of the place; while they were at once astonished at the contrivance of Josephus, and the fortitude of the defendants.

C H A P. VIII.

Vespasian attempts to effect by starving what he could not by force. No provisions wanting in Jotapata but water. Stratagem of Josephus to conceal the want of water, and frustrate the hopes of the enemy. Vespasian again has recourse to arms. Josephus finds out a mode of supply. Proposes an escape. The Jews solicit him to stand by them. He reasons the matter with them. They continue their importunities. Josephus deliberates, and enters into action. Vespasian declines the assault. The invincible courage and resolution of the Jews.

THE citizens of Jotapata were so elated by the success of this stratagem, that there passed not a day without sallies, skirmishes, plunder, and violences, by fire, sword and pillage. Vespasian was greatly irritated at this disgrace and disappointment, and, upon mature reflection, declined the assault, and determined on starving the place instead of storming it; concluding that either want would bring them to submission, or, if they stood it out, famine would do the business of the sword, and, either by weakening or wasting them, put them out of a condition of defence. With this resolution therefore he blocked them up so close, that there was no possibility of passing either in or out.

Vespasian resolves to try the effect of famine.

The besieged had plenty of corn within the city, and, indeed, of all other necessaries, except water, as they had not so much as one fountain, and only rain for their common use, which, in that hot and dry country, was very scarce in summer, and this was their present case. The very thought of a drought was a great affliction to them; indeed, they had already fallen into distress for want of water. The place being plentifully served with all other provisions, and the men in good spirits, Josephus put the garrison upon an allowance of water, that the stock might hold out so much the longer; but this scanty distribution disgusted them very much, as they were apprehensive of an approaching drought, inasmuch that they became refractory, and desisted from their work.

Scarcity of water in Jotapata.

This sroward disposition of the Jews could not easily be kept from the knowledge of the Romans, who were within distance of observing, from another hill near at hand, whatever passed among them; such as a tumultuous throng, the measuring of their portions, and their dissatisfaction therewith; so that many of them were cut off upon the spot by showers of darts from the enemy.

The pit-water being by this time nearly exhausted, and Vespasian in hourly expectation of the town falling into his hands, Josephus, to frustrate his hopes, had recourse to a stratagem. He caused a great number of clothes to be made very wet, and then hung

hung upon the battlements within view of the Romans, by which means he induced them to believe that there could not be such a scarcity of water in the place where they were so lavish of it. Upon that presumption, they despaired of ever taking the place for want of water. Nay, Vespasian himself gave over all hopes of carrying it by a siege, and therefore again had recourse to arms. This was exactly the desire of the Jews, as they themselves, as well as their city, were reduced to the last extremity, and wished nothing more earnestly than to change a calamitous state of dearth of water for an honorable death in the field of battle.

Another stratagem of Josephus.

While Josephus was racking his invention for some expedient, it occurred to him, that, on the west side of the town, there was an hollow gutter, that stood so much out of the way as to be in general unobserved. He proposed through the convenience of this passage to get relief into the town, such as water, and whatever else was wanted. To that end he wrote to some of the Jews, who lived about that quarter, to send him, from time to time, such supplies as might be requisite; together with express instructions to cover the messengers with hair-skins, and cause them to creep along, so that if they should be observed by the watch, they might pass for dogs, or some other four-footed animals. This went on till the correspondence was discovered, and the communication cut off.

Josephus at length proposes an escape.

Josephus, perceiving, by this time, the utter impossibility of defending the city, and the certainty of losing his own life if he stayed, called a council of the leading men, in order to deliberate on the means of escape. When this came to the knowledge of the multitude, they surrounded him in throngs, entreating him not to overlook their safety, as their sole reliance was upon him. They observed, that there was still hope of the city's deliverance, if he would remain with them, as they were in general ready to undergo any hardships on his account; that, if they should be all seized upon, it would be recorded to his eternal honour, that he was too brave either to fly from his enemies, or to abandon his friends; as, in that case, it would resemble a man leaving a vessel in a storm, of which he had taken charge in a calm, upon a comparative view of the case of the vessel with that of their city; for (said they) who shall stand up in defence of our country, when we have lost the very man whom we looked upon as the only means of our safety?

He reasons the matter with them.

Josephus, unwilling to have it thought he consulted his own particular safety, gave them to understand, in a plausible discourse, that his motive for withdrawing was more for their sakes than his own; observing, that, if he stayed with them, he should be able to do them little good while they were in such a condition, and that, if they were once taken, he should only perish with them to no purpose: but that if, on the other hand, he was at liberty, and abroad, he might bring an army into the field out of Galilee time enough to raise the siege; while, as long as he continued pent up in the town, the Romans would be more eager for the prosecution of the siege, as their great object was to have him in their possession.

The Jews are importunate.

This plea was so far from moving the people to accord with his desire, that they urged him with greater importunity; men, women, and children, mothers with their infants at their breasts, bathed in tears, embracing his knees, and casting themselves at his feet, entreating him, with outcries and supplications, not to forsake them in their distress. This, it is presumed, they did, not from envying his deliverance, but from a certain impulse of persuasion, that the presence of Josephus would be a kind of protection to his friends.

It occurred to him, upon reflection, that, if he determined to stay, it would be ascribed to their entreaties; if to go, he should be taken into custody. His commiseration of their state, deplorable as it was, had also much weight with him; so that at length he resolved to stand it out with them, and bear his part in the common desperation of the city.

Having fixed this determination, he thus addressed them: "This is the time, my friends and countrymen; to display our valour, when we have no hope of safety but in our arms; when we are sure to receive immortal honour in exchange for transitory life; and, by acting as firm patriots, to have our names celebrated by posterity as devotees to the good of our country."

From these words Josephus advanced to action, and putting himself at the head of the bravest men he had, charged the enemy's guards, beat them from their trenches, and drove them to the very camp, tearing the coverings of their tents to pieces, and setting fire to their works. This they did, from time to time, for three successive days and nights, with insuperable boldness, and indefatigable labour.

When Vespasian found the Romans distressed by these sallies, and, though they were worsted, disdained to turn their backs; when he also observed that if, at any time, they got the better, they were too heavy armed to pursue the advantage, so that the Jews never sallied, but they annoyed them much; he commanded his troops to give over the attack, and not throw away their lives against men who desired to die under the provocation of remediless despair. Their rage, he observed, was like a blazethat would go out of itself, if it wanted but matter to entertain it; besides, the case of the Romans was totally different from that of the Jews, as the former fought only for dominion, the latter for life and liberty, so that the one stood much more in need of victory than the other. In the mean time the Arabian and Syrian slingers, archers, and engineers, were all busily employed, as the Jews found to their cost. But this was so far from staggering their resolution, that, on the contrary, they pressed through all difficulties to single out the Romans man to man; and they fought it out without quarter, the living on both sides stepping up to supply the place of the dead.

CHAP. IX.

Description of the battering ram. The manner of ordering it. A contrivance to repel the force of it. The Jews have recourse to fire. One Samœas signals his bravery. Two brothers distinguished heroes. Vespasian is slightly wounded. The extraordinary effect of battering engines. A terrible slaughter of gallant men. The Jews maintain their resolution to the last.

THROUGH the length of the siege, and the perpetual excursions of the besieged, Vespasian looked upon himself as in a manner besieged; but, having now carried up his works near the height of the walls, he resolved to bring matters to an issue by dint of battery, and ordered an engine, called a ram, to be brought up to the place of action.

This ram is a machine of prodigious bulk and size, like the mast of a ship; fortified with a strong piece of iron at the top of it, wrought into the form of the head of a ram; from which, and the manner of plying it in the use of it, like the butting of that animal, it derived its name. This machine is hung up by the middle, with great cables, or ropes, fastened to cross timbers, well cramped together, and strongly supported. There it lies upon a poise, like the beam of a pair of scales; and, as it hangs thus ballancing in the air, it is moved backward and forward by the force of many hands, and falls with such violence upon the place where it is to batter, with the iron part that is pre-eminent, that no wall is able to withstand its repeated attacks.

Delay was now death to Vespasian, as the length of the siege had rather damped the exertions of the Romans, while the Jews were incessantly annoying them by some means or other; so that he was now determined on dispatch. The first thing he did was to bring his slingers, archers, and ordinary machines, closer up to the town, to beat the defendants from the walls, and to make way for the battering ram, which was then brought on, that is, as soon as the bow-men and their companions had made the wall too hot for the Jews to shew their heads. It was covered with hurdles, and wrapt in hair-skin, for the security both of the directors and the machine. The wall was shaken by the very first stroke of this engine, which raised a terrible clamour amongst the people in the city, as if all had been lost; and Josephus, finding that the continuance of their battering would bring down the wall over their heads in a very short time, ordered several sacks of chaff to be provided, and let down by ropes from the battlement against the place where the engine played; and still, as the Romans charged their battery, the Jews encountered them with their sacks; by which means they generally missed the mark, or failed of the effect.

The manner of the battering ram.

Vespasian's wound.

This invention greatly impeded the efforts of the Romans; for, in whatever line of direction they pointed the engine, the Jews would be sure to meet them with their chaff bags, so that the wall sustained very little damage from the stroke, till the Romans found out another means to defeat the contrivance. They procured some long poles, with sharp iron hooks fastened to the ends of them. With these they immediately cut the strings of the bags; and, upon this disappointment, the machine did its office again; and the wall, being but newly repaired, and not yet settled, could not possibly hold out any longer.

Josephus and his companions had no other resource than that of fire; so that collecting all the combustible matter they could, besides pitch, sulphur, and the like, they divided it severally into three parcels, and set fire to the Roman machines, huts, and all materials that would take it, in three several places at the same time. The rage of the flames and of the Jews were so terrible, that there was no place for relief, and the danger of perishing both ways was equal. The conflagration, in fine, was so dreadful, that in a moment it destroyed that which had cost the Romans a long series of labour and hazard.

There was one Samaeas, of Paab, in Galilee, and the son of Eleazar, who signalized himself, on this occasion, by a most memorable action. He took up a stone of enormous bulk, and cast it down from the wall upon the machine with such prodigious force, that he broke off the iron head of it; and then leaping down into the middle of his enemies, carried it off, without any apprehension of danger, to the foot of the wall, where he stood awhile, unarmed as he was, a common mark for the enemy, till he had five arrows stuck in his body. In this condition he re-mounted the wall, where he stood, for a short time, a glorious spectacle, without any change either of countenance or behaviour, till at length he expired with the anguish of his wounds, and the head of the machine in his arms, which he would never quit till the last.

There were also two brothers, of Ruma, in Galilee, Netiras and Philip, who exhibited singular instances of resolution. These men fell upon the soldiers of the tenth legion with such impetuous fury, that they broke into Roman army, and drove all opposition before them; while Josephus, at the head of a troop of men with fire-brands, burnt the machines, huts, and works, of the fifth and tenth legions; and those that followed made the same havoc with what was left.

By the evening of the same day, the Romans were at work with the same engine upon that part of the wall that had been shattered and broken before. Vespasian, at the same time, received a shot upon the ankle, by an arrow out of the town; but it proved a slight wound, as the force of the arrow, through the great distance, was spent. Those who were near enough to see their general's blood, so alarmed the whole army with the report, that the principal officers quitted their posts, and came to the head quarters to learn the particulars of the incident; Titus himself being at the head of them, from an impatient regard for the welfare of his father: but this generous concern threw the multitude into a consternation.

Vespasian, however, quickly put them all out of their pain, both his son Titus and the army, by shewing himself with the utmost frankness, and pointing out to them that the accident was attended with no injurious effect; so that the anxiety and sorrow under which they laboured before, for fear of a mortal stroke, were now turned into the transport of an honourable revenge; Vespasian encouraging the soldiers, and the soldiers one another, to renew the assault in defiance of all opposition. The enemies stones and arrows destroyed great numbers of the Jews: but Josephus and his people did not desert the wall, but, with fire, sword, and other implements of war, galled those who had the direction of the battering engine. The Jews, however, with all their bravery, could advance but very slowly, as they were forced to engage in sight of the enemy, and the very fire they made use of against the Romans, afforded the enemy light against themselves; so that they stood so fair a mark, that there was no missing it on the one side, nor any avoiding it on the other; for they could not so much as see the very machines from whence the weapons came. By the force of stones from these engines, the very battlements, and the corners of the towers, were broken down, and where they fell in a body, they carried away whole files before them. But those who would be informed of the wonderful effect of these machines, need only look into the history of the tremendous events of that memorable night.

The besieged resist the force of the machines.

The force of these engines.

One of the guards of Josephus, as he was upon the walls of Jotapata, had his head struck off with a stone from one of these engines, which was carried three furlongs from the place, as if it had been thrown out of a sling: and another coming across a pregnant woman, carried the child within her half a furlong from the body. The prodigious violence and noise of these machines, and of the weapons they cast, the groans of the wounded falling from the walls, the shrieks of women within the town, answered by miserable wretches without, the town-ditch running with blood, and filled with piles of carcasses sufficient to mount an enemy to the assault, and the echo from the mountains reverberating the dismal sounds during that tremendous night, served to strike the eye and ear with inexpressible horror. There was a great slaughter of gallant men in this action, who fell in defence of the liberty of their country, which they maintained all night, against the utmost efforts of the enemy's machines, till break of day, and then the walls fell to pieces. But the Jews, even in this extremity, made the breach good with their bodies and their arms, before the Romans could pass their men over the ditch to the attack.

Many gallant Jews fell in defence of their country.

Vespasian makes ready to storm the city. Josephus makes the necessary preparations for its defence. Horrid outcries upon the approach of the Roman army to the city. A bloody conflict betwixt the Jews and the Romans. The Romans advance up to the wall under cover of their bucklers. Josephus orders scalding oil to be poured on the assailants to force them off. The extraordinary courage and constancy of the Romans. Vespasian orders the raising of his platform. The Jews are compelled to quit the breach.

WHEN the army had a little refreshed themselves, after the fatigue of the last night's extraordinary exertion, Vespasian made every necessary preparation for an assault, taking care, in the first place, to keep the Jews from daring to shew themselves in the breach. To this end he dismounted a party of the best horse he had, armed them at all points, and so ranged them in three divisions, with pikes in their hands, to make good the breach, and, upon the advance of the bridges, to be the first to enter the town. The horse were seconded by a body of choice foot. The remainder of the horse were to be distributed round the mountainous parts of the city, to prevent any of the enemy from escaping upon its surrender. The next in order were the archers, with their bows and arrows fixed at hand; and then the slingers and engineers. Others were employed with ladders to attempt the scaling of some parts of the wall that were entire, which was intended only for an amusement, and draw off the assistance from other places that more needed it, and to force them, by this diversion, to abandon the attack.

Josephus prepares to defend it.

Gives his people previous instructions.

Josephus was so well informed of the purposes and designs of the Romans, that he employed only men that were superannuated for the guard of those parts of the wall that were sound. But wherever there was the least flaw, he appointed none to that duty, but those of tried integrity and courage. He put himself, with five more, at the head of them, to receive the first shock of the enemy; giving them in charge, not to heed the outcries of insulting clamours, but rather to shut their ears against them, as they were but empty sounds. He directed them to cover their heads with their shields, as the best defence against the arrows of the enemy; or to withdraw a little till they had emptied their quivers; but added, that, if they once came to lay over their bridges, the only resource then was fighting; not as in defence of a country that is to be preserved, but for the honour of a country that is already lost; and that therefore they should make the authors of their destruction pay dear for their acquisition; for they must expect, upon the subduing of their city, that their adversaries would gratify their cruelty with the blood of their fathers, wives, and children.

Horrid outcries — the approach of the enemy.

When the common people, the women, and the children, saw the town surrounded by a three-fold army, and no force sent out to encounter them, the enemy marching up with their drawn swords towards the weak side of the wall, the mountains round about glittering with arms, and the Arabians ready with their arrows, they made a lamentable outcry, as if destruction not only threatened, but was actually come upon them. These clamours were so moving, that Josephus ordered the women to their houses, lest they should intimidate the soldiers, enjoining them, at the same time, silence at their peril; while he himself went to that part of the town which fell to his lot, passing by the scaling ladders without the least fear, his thoughts being wholly taken up with the enemy's way of attack by their darts and their arrows.

A bloody conflict between the Romans and the Jews.

Upon the several Roman legions sounding their trumpets together, and the warlike shout of the army, the very sky was darkened with a cloud of arrows. The soldiers of Josephus, however, were not unmindful of the charge he had given them, but stopped their ears against the clamours, and covered themselves with their shields against the darts. Upon the least advance of the bridges, they set upon the Romans with amazing intrepidity to put a stop to their design, either keeping them off, or beating them off, and disputing every inch of the possession. As fast as the Romans endeavoured to mount the bridge, the Jews violently pushed them down again, with signal instances both of their skill and courage in the conduct and execution; shewing themselves bold and fearless in the extremity of danger, as were the Romans where there was any at all: nay, the greater their hazard, the firmer was their resolution; so that when they were once engaged, there was no parting them, till one or the other fell upon the spot.

But the Jews being kept upon perpetual duty, and no reinforcements to relieve them, while the Romans had continually a fresh supply of men to substitute in the places of those that were wearied or worsted, numbers must of necessity prevail in the process. The Romans were sensible of the advantage they had, so that pressing as close together as possible, they threw long bucklers over their backs, and making an impenetrable figure, drove the Jews before them, as if the strength of the whole army had been united in one body, and thus they advanced up to the very wall.

In this state of distress, or rather desperation, Josephus resolved upon the trial of an experiment. The Jews having a great deal of oil by them, he ordered a considerable quantity to be boiled, and cast down scalding hot upon the soldiers under the wall, together with the very pots and vessels in which it was boiled. This was accordingly done, and passing between the bucklers, and over the bodies of the Romans, it utterly broke their order, and destroyed the men, by forcing them down from the wall in their extreme misery; for the oil flowing under their arms from head to foot, and so all over the body, consumed the flesh like fire itself, being naturally apt to take heat, and long in cooling. Their armour also being braced and buckled to their bodies, there was no getting clear of the torment; some of them leaping and springing in their pains, others drawn double, and all falling from the bridge down to the ground. Those that attempted to get off to their own people were easily mastered by the Jews at their backs.

In the whole course of this calamitous circumstance, there was no failure either of courage in the Romans, or prudence in the Jews: for the former, notwithstanding the misery they endured by the scalding oil, had the resolution to press upon those that poured it among them, and not without a competition who should be foremost. The Jews, after this, put another check to the progress of the Romans, by casting boiled fenugreek, a seed of a glutinous nature, upon the boards of the bridge, which rendered them so slippery that the Romans could not keep their feet, so that they could neither fight or fly. Some fell at their length upon the planks, where they were trampled upon by their own people; others fell lower, and were slain by the Jews. Vespasian found his people so harassed out by this way of fighting, that, towards evening, he called them off, having lost several men, and had many wounded. Of Jotapata there were only six men slain, although three hundred were carried off wounded. This action happened upon the twentieth day of the month Desius.

Vespasian was so sensible of this miscarriage of his, that he took an opportunity of consoling the army upon the occasion; but finding the soldiers so far from being dejected, that they were rather inflamed, and desirous of being continued in action, he ordered the raising of his platforms, and the erecting of three wooden turrets upon them, each fifty feet high, covered with plates of iron, to keep them steady with the weight, and not so liable to be set on fire. In these turrets were the choicest of his marksmen and engineers, with their machines, instruments, and arms. The people in them had this advantage of the besieged, that they were out of sight and reach of the others; whereas those upon the walls were easily seen, and wounded from the turrets. The Jews, therefore, being neither able to avoid the arrows from above, or so much as to see those that annoyed them, quitted the breach; but still, upon all attacks, made a vigorous and brave resistance. Thus did the people of Jotapata defend themselves against the Romans, though with daily loss of men, without being able to retort the mischief upon their enemies.

Vespasian sends Trajan to besiege Japha. The people meet him on the way to give him battle. The Jews put to flight, and driven into the first enclosure. A great slaughter. Trajan desires Vespasian to send Titus to his assistance. Titus, in consequence, brings his VESPASIAN being given to understand that Japha, a neighbouring city to Jotapata, after the example of others, was inclining to a revolt, and especially as being encouraged by the defence of that place, which held out beyond expectation, sent Trajan, the commander of the tenth legion, with two thousand foot, and a thousand horse, to reduce it. But he found the town impregnable fortified, as, besides the natural strength of situation, it was encompassed by a double wall. He was likewise encountered on the way by the inhabitants of the place, in a posture to give him battle. The parties accordingly joined, and, after a slight resistance, Trajan put them to flight, and pursued them so close to the out-wall, that they fell in together with them. But, upon their pressing to get up to the second wall, the inhabitants shut the gates, lest they should admit friend and foe one with another.

This extraordinary mode of the Galileans being delivered into the hands of the Romans, seems to have been in consequence of a judicial providence, as they were shut out of their own gates by their own people, and given up for a sacrifice to an enemy that thirsted for their blood. They crowded in throngs up to the gates, called to the officers by their names, and begged admittance; yet were they massacred in the midst of their supplications. The Romans kept one gate, and the citizens the other. Some of those who were pent up in this enclosure laid violent hands on themselves; others fell by the swords of their companions; besides an immense number that were slain by the Romans. Nor had one of these the spirit to lift up an hand, or so much as offer to revenge; for, besides the dread of an enemy, they were daunted by a sense of treachery amongst themselves. There died, in fine, to the number of twelve thousand persons, curling not the Romans, but their own citizens.

Trajan now taking it for granted that their martial men were in a manner all cut off, and that those few who remained would take warning from the fate of their companions, sent to Vespasian, requesting that his son Titus might have the honour of completing the victory. Vespasian, apprehending that something was still requisite to be done, dispatched Titus accordingly, with a reinforcement of five hundred horse, and a thousand foot, which immediately, on his arrival, he formed into two divisions; that on the left he gave to Trajan, that on the right he commanded himself.

The first thing the Romans did was to plant scaling ladders, and then mount the wall upon all quarters at the same time. The Galileans made a faint resistance, but soon quitting the wall, Titus and his party leaped down after them, and entered the town. There was now a desperate conflict in the street, which, through ambushes and sallies from narrow passages, where a number of resolute were posted, together with annoyances of every kind they received from the very women at the tops of the houses, lasted near six hours. But the bravest being by this time cut off, the remainder of the multitude, whether in their houses or not, young men or old, were all destroyed indiscriminately, and not a male left alive, but infants, who were carried away captive with the women. The number of the slain in the city, and in the first encounter, was fifteen thousand; and the prisoners were two thousand one hundred and thirty. This calamity befel the Galileans on the twentieth day of the month Desius.

The Samaritans assemble upon mount Gerizim, and seem to threaten a revolt. Vespasian sends Cerealis against them. The Samaritans raise a formidable body. A

The Samaritans meditate a revolt.

NOR did the Samaritans escape the calamity of the times. They assembled themselves together upon mount Gerizim, which is by them deemed an holy mountain, and there seemed to wait the event of things. But, in the mean time, the complexion of the assembly, and the manner of their behaviour, seemed menacing and turbulent, and indicated a disposition to revolt. They had not become wise by the example of others, but, without considering either their own weakness or the mighty power of the Romans, were precipitating themselves into a rebellion, which Vespasian took early care to prevent. Though the province of Samaria was well garrisoned; he was not without some apprehension of what such a multitude, and such an union of ill affection, might produce; and therefore, by way of prevention, dispatched Cerealis, a tribune of the fifth legion, with six hundred horse, and three thousand foot, to maintain the public tranquillity.

Cerealis is sent among the Samaritans.

A mortal drought.

When Cerealis came up with his troops to this mountain, he found the Samaritans gathered together in so vast a body, that he did not think it expedient to attack them upon that post, but rather intrenched himself round about them at the foot of the mountain, and there narrowly watched their motions. It so fell out, that, being now in the height of summer, and a very hot season, the Samaritans were in great want of water, (the people having made no provision to supply it,) insomuch that some perished daily by a parching drought, whilst others went over to the Romans, preferring slavery to so miserable death.

Cerealis being informed, by deserters, that those who stayed behind were as much dispirited as their fellows, advanced up the mountain, and surrounding them with his army, not only offered them life and liberty, upon condition of laying down their arms, but courteously entreated them to accept of the indemnity preferred, upon an assurance that it should be made good. But when the Roman commander found they could not be prevailed on, he caused them all to be put to the sword, to the number of eleven thousand six hundred persons. This happened on the twenty-seventh day of the month Desius.

C H A P. XIII.

The Roman works at Jotapata are finished. A deserter informs Vespasian of the bad state of the city, and advises him to assault it about break of day. He makes due preparation. The Roman army enter the city. Their relentless cruelty. Forty thousand men slain in the siege; the city razed, and the castles burnt.

THE people of Jotapata held out manfully, and stood firm against all extremities with admirable constancy; but, upon the forty-seventh day of the siege, when the Romans had carried their works to over-top the walls, Vespasian had an account brought him, by a deserter, of the miserable state of the town, which was, that, with the loss of men, watching, and hard duty, the garrison was so weakened, that, with one sharp assault more, the Romans might certainly carry the place; or, as the easier way, they might take an opportunity of surprising them. The deserter advised Vespasian to take his time about break of day, when he would be sure to find them supine and careless, and the guard so drowsy and fatigued, that he could not fail of carrying his point.

A deserter informs Vespasian of the ill state of the city.

Vespasian was so well acquainted with the natural fidelity of the Jews, and how much they condemned force or torments, that he gave little or no credit to this fugitive, and particularly from an instance he had of a wonderful constancy of mind in one one of that city already. He was a prisoner of Jotapata, and being put to the question about the condition of the town, he stood all manner of tortures, even to fire, and the cross itself, to the contempt of death in all forms, rather than make the least discovery. But as there was some probability in the account, he thought he should run no risk in seeming to believe it; upon which consideration he ordered the informer to be taken into custody, and every thing made ready for the assault.

He prepares for the assault.

Particulars of the action.

Pursuant to this resolution, at the hour assigned, the army made a silent march up to the walls, Titus at the head, with Domitius Sabinus, and some chosen men from the fifteenth legion. They killed the guards, entered the city, and were followed by Sextus Cerealis, the tribune, and Placidus, with the troops under their command. The Romans were now in possession of the fort, masters of the town, broad day-light, and yet the garrison was so spent with fatigue and over-watching, that they did not so much as know the town was taken. Nay, those that were awake were almost as ignorant as the rest; for there fell such a mist at that very instant, that either they saw nothing, or knew not what they saw. This fog continued till the whole army entered the place, the people never waking till they felt the danger, and till they were convinced, by the fatal consequences, that they were undone.

A terrible slaughter of the citizens both by the Romans and their own men.

The Romans had suffered too much in the siege to have any sense of mercy or tenderness upon the storm. Some were thrown headlong down from the top of the fort to the bottom; others, that wanted neither good-will or resolution to revenge themselves, were either pressed to death in crowds, forced down precipices, or dashed to pieces by the ruins over their heads. This was the case of several of the select friends of Josephus, who chose rather to die by their own hands, than by the hands of an enemy, and to slay themselves in private, when they could not have the satisfaction of taking a Roman along with them. This induced divers of them to withdraw together into a remote part of the city, and there do the last office for one another.

A base and treacherous murder.

Those of the watch, who first perceived that the town was lost, got into a certain turret towards the north, and, for a while, defended themselves; but being overborne by numbers, they offered to treat, and finding no terms would be allowed them, they were cut to pieces upon the place, and fell like men of honour. This action closed the siege; and the day had passed without the shedding of one drop of Roman blood, had it not been for the death of Anthony, a centurion, who was basely slain at the taking of the city.

No compassion shewn to the besieged.

There were several of the Jews that fled into caves; and one of them called out to Anthony for quarter, desiring that he would give him his right hand upon it, as an obligation of honour for the performance of the condition. Anthony unwarily stretching his right hand for the satisfaction of the Jew, the other stabbed him under the loins with a dagger, and killed him on the spot.

Jotapata demolished.

The Romans slew all they met that day without distinction; and for some days following they searched all hiding places, vaults, and cellars, for fugitives, putting all to death they could find, women and children only excepted. There were twelve hundred taken prisoners, and forty thousand slain during the whole course of the siege. Vespasian ordered the city to be razed, and the castles to be burnt. Jotapata was taken the first day of the month Panemus, in the thirteenth year of the reign of Nero.

C H A P. XVI.

The strictest search is made after Josephus, who is betrayed by a woman. Vespasian offers him quarter. Nicanor endeavours to prevail with him to comply. The soldiers enraged at his hesitation. He calls to mind former revelations. Is for delivering himself up to the Romans. The Jews invective against him.

Expostulation of Josephus with the Jews. They continue irreclaimable. Draws lots for their lives. Josephus and one more submit to live. He is set at liberty, and conducted by Nicanor to Vespasian, who confers with him in private. Titus expresses esteem for him. Josephus foretells the succession of Vespasian and Titus to the empire. Vespasian disregards the prediction, till it is afterwards confirmed. Vespasian returns to Ptolemais, and thence to Cesarea.

THE Romans made the strictest search for Josephus, partly through personal animosity to him, and partly through an officious desire of obtaining the favour of Vespasian, who looked upon him as the main support of the war. It was his good fortune, upon the taking of the town, to make his escape through the midst of his enemies, and conceal himself in a deep pit, with a passage that led out of it into a large cavern, which could not be discerned from above. In this recess he found forty persons of eminence under his own circumstances, with provisions about them for several days. The enemy being in possession of the whole country, he was under the necessity of keeping close in the daytime, but went abroad in the night, to observe the posture of the guards, and look for some means of making his escape. But the watch were so strictly observant, and particularly on his account, that it being impossible to elude their vigilance, he went back to his retreat, and there continued for some time.

On the third day he was betrayed by a woman that was taken up; and Vespasian sent two tribunes to him, Paulinus and Gallicanus, to invite him from his recess, and assure him, upon the word of the general, of the most liberal treatment. Josephus could not think it prudent to trust so far to the Roman generosity as to venture himself upon the general's parole; and being conscious, from the mischiefs he had done them, he had more reason to expect revenge than favour, he excused himself from complying with the proposal. Vespasian then sent a third tribune to him, Nicanor, his familiar friend. Nicanor represented to him the humane disposition of the victorious Roman towards those whom he had subdued; and assured him, moreover, that, so far from resenting his conduct, considered in the light of an enemy, he highly approved his bravery, and esteemed his virtues. He farther proceeded to reason with him, when he had only to enjoin subserviency to his will: that his behaviour was a proof of his respect for a worthy man, and his disposition to treat Josephus in a manner becoming that character: that, if duplicity had been his design, he would not have employed a friend in the office of a miscreant; nor would he himself have submitted to be the instrument of treachery.

Josephus still continuing to hesitate, notwithstanding the pertinent reasoning of his friend Nicanor, the soldiers became so incensed, that they would have set fire to the cave, if the tribune had not prevented it, by assuring them that he was desirous of taking him alive. As Nicanor became more pressing in his instances to bring him to compliance, the rage and menaces of the soldiers increased. This recalled to his mind certain dreams he had, in which had been revealed to him the calamities that were to befall the Jews, and the grandeur and prosperity of the Romans. He was endowed with a gift of expounding dreams, and revealing many things which had been veiled under the guise of mystery. As he was a priest himself, and of the sacerdotal race, he was well versed in the writings of the inspired prophets; and at this very instant, as if impressed by a sacred emotion, and under the immediate impulse of the tremendous images represented in his former visions, he thus addressed the Almighty.

“Great God! since it is thy blessed will to depress the Jews, and to exalt the Romans, and to make me the instrument to foretel thy purpose, I submit myself to thy providence, and to the acceptance

"ance of my life upon condition of surrendering myself to the Romans: but in the presence of thy sacred Majesty, I do likewise declare, that I do it as the minister of thy good pleasure, and not as a betrayer of my country."

He had no sooner complied with Nicanor's invitation, than his companions, in the recess, reproached him with invectives to the following purport:

Josephus
and his companions

"What is become of the laws of our country, or of the honour of our profession? the spirit of our ancestors, and that primitive vigour of the Jews, that, with the first breath of life, drew in a contempt of death? Can Josephus be so fond of that life too, as to think of looking the sun in the face, and seeing himself a slave? Why does he not act according to his doctrine, and practise what he teaches? He recommends liberty to others, and renounces it himself. You were certainly very much mistaken (they exclaimed) in the measures you took of true wisdom and courage, either if you could hope for quarter where you have so little deserved it, or if you can sink so low as to accept of life upon dishonourable terms. But, however the fortune of Rome may fright you into a forgetfulness of yourself, it shall never make us depart from the duty we owe to the good of our nation; and we have yet hearts and swords ready to stand by you in that quarrel. If you are otherways resolved, you have it now at your choice, whether you will die a general of the Jews, or the death of a coward and a traitor. Fall upon your own sword, and you do the former; or leave it to us, and it will be the latter: for the work must be done."

Having uttered this invective, they unsheathed their swords, and threatened him with immediate death, if he entertained a farther thought of submitting to the Romans. Josephus, apprehensive that he might be taken off before he had delivered to the Jews what he had been enjoined by Divine revelation to communicate, thus expostulated with his companions:

Josephus
addressing his companions

"What can be the meaning, my good friends and companions, of this desperate fancy you have taken up of laying violent hands upon yourselves, and setting the two dearest friends in nature at variance, the soul and the body? Am I changed? Ask the Romans. Is it a glorious fate to die in war? It is so undoubtedly, if it be in a war according to the law of arms; that is to say, where a man falls by the hand of the conqueror. Neither should I make any more conscience of killing myself than of desiring a Roman to do it; but if the Romans have a mind to spare an enemy, shall that enemy, on the other hand, be so cruel as not to spare himself? or so foolish as to be more rigorous in his own case, than he would have an enemy to be? No man dies so great, it is true, as he that sacrifices his life to his liberty; but then it must be in arms, and in the act of contending for it; and that life must be taken away in the contest by the competitor that would take away that liberty. But we have to do with an enemy at present, that neither kills us, or fights with us; for the quarrel is over. Now he is as pusillanimous a wretch that presses to die when he should not, as he that is afraid to die when his honour calls him to it. What is it, at last, but the fear of death that keeps us from going up to the Romans? Shall we cast ourselves into a certain death one way, for fear of an uncertain death another? But it is, you will say, perhaps, to avoid slavery: and do you think yourselves now at liberty? But it is looked upon as the part of a brave man to take away his own life with his own hand. What would you think of the matter of a vessel, that, for fear of a storm approaching, should sink the boat before it comes? Would you account that man a brave commander? To say nothing of the affront that is offered to the common wisdom of Providence in the nature of things, (for the desire of self-preservation is a

No. 33.

"principle implanted in all living creatures;) for any thing to destroy itself, it is contrary to nature, and consequently a sacrilegious wickedness against God himself. There is no creature that seeks or covets its own death, in opposition to the universal impulse of a desire to live; and therefore we pronounce those people our enemies that would take away our lives, and punish those that lie in wait to destroy us. It is from God that we have received life; and it is to him again, in his good time, that we are to render it. What can be more provoking and ungrateful than the despising of his gifts? Our bodies are all mortal, and so are the materials of which they are compounded; but the soul is a divine particle, infused into the body by God himself, and it can never die. If any man shall embezzle or abuse a deposit betwixt man and man, we can say nothing bad enough of him. Now the soul is effectually but God's deposit; and shall we presume to rob the Divine Majesty, and think to come off at last without either discovery or punishment? We find it reasonable enough to punish servants who desert, though it be from the worst of masters; and shall we at the same time, that forsake a gracious and a righteous God, pretend to justify ourselves? As for those that govern themselves according to the instinct of nature, and pay the debt of life back again to him that gave it, whenever he commands it, do not you know that everlasting honours attend the memory of those blessed souls from generation to generation, which, after a certain number of ages in the heavenly mansions provided for them, shall return, and animate bodies, pure like themselves? Whereas the deepest pit of hell is reserved for self-murderers; and God will revenge the iniquities of the fathers upon the children in after ages. They are hateful to God: and the wisdom of our great law-giver hath been so severe upon them, that he that kills himself is not allowed burial till after sun-set; though a privilege never denied to an enemy. In other places the right hand is cut off from the body of the dead, as armed against himself: for it is reasonable that the hand that parts the soul and the body shall be divided from the body itself. It is a great blessing, my good friends, to make a right judgment of things, and not to render our condition worse than it is, by blaspheming and incensing our Maker. If we are disposed to live, what hinders us? for life can be no dishonour to us, when we have given so many signal proofs of our virtue. But if nothing will serve us but dying, let us fall by the hands of those that have mastered us. I am not for going over to the enemy in such a manner as to deprive myself of life, by doing the same thing to my destruction, that a deserter does to save himself. If the Romans should be treacherous, and break faith with us, it would be no more in some respects than what one might honestly wish for, as it yields matter for a steady and a generous mind to work upon, not only in the sufferance, but in the contempt of death; for the very baseness of the perfidy will be some sort of comfort to us, when we consider that the authors of our ruin have made themselves infamous and odious to posterity."

These, and many arguments of a similar nature, did Josephus use to dissuade his companions from the impious resolution of suicide. But desperation had rendered them deaf to all prudent advice, as having long ago devoted themselves to destruction. In the most frantic rage they pressed upon him with their drawn swords one after another, reviling him as an infamous coward, and declaring him deserving of death at their hands. Josephus, in this extremity, conducted himself with all possible address and sagacity, interposing one while the authority of his commission, which carried a kind of reverence with it; at another the plea of friendship; at another the force of argument; so that at length, by a prudent application to their respective humours and dispositions, he diverted the blow. When it came to the point of execution, however, the venerable aspect of their general struck them with remorse, and compelled them to drop the weapons they had uplifted to deprive him of life.

His sagacity in proposing lots.

In this state of despair he acted with his usual sagacity, and trusting himself to the providence of the Almighty, determined at last to put his life to the hazard, observing to his companions, "that, since they were resolved upon death, they had nothing more to do than to commit that death to determination by lot, so that he on whom the lot fell first, might be killed by him that had the second lot, in which manner fortune would make its progress through them all, and prevent any of them from perishing by their own hand; as it would be unreasonable, when the rest were gone, that anyone should repent and escape."

death.

This proposal appeared to them all very just and equitable; so that they accordingly drew, and the persons upon whom the lots fell were successively put to death by the next men, as supposing the general would die in his turn, a consideration dearer to them than life. At length (either through fortune or Providence) there was only Josephus and one more remaining of the whole number; upon which Josephus thus reasoned with his surviving companion. "If we cast lots once again, either my friend must kill me, or I must kill him, and imbrue my hands in the blood of my countryman." By these means he prevailed with his companion to submit to live, upon his engagement for his security.

Is conducted
to Vespasian.

Having extricated himself from the difficulties in which he was involved, not only with the Romans, but his own countrymen, Josephus committed himself to Nicanor, who conducted him to Vespasian. The multitude thronged to see him, and were variously affected by the incident. Some rejoiced that he was taken, some threatened him, some pressed to get near him; and others, at a distance, cried out for justice upon him as a public enemy. Those who approached near enough to observe his person, reflected on his extraordinary enterprizes in a comparative with his present condition, and were struck with amazement at the change. Nor was there any of the Roman commanders, however prepossessed against him before, but relented at the sight of him. Above all the rest, Titus, in particular, shewed the highest esteem for his character and person, and the insuperable dignity of his mind in the greatest misfortunes, comparing what he remembered of him in the war, with what he saw of him now in the hands of his conquerors, and making pertinent remarks on the uncertain chance of war, and the vicissitudes of all human affairs. Such were the sentiments of Titus concerning Josephus; and he brought all that heard him to coincide with him, his father not excepted, with whom he was very instrumental towards effecting his preservation. Vespasian gave strict orders that he should be kept with great caution, as he intended to send him to the emperor.

Titus enters tains a singular regard for him.

When Josephus heard him give those orders, he informed the general that he had something to communicate to him in private. Vespasian, upon this intimation, ordered all to withdraw, except Titus and two friends, and then giving him audience, Josephus addressed him to this effect.

Prophetic speech of Josephus to Vespasian.

"You have now, general, in your hands, Josephus, a prisoner of war; and your present thoughts, perhaps, extend no farther. But I come as a messenger of greater tidings, in a matter of much more importance. Had it not been for this commission, I could not have been here at present, contrary to the duty of a Jewish general, living, and in the hand of an enemy. But why am I to be sent to Nero, when Vespasian himself is so near the empire, that I can hardly distinguish between Vespasian and the emperor, or Cæsar? Besides, his son Titus is to succeed him. Keep me at pleasure; but let me be the prisoner of Vespasian, who is not only my master, but in effect, sovereign of the universe. This is what I have in charge to deliver; and whenever I am found so

"sacrilegious an impostor as to call God witness to
"a fallacy, deal with me as I deserve."

This address, carrying with it the resemblance of design, was not attended to at first by Vespasian, till comparing the particulars with other predictions of the same tendency, which appeared exactly to correspond, he was at length induced to give credit to the presage. A friend and confidant of Vespasian, expostulating with Josephus on the credibility of his declaration, observed to him, "that, as he was so skilful in divination, it was extraordinary he should know nothing of the ruin of Jotapata, and his own imprisonment." Reply was made by Josephus, "that he foretold the inhabitants very particularly what was to befall the town and himself; that the former was to be destroyed on the forty-seventh day, and that he himself was to be taken prisoner by the Romans." Vespasian caused strict enquiry to be made in private of the truth of this relation, which he found verified by the prisoners. Though Josephus was not actually set at liberty, he was, in every instance of accommodation, treated with great courtesy and respect, but by Titus in a more peculiar manner.

On the fourth day of the month Panemus, Vespasian returned to Ptolemais, and thence proceeded to Cesarea on the sea-coast, which is one of the first cities of Judæa. The greater part of the inhabitants were Greeks, so that they received the Roman army with great acclamations; not only from the respect they bore the empire, but the aversion they had for the Jews, on which account they pressed Vespasian with clamorous importunity to put Josephus to death. But the general, considering this tumultuous way of proceeding only as the act of a rash multitude, dismissed the petitioners without an answer. Deeming Cesarea a commodious place for winter quarters, he placed two legions in it, and sent the fifth and tenth legions to Scythopolis, that he might not distress Cesarea with the entire army. This town is situated upon a plain near the sea, and is extremely hot in the summer, but temperate in the winter season.

Joppa a refuge for revolted and robbers. Vespasian sends an army thither. Description of Joppa. The inhabitants suffer shipwreck. It is taken a second time by the Romans. Vespasian places a garrison in the castle. Josephus is reported to have been slain, and is thereupon lamented by the Jews, who, when they found that he was living, and in favour with the Romans, held him in the greatest aversion.

THERE was, at this time, a great multitude gathered together, partly revolted from the Romans, and partly fugitives from some conquered cities of the Jews. They applied themselves to the repairing of Joppa, which Cestius had demolished, and, for want of subsistence in the country which he had laid waste, resolved to try their fortune at sea. To this end they put out with a fleet of piratical ships, scowling Syria, Phœnicia, and the coasts of Egypt, pillaging all trading vessels in those seas, and thereby wholly obstructing commerce. Vespasian, receiving intelligence of these proceedings, sent a body of horse and foot to Joppa, which being loosely guarded, they entered the town in the night with much ease. The inhabitants were so alarmed at this surprise, that, without attempting to oppose the Romans, they fled to their ships, and lay off at sea all night, out of the reach of their darts.

Joppa may be said to be a sea town, without any manner of port: the shore is steep and craggy, with two pointed rocks on each side, stretching a considerable way into the sea, and bending in the form of an half-moon, which renders it very tempestuous there in foul weather. Here are still to be seen the marks of Andromeda's chains, which attest that fable of antiquity. A cross wind upon the quarter dashes the waves against the rocks in so dreadful a manner, that nothing can be more hideous or dangerous.

While the people of Joppa were riding in this station, there arose a furious storm at break of day, which is called by the name of the Black-north. This wind dashed their vessels to pieces, some against one another, and others against the rocks. Great numbers, that laboured against the tide, to put out to sea, were up-set, and swallowed up; for the shore was so rocky, and had so many of the enemy upon it, that they were afraid to come to land. Their situation, indeed, was desperate, betwixt the wind at sea, and the Romans on shore. Their lamentations and outcries were horrible: some were drowned, others died on board the wrecks; some fell upon their swords, to prevent other consequences; several were washed away by the billows, and dashed to pieces against the rocks, till the water was discoloured with blood, and the whole coast covered with dead bodies; the soldiers waiting all the time upon the land, to dispatch those that were driven on shore. There were supposed to be four thousand two hundred bodies cast up with the tide.

The Romans being now masters of Joppa without a stroke, (this being the second time of their taking it,) razed it to the ground; but Vespasian, lest it should become an harbour for pirates, once again fortified the castle, and placed in it a competent garrison, leaving a considerable body of horse in the place, to scour, burn, and lay waste the circumjacent towns and villages; which orders were accordingly executed.

The report of the surrender of Jotapata was so extraordinary, and the fact so dubitable in itself, that it gained little or no credit. Indeed, there survived not a man of the place to carry the tidings; though a rumour was spread at random, that the city was taken, as adverse incidents soon transpire. By degrees, however, it passed for current; and in the course of time, was generally admitted, with many additional and fictitious circumstances. It was confidently reported, that, upon the taking of the city, Josephus was slain, to the infinite affliction of the inhabitants of Jerusalem in general. Some that fell were lamented by particular families, others by particular friends; but the general, being a public loss, was the subject of universal mourning, in so much, that for thirty days there was no intermission of the solemnity, nor any cost spared for the celebration of the funeral pomp. But when time brought truth to light, and represented the transactions at Jotapata in their true colours; when it came to be known that Josephus was not dead, as reported, but still living, and in such credit with the Romans, that their generals, instead of treating him as a captive, conferred the highest honours upon him, the veneration they had for him, while they supposed him dead, was turned into the most rancorous envy and hatred. They reproached him with cowardice and treachery, in abandoning the cause, and the whole city joined in calumny and detraction against him. While men avail themselves of one misfortune as a precaution against another; but those devoted people, when they had once deviated, pursued their error, and made the end of one mischief the beginning of another. The Jews, by a kind of fatality, were now thrown into a greater rage against the Romans than ever, as if the wreaking of their vengeance on them was the most effectual means of revenging themselves upon Josephus. These were the tumults in Jerusalem at this time.

CHAPTER XVI.

Vespasian goes to Cesarea Philippi, where he is entertained by Agrippa twenty days. Tiberias and Tarichee revolt from the Romans. Vespasian orders some troops to Scythopolis, and encamps at Sennabris, within sight of the rebels. The faction fall upon Valerian, who is sent by the general to compromise matters. Vespasian, at the instance of Agrippa, pardons the affront. Trajan takes possession of the castle. Vespasian enters the city, and is received with acclamations.

KING Agrippa having invited Vespasian to pass away some time with him in his country, and to bring his army with him, partly from a motive of generosity, and partly from the hope of bringing some male-contents to better order, the general embraced the offer with cordiality, and marched from Cesarea upon the sea-coast to Cesarea Philippi, where he staid twenty days, refreshing himself and his troops, and returning public thanks to the great disposer of all events for the success which he had been pleased to crown his undertakings. He was there given to understand, that Tiberias was at that time wavering, and that Tarichee had already revolted, (both of which cities were parts of the kingdom of Agrippa,) and therefore thought he could not have a fairer opportunity of acknowledging his obligations to Agrippa, than by reducing those people to allegiance, especially being resolved within himself to press hard upon the Jews. With this view he sent his son Titus for the troops that were quartered at Cesarea, to bring them to Scythopolis, a place not far from Tiberias, and much the largest town in the district of Decapolis. Vespasian got thither first, and waited the arrival of his son; when he advanced with three legions within thirty furlongs of Tiberias, and encamped at a place called Sennabris, within sight of the rebels. From thence he sent Valerian Ducursori, with forty horse, to endeavour, by fair words, to reduce them to their duty. He was instructed to tell them, that the general supposed the people to be peaceably inclined, if they were not incited to sedition by a number of male-contents. When Valerian approached the town, he alighted from his horse, and enjoined his companions to do the same, to obviate any suspicion of an hostile intent.

The faction, under the command of Jesus, the son of Tobias, leader of a band of rovers, fell furiously upon Valerian and his people, without giving them the least previous notice. Valerian, though alarmed at the affront, durst not strike a stroke contrary to the order of his general, though he had every probable view of success. Valerian, in fine, and five of his men, made their escape on foot, being forced to leave their horses behind them, which Jesus and his crew carried off in triumph into the town, as trophies of victory, rather than the booty of an infamous treachery.

This mean and unmanly conduct excited in the minds of the leading men of the place such apprehensions of revenge, that they immediately repaired to the Roman camp, under the countenance and protection of king Agrippa, and cast themselves at Vespasian's feet for mercy and pardon, imploring him not to impute the crimes of particular persons to the whole body of a people who never wanted veneration for the Romans; and likewise to spare the innocent, and punish the authors of the defection. Vespasian could hardly forgive the seizure of the horses: however, upon the mediation of Agrippa, he granted their request. As soon as this act of grace was passed, Jesus and his party, not thinking it safe for them to continue at Tiberias, made the best of their way to Tarichee.

Vespasian sent Trajan, the day following, with a party of horse, to take possession of the castle, and to sound the common people if they were of the same peaceable disposition with their deputies. Upon finding they were of the same mind, Vespasian marched up to the city with his whole army, the citizens opening the gates, and receiving him in the way with due honours and acknowledgments as their benefactor and protector. But the gates being too narrow for the troops to march at liberty, the Roman general caused a part of the south wall to be beaten down to widen the passage, but with a command of the utmost penalty, not to offer any violence to the people. This he declared was for the sake of Agrippa, as it was that he spared the remainder of the wall, upon the king's undertaking for the good behaviour of the people for the time to come. Thus did he restore this city to a quiet state after it had been grievously afflicted by sedition.

Situation and strength of Tarichee

VESPASIAN, having departed from Tiberias, encamped betwixt that city and Tarichee; but fortified his camp with a wall, upon an opinion that the taking of the place would be a work of time. It was remarkably strong, both by art and nature; and being fortified by the lake of Genesareth, it was looked upon as the receptacle of all the desperate turbulent people of the faction. It is situated, like Tiberias, at the foot of a mountain; and on those sides that are not washed by the sea, Josephus had run up a strong wall, but in some degree inferior to that of Tiberias. At the commencement of the revolt, there wanted neither men, money, or provisions to render that place impregnable: indeed there was a surplus to spare for Tiberias. The besiegers had likewise a fleet of armed vessels in readiness upon the lake for a retreat, in case of an adverse stroke by land; and to serve for a naval fight, if there should be any occasion.

The Romans pursue the Jews to their shipping.

While the Romans were fortifying and entrenching, Jesus and his party made a furious attack upon them, scattered the pioneers, and overthrew a good part of their works, without any dread either of the Roman discipline, or of their numbers. The Romans pursued them to the lake, when they embarked on board their vessels; and when they had got out of the reach of the enemy's darts and arrows, they came to an anchor, and there lay arranged, as if drawn up in order of battle.

During these transactions Vespasian received intelligence that a considerable body of Jews were gathered together on the next plain, and thereupon sent out his son, with a detachment of six hundred chosen horse, to disperse them. Titus accordingly proceeded, and finding himself greatly overpowered by numbers, sent to his father for a reinforcement. Finding, however, the greater part of his troops eager for action, notwithstanding a disparity in point of numbers, he took up his stand where he might best be heard, and thus addressed them:

Titus harangues his army.

"Romans, (for I cannot begin my discourse more auspiciously than by putting you in mind of your race, telling you whence and what you are, and whom you have to do withal. As to the Romans, the whole world allows them to be invincible, upon undeniable proof and experience. I have this to say for the Jews too, that, though they have been often conquered, they would never own themselves to be overcome: so that we have no more to do, than to stand as firm at least in our prosperity, as they do in their adversity,) I read cheerfulness and courage in every face, and it joys me to see it: but yet I am uneasy sometimes for fear the vast numbers of your enemies should strike a secret damp upon that resolution. Wherefore let every man duly consider his own force, and that of his adversary. The Jews, it is true, are generally bold, and fearless of death, but utterly deficient in military conduct and discipline, and may be more properly called a croud of people than an army; whereas nothing can be more regular than our order and experience. What are we the better for the practice of arms in time of peace, if it does not help us to supply the want of numbers by skill and address? Or, what is the benefit of a perpetual exercise of war, if it gives us no advantage over men that are raw and inexperienced? Do but consider what it is to encounter naked bodies with men in arms, foot with horse; men that understand nothing of government, with eminent commanders; and that we are as good as double the number we appear to be, at that rate of advantage; and the enemy not half so strong as they may appear. It is not number alone that does the business in war, let the combatants be ever so stout; but true courage, as we see every day, does wonders with a few; for moderate numbers are manageable to the best advantage of the party; but great bodies are liable to disorder and confusion, and often more mischievous to themselves than an enemy. The daring, desperate, and brutal fierceness of the Jews, does a great deal, I must confess, in a prosperous course of fortune; but, upon the least check of a disaster or disappointment, that impetuous ardour abates, and comes to nothing; whereas virtue, resignation, obedience, and true valour, will support us in all our fortune, good or bad, without puffing us up, or deceiving us. Beside, we have a greater interest at stake than the Jews; for their's is only a popular quarrel for liberty, and their country; but we contend for glory, and for the fame of immortal memory; and not without some indignation neither, after the conquest of the whole world beside, to find ourselves hampered in a competition with the Jews. You may observe again, even in case of the worst, that we shall run no great risque neither in the contest, being sure to be well seconded with so many of our allies, so strong, and so near us. But what have we more to do now than to anticipate the victory, and engross the honour of it to ourselves, without waiting for the reinforcement we expect from my father? The glory will be the greater when it comes home to us entire, without sharing. The point at present in question, is no less than the characters of my father, myself, and my fellow soldiers; that is to say, whether or no my father deserves the honour the world has done him. And am not I his son then, and are not you my soldiers? My father has been so accustomed to victory, that I should never dare to look him in the face again after one defeat; and would not you be as much ashamed of tardiness on the other hand, where the general leads the way? The first post of danger shall be mine: do you but stand by me, and commit the rest to Providence: only remember what I tell you, that a close fight will be to our advantage."

This address of Titus greatly animated the Roman army, throughout which the spirit of heroism seemed now to be diffused, insomuch, that the arrival of Trajan with four hundred horse, before the engagement came on, disgusted them much, as they could not bear the thought of having more partners to share in the glory of the day. Vespasian had also sent Anturius and Silo, with two thousand archers, and given them in charge to take possession of the mountain that was over against the city, and repel those that were upon the wall, which was accordingly done. Titus, in order to render his army more formidable in appearance than it was in reality, drew up in a line, to answer the front of the enemy, and was the first man himself that charged in upon their body, the men following him with the loudest exultations. The Jews, though surprized at the resolution of their attack, made some resistance, till they were beaten down and trampled upon by the horse; when they dispersed, and precipitately fled for refuge towards the city, after many had been slain upon the spot. Titus pressed upon the hindmost, crossed others, and maimed them, and forced others back that made for the walls, insomuch that very few escaped, but those who got into the town. There fell out at this time a terrible sedition in the city betwixt the old inhabitants and the strangers.

The former were concerned for their possessions, and ever averse to a war, and more so now after their defeat. But the foreigners, who were violent and numerous, were the more eager on that account for action. The dispute produced such loud clamours and outrages, that Titus, being near the wall, and overhearing the whole, improved the occasion, and again addressed his soldiers to this effect:-

“ The time is now come, my fellow soldiers, if we have but hearts to make use of it; for God hath delivered up the Jews into our hands, and we may have a victory for the taking it up. Do you not hear the outrageous contentions of the very men that have escaped our hands, and are at this time ready to cut one another’s throats? The city is our own, if we do not slip the opportunity. But this is a business that requires resolution as well as dispatch; and great things are not to be done without hazard. Why do we not take the advantage of this mortal animosity, and fall upon them before their necessities force them to unite? And why do we not fall upon them too, before our auxiliaries come up to rob us, not only of the credit, but of the profit also of the action? For, beside the reputation of so gallant an exploit by such an handful of men, we shall have both the credit and the spoil to ourselves.”

Having thus spoken, he mounted his horse, posted away to the lake, and was the first man that entered the town, followed by his troops. The defendants were seized with such consternation at the boldness of the attempt, that they had neither resolution to oppose his person, or obstruct his passage. They left the guard of the city; and Jesus, with some of his companions, fled into the fields; while others ran down to the lake, and met the enemy in the teeth. Others endeavoured to save themselves by their boats, but were cut off by the way; others by swimming, but sunk in the attempt. There was great slaughter in the city, while the foreigners, who had not fled away, made resistance. The natives made none at all, hoping that Titus would consider them only as passive in the case, and never having consented to the war. Titus, from this motive, having quelled the sedition, put a stop to any farther slaughter, out of commiseration to the inhabitants. The town being now taken, those that had fled to the lake withdrew as far as they possibly could from the enemy. Titus sent a party of horse express to his father, with the joyful news of this glorious exploit, and the greatest difficulty of the war was supposed to be surmounted by the reduction of this city. His next care was to place a proper guard about it, and give command that none should attempt to escape privately upon pain of death. The next day he went down to the lake, and ordered vessels to be fitted up to pursue those that had got off to sea. These vessels were speedily prepared, as there were both materials and artificers in abundance.

Description of the lake of Genezareth. Head and course of the river Jordan. Description of the country about the lake of Genezareth. The fountain of Capernaum.

THE lake of Genezareth derives its name from the country adjoining to it. Its breadth is forty furlongs, and its length an hundred. Its waters are sweet, and agreeable to the palate, as they are purer than those of other fens. It lies upon a gravel, is more convenient for drawing, and milder than any river or fountain water; yet so cool, that the natives cannot warm it by setting it in the sun in the hottest season of the year. It abounds with variety of fish, which, for form or flavour, are not to be found any where else; and the river Jordan runs through the middle of it. The head of this river has been thought to be Panion, but, in reality, it is carried thither after an occult manner, from a place called Phiala, an hundred and twenty furlongs distant from Cesarea, a little on the right hand, and not much out of the way to Trachonis. It is called Phiala from its round figure; and the water always continues up to its edge, without either shrinking or overflowing. The first discovery of this was by Philip, tetrarch of Trachonis, who caused chaff to be thrown into Phiala, which came out again at Panion, till that time taken for the head of the Jordan. Panion is not only delightful from situation, but most magnificently beautified and enriched by the royal bounty of Agrippa. This visible stream or Jordan arises from this recess, crosses the marshes and fens of the lake Semechonitis, and, after a course of an hundred and twenty furlongs and farther, passes by the city of Julias, and so over the lake of Genezareth, a great way into the desert, till it empties itself into the lake of Asphaltites.

Phiala the true head of the Jordan.

This lake takes its name from the country that surrounds it, which is pleasant to admiration. Its soil is so fruitful, that it abounds with plants of every kind. It is also so improved by the skill and industry of the inhabitants, that, through a peculiar exuberance of climate, every thing that is cultivated prospers; as nuts, palms, figs, and olive-trees, which flourish here in perfection; though, from their nature, they seem to require an air that is more temperate. One, indeed, might term this spot the ambition of nature, that produces plants of qualities totally different; so that there appears an happy contention of the seasons, as if each of them laid claim to their country. It not only nourishes various kinds of autumnal fruits beyond expectation, but preserves them a long continuance of time, in so much, that figs and grapes hold in season there ten months in the year, and other fruits the whole year round. Besides the agreeable temperature of the air, it is famous for a chrystalline flowing fountain, called, by the natives, Capernaum. Some have thought it to be a vein of the Nile, because it produces a certain fish, called Coracin, which is nowhere else to be found but in Alexandria. The length of this country along the lake is thirty furlongs, and the breadth twenty. Let this suffice for a description of that beautiful spot.

A sea-fight upon the lake between the Romans and the Jews. Miserable slaughter of the latter. Vespasian deliberates in council on the case of the Jews. A dreadful sentence upon them.

WHEN the vessels were prepared according to order, Vespasian embarked as many of his forces as he deemed sufficient to cope with the fugitives, and set sail in quest of them. Those who were driven to the lake could neither make for the land, where they would immediately fall into the hands of the enemy, or engage upon a level at sea, as their vessels, being small, and fitted out for piracy, were too weak to encounter with those of Vespasian: besides, they were so deficient in point of men, that they were afraid to approach the Romans, who were well manned, and in good order. The only manner in which they could annoy them was by casting stones: yet they themselves were the greatest sufferers; for the Romans being well armed, the stones made a sound where they fell without any effect, while they lay open and exposed to the Roman arrows; or if they made any attempts at close quarters, they were cut off before they could execute their design, their boats upset, and their men drowned. The enemy dispatched some of them at a distance with their darts, others they boarded and destroyed with their swords, and some were hemmed in, and taken, vessels and all, as they were locked in between the two fleets. Those who were tumbled overboard, and struggling for life, no sooner shewed their heads above water, than they were taken off by a lance, or over-run by the enemy’s boats and sunk. If any of them, in the rage of despair, made towards their adversaries, they were sure to have their hands or their heads chopped off.

Nothing was to be seen but death and destruction in all the variety of horror, till they were totally broken and routed, pressing through the midst of the enemy to get on shore. In this confusion many were killed upon the water, and more upon the land; nor was any thing to be seen upon the lake, or the borders of it, but blood and carcases. The putrid bodies, in a few days, tainted the air to such a degree of malignancy, that the case was not only dreadful to the sufferers of the calamity, but the very conquerors were shocked at the scene, and many expressed abhorrence at the barbarity of it. This was the issue of the naval battle; and the whole number of the slain, in both actions, were 6500 persons.

Vespasian
deliberates about sparing the people.

When the fight was over, Vespasian took his place upon the tribunal, and separating the strangers, that were the cause of the war, from the natives and old inhabitants, who were merely passive in it, he called a council of his officers about him, to consider what was to be done with these people, and whether they were to be treated all alike. The council opposed the sparing of the strangers, as they would ever be restless, having no habitation, and consequently dangerous and troublesome to any prince that would receive them. Vespasian acknowledged that they deserved to die, and that he made no doubt of their rebelling against their preservers, but the difficulty was, the manner of disposing of them, as the inhabitants would lay it to heart to see so many people put to death after a promise of quarters upon their mediation, besides the general's scruple upon a point of honour and justice of breaking faith with his prisoners. His friends, however, insisted on it, that he was not tied up to punctilios with the Jews, and that where strict honour and policy are inconsistent, the common good ought to have the preference.

Vespasian was over-ruled by his council, and gave the strangers leave to depart, upon condition they kept the way that led to Tiberias. As mankind are ready to believe what they wish to be true, in this confidence they set out for Tiberias, without the least apprehension of any violence in their passage, either upon their persons or property. The Romans had beset the road that led to the city, so that it was impossible for any one to escape. When they got them into the town, they made them all prisoners; Vespasian causing them to be shut up in the amphitheatre, where he ordered both old and young, to the number of 1200, that were not able to bear arms, to be put to death; 6000 of the strongest of them to be sent to Nero; and 30,400 were sold for slaves; besides those given to king Agrippa, whom he left at liberty to dispose of as he thought fit. The rest were inhabitants of divers places, most of them incendiaries and fugitives, and promoters of the war, because they could not live in peace. These prisoners were taken upon the eighth day of the month Gorpizæus.

Siege of Gamala. Formidable situation of that city. Vespasian advances up to it. The Romans make an assault. Are afterwards repulsed with great loss. Vespasian's bravery and presence of mind. Noble action of Gallus, a Roman centurion. Noble speech of Vespasian to his soldiers. Second attempt upon Gamala.

THE cities and towns of Galilee, which, after the taking of Jotapata, had revolted from the Romans, upon the conquest of Tarichæa, returned to their allegiance, so that they were now in possession of all the fortresses except Gilchala, and the mountain of Itabyr. Gamala also, a city over against Tarichæa, situated upon the lake, and under the government of Agrippa, joined in the rebellion. Sogane revolted also; and so did Seleucia, after their example. They were both cities belonging to the province of Gaulanitis; Sogane in the upper part of it, which is called Gaulana, and Gamala in the lower. Seleucia stands upon the lake Semechonitis, which is sixty furlongs in length, and thirty in breadth, and its marshes reach as far as Daphne. This is a delightful country in many respects, but more especially for the curious springs in it, that feed the Lesser Jordan, as it is called, and then take their course to the Great Jordan, at the foot of Jupiter's golden temple.

King Agrippa, at the beginning of this defection, entered into an alliance with the people of Sogane and Seleucia; but Gamala, depending on its own strength, as being much stronger than Jotapata, refused to be of the party. Gamala, which stands upon the cliff of a rock, that arises out of the middle of a mountain, and, in the posture of elevation, with crags before and behind it, has some resemblance of the figure of a camel, from whence it originally took its name; but time and custom have corrupted the manner of writing it. Upon the front and the two sides are inaccessible vallies. The part that joins the mountain is not of itself so hard of access; but as the inhabitants have fortified it with trenches and defences, it is next to impregnable. The houses stand as thick upon the steep of the hill to the southward, as if they were dropping into the precipice. There is also an hill of so prodigious an height, that it may serve for a citadel to the valley in the bottom. There was also a fountain within the circuit of the city, which terminates the town.

Notwithstanding all that nature had done towards making this place impregnable, Josephus had caused a wall to be run about it, and cast up artificial works, trenches, and fortifications, for a farther security. The inhabitants were much more confident in the defensible condition of the place, than those of Jotapata, though neither so many, or so martial. But the difficulties of the attack made amends for the want of numbers. The city, indeed, was well manned, as it was the sanctuary of all the refugees; in-somuch, that king Agrippa spent seven months before it without any manner of advantage.

Vespasian at this time decamped from Emmaus, near Tiberias, (the former of which was so called from a warm bath of sovereign virtue against several diseases,) and so proceeded to Gamala, where he found it impossible to draw a regular line of circumvallation about it, but set guards, however, upon all the passes he could come at, and possessed himself of the mountain above. The Romans, according to their custom, fortified their camp, carried up a wall about it, and so entrenched. The fifteenth legion was posted against a tower, eastward, upon the highest part of the town; the fifth toward the middle of the town; and the tenth was appointed to level the ditches, and other hollow places.

While things were in this situation, king Agrippa drew up close to the wall, to try if he could bring the people to surrender the place, and reason them into a sense of their duty. But at this instant he received a terrible stroke with a stone from a sling upon his right elbow. His friends thronged immediately diately about him to bring him off; and the Romans were highly incensed, by reflecting how barbarously these people would treat strangers and enemies, that could be so inhuman to their own prince, their countryman, and a friend that advised them for their good. In this heat they pressed the siege with all possible vigour.

Between many hands and diligent application, the walls were not long in raising; and the next thing to be done was the mounting of their machines. Chares and Joseph, two of the principal men in the town, had the ordering of the defence, and so led up the soldiers to the wall with exhortations and encouragements to behave themselves like men of honour. But wanting water, and other necessaries, they were not much disposed to the action, as they found they could not hold it out long. Upon the advance of the Roman machines, they made some sort of resistance at first; but when they came to throw their stones and arrows amongst them, they ran presently into the town. They battered the walls with their rams upon three attacks; and upon disputing a breach, nothing could be more hideous than the outcries without and within the town, the found of the trumpets, and the noise of the arms.

The defendants maintained the first attack with great bravery, and put the Romans to a stand; but being overborne, in the end, by the force of numbers, they all fled, and betook themselves to the highest parts of the city, with the Romans all this time at their backs.

But the Jews, finding themselves pressed, turned short upon their pursuers, drove them down precipices before them, and through difficult passages, where they did execution upon them at pleasure. The Romans, finding the disadvantage of contending with enemies over their heads, betook themselves, for sanctuary, to some of the houses below; but being crowded so full, they sunk under the weight, so that the fall of one brought down another, and that a third. Many of the Romans perished under the ruins; and yet, in this extremity, they chose rather to commit themselves to the hazard of those tottering houses, than be openly exposed for a public mark. Some were crushed to pieces with the timbers, others maimed in attempting to escape, and some again were suffocated with the dust.

The Jews were so far from being troubled at the loss of their habitations, that they esteemed themselves gainers by the fall of so many of their enemies in exchange, and as one house failed, pressed them into another, in order to bring down that. Those who lost their hold were sure to be taken off by weapons from above, with which the very walls and dead bodies furnished them in abundance; the one with stones, and the other with arrows: the swords of those that were slain were used to dispatch the rest, and every thing contributed to the common fate. Some cast themselves down headlong from the tops of the houses, to avoid being squeezed to death in the fall of them; and some few had the good fortune to escape out of the town, and avoid the general destruction.

Vespasian was deeply affected to find his army thus broken by the ruins of a vanquished city; so that, fearless of personal danger, according to his common practice, he slipped away privately to a post at the upper part of the town, where he was left, with some resolute men about him, in the greatest distress; his son Titus being abroad, at this time, in Syria, upon a commission to Mutianus. Such was his condition, that he could not retreat with safety or honour; so that calling to mind former gallant exploits, and resolving to persevere in the path to fame, a very extraordinary expedient occurred to his mind. This was to plant himself, with the few valiant remains he had, as close to each other as possible, and covering themselves with their arms, stand firm against all attempts of violence from above. The Jews were so startled at this astonishing instance of resolution, that, deeming it a kind of providential impulse, and dreading the vengeance of opposing the higher power, they abated somewhat of the vigour and fury of the action. Vespasian, observing this, drew off by degrees, and never turned his back till he had got from the walls. There fell many Romans, both officers and private soldiers, in the encounter, and, among others, Ebutius, a decadarch, who, as he lived, so he died, exhibiting proofs of invincible magnanimity.

One Gallus, a centurion, being in a certain house with ten Syrian soldiers, and overhearing some measures intended to be taken with the Romans, which, as being themselves Syrians, they perfectly understood, fell upon them in the night, slew them all, and got off safe to the Romans.

Vespasian finding, at length, his soldiers cast down by a series of disasters, and not a little abashed from leaving their general alone to encounter the greatest difficulties and dangers, bethought himself of a method of affording them some degree of comfort, without relating the particulars that concerned himself, or dropping an hint by way of reproach. To this end he thus addressed them:

"Since, my fellow-soldiers, misfortunes cannot be avoided, let them be generously borne. It is not for any one sort of men to expect an exemption from the common lot of mankind. Who ever considers the nature of war, will find that victory is not to be gained without blood, that fortune is variable, and that this loss is but a reprisal for the thousands of Jews that we have slain before. As it is vanity and weakness to grow insolent upon prosperity, so it is a mark of as mean a soul to be cast down by adversity. Consider again, how insensibly the change passes from one extreme to the other, and that no man is truly great but he that stands his ground, and keeps up the same dignity of mind in all conditions, correcting the malignity of the one by the prudence of the other. We are not now to impute our present miscarriage either to the want of resolution on our parts, or to the valour of the Jews: for, if they fought better than usual, or we worse, the true reason was the odds of the ground we fought upon. If you were to blame for any thing in this encounter, it was, in truth, for your rashness, in pursuing the enemy when they fled up the town from you. You should have held your hands, and contented yourselves with the possession of the lower town, till necessity should have forced them down to engage you upon safer, surer, and more equal terms. But you were so impatient to have the thing done, that you never attended to the right way of doing it. The Romans are a people famous for order and discipline, and not for this impetuous and inconsiderate way of making war, like the Jews and Barbarians. Wherefore let us have recourse to our own methods of sobriety and resolution, and act like men that are rather animated with an indignation for what they have done amiss, than sinking under the burden of it. Every man hath this satisfaction in his own power, if he will but set his own hand to the work, and give himself the comfort of revenging the loss of his friends upon the heads of those that destroyed them. In this prospect and confidence you shall find me still, as you have done already, the first and the last in all dangers."

The army of Vespasian was greatly animated by this spirited address, and resumed their former courage and resolution.

The people of Gamala could not but be elated by a series of such unexpected success for a short time; but afterwards reflecting that they had no hopes of any terms of accommodation, no possibility of escaping, or procuring a supply of provisions, their spirits were depressed, and they were seized with the horrors of despair. They persisted, however, in the exertion of their utmost efforts for the defence of the place, setting their best men to guard the breaches, and disposing of the rest to the greatest advantage.

The Romans, by this time, having repaired their platforms, and made ready for another attack, divers of the citizens stole away through occult and intricate passages, where no guards were posted. Others concealed themselves in subterraneous caverns, where they perished for want of food, as the provisions were wholly reserved for such as bore arms. These were the distresses with which the people of Gamala had to encounter.

Vespasian sends Placidus against a seditious party that had taken possession of mount Tabor. He draws them some distance from the mountain into the plain, and there subdues them.

WHILE Vespasian was so harrassed by this vexatious siege, he was under a necessity, in the midst of his confusions, of sending out Placidus, with a party of six hundred horse, to mount Tabor, to disperse a seditious multitude that were assembled there. This mountain lies betwixt the great plain and Scythopolis. The ascent is supposed to be thirty furlongs. It is inaccessible on the northern part. The top is a plain of twenty furlongs, and encompassed with a wall, which, tho' extensive, had been erected by Josephus in the space of forty days. He furnished it with water and other necessaries from below, for the inhabitants had only rain water for their use.

When Placidus, upon his arrival at the place, according to order, found it impossible to ascend the mountain, he amused the leaders of the faction with hopes of peace and pardon, and brought numbers of them down to him upon a pretence that they were wrought upon by the reason of his address; though, in reality, their design was to draw him into a snare, and surprize him. Placidus had also a design upon them: his plan was to get them into the plain, and seize them unawares. They feigned compliance with what he proposed; but the scheme of Placidus succeeded in the result. When the Jews began the fray, Placidus and his men, as if intimidated, betook themselves to flight. The Jews pursued them, till, in the pursuit, they were dispersed throughout the field. Placidus watched his opportunity, and turning quickly upon them with his horsemen, slew several, and put the rest to flight; nor did one of them return to the mountain. Those of the faction who were left at Tabor, now quitted it, and hastened to Jerusalem; but the natives surrendered themselves and the place to Placidus, upon security for their good behaviour.

Destruction of Gamala. The inhabitants are thrown into a consternation by the fall of a tower. Titus enters the town without opposition. A terrible slaughter of the inhabitants.

THE bravest of the people of Gamala had now recourse to flight or concealment, while the more pusillanimous and inferior perished by famine. But the resolute in arms sustained the siege till the twenty-second day of the month Hyperberetæus, when three soldiers, of the fifteenth legion, stole out before break of day, to the foot of the highest tower upon their quarter, and undermined it so privately, as to elude the vigilance of the guards. They made not the least noise, but having rolled away five of its principal stones, retired that very instant. The turret immediately fell to the ground with a most dreadful noise, dashing the guards, and all that were in it, under the ruins. The horror of this accident frightened the other guards from their posts, and some of them fell into the very teeth of the Romans. Amongst these was one Joseph, who was slain by a dart as he was running away over that part of the wall that was broken down. Such was the terror that prevailed in the city, that it excited as universal a panic as if the whole Roman army had entered the town. Chares was at that time much indisposed, and it was believed that this stroke hastened his end. But the Romans were so impressed with a remembrance of their former ill success, that they postponed any farther attempt till the following day.

Titus was by this time returned, and, from indignation at the disasters which had befallen the Romans in his absence, drew out a body of foot, and two hundred chosen horse, and entered the city without opposition. The watch were the first that took and gave the alarm, and the news was spread throughout in an instant. It was no sooner confirmed, than the citizens, in the utmost confusion, took their wives and children, and fled to the citadel, amidst horrid outcries and lamentations. Some were cut off by the Roman soldiers; others, that could not get into the citadel, and straggled about, fell into the hands of the guards. Death, in fine, prevailed in all its forms of wounds and groans, and horror had diffused itself throughout every quarter.

Titus enters Gamala.

Vespasian then drew up his whole army to attack the castle. It stood upon the point of a rock, high and steep, and almost inaccessible, with many crags and precipices round about it. Upon this disadvantage, it was impossible for the Romans to avoid the stones and darts of the Jews that were cast down from above, or to reach the Jews from below. Through a wonderful providence, however, in favour of the Romans, and for the destruction of the Jews, there arose a violent storm, which drove the Roman arrows directly in the faces of the defendants, and kept theirs from the Romans, or diverted them away from them. The blast, at the same time, was so strong, that the besieged could not maintain the ground on which they were to make their defence, nor see the people with whom they had to engage. The Romans, with these advantages, made themselves masters of the mountain, which they surrounded immediately, and, in a rage of revenge for their former miscarriage upon that attack, put all to the sword indiscriminately, whether they resisted or not. In this state of desperation many cast themselves, with their wives and children, down the precipice from the castle. They were supposed to amount to the number of five thousand, of whom four thousand were thus slain: so much more merciful were the Romans to the Jews, than the Jews were to themselves. The very infants were thrown down the rocks, without sparing so much as a single creature, two women only excepted, who were the daughters of Philip, a man of rank, and formerly a general in the army of Agrippa. These two sisters were not, indeed, so much beholden to the clemency of the Romans for their preservation, as to the good fortune of laying undiscovered till their rage, in some degree, subsided. The rebellion at Gamala began on the twenty-fourth day of the month Gorpæus, and the place was destroyed on the twenty-third of the month Hyperberetæus.

C H A P. IV.

The people of Gischala are seduced by a seditious impostor to revolt from the Romans. Vespasian sends Titus against them, intending himself to attack Jerusalem. The generosity of Titus towards the people of Gischala. John of Gischala seemingly accepts the conditions, and makes his escape in the night. The inhabitants are in great distress. Titus is received into Gischala, which puts an end to the conquest of Galilee.

THE province of Galilee was now wholly reduced, except the small city of Gischala, where the people, in general, were disposed to pacific obedience;

ence; being mostly employed in the pursuit of agriculture, and consequently dependent on the produce of their lands. They were intermixed, however, with a band of libertines, who lived upon pillage; and there were some citizens of the first rank tainted with seditious principles. The chief leader of the faction, and perverter of the people, was one John, a man of dissolute morals, a vile impostor, versed in the arts of fraud and chicanery, destitute of honour and conscience, and a promoter of sedition from sinister views. He was the son of one Levi, and the head of the rabble in Gischala. Had he not interfered, the people would probably have sent their deputies to the Romans, with proposals of an alliance; but, at his instigation, they were prevailed upon to put it off, till a war should be brought on.

John, the son of Levi, instigates the people of Gischala to revolt from the Romans.

Vespasian, upon this juncture, sent away Titus to Gischala, with a thousand horse, and the tenth legion to Scythopolis, returning himself, with the other two legions, to Cæsarea for refreshment, in order to prepare their bodies and minds for the difficulties they had yet to encounter. He foresaw that the subjection of the inhabitants of Jerusalem would be an arduous task, not only as it was populous and powerful, and the capital city, but as it was an asylum to all the fugitives of faction from other quarters, a nursery of bold and daring men, naturally strong, as well as fortified by art, though not impregnable in point of situation. The Roman general revolving these circumstances in his mind, trained his soldiers like champions in the exercise of their arms, to render them the more expert when called into action.

Generosity and clemency of Titus.

Titus, as he rode up to Gischala, finding, from the view he had, that it was not a place to stand an assault, and reflecting at the same time that the soldiers would undoubtedly treat the inhabitants of that city as they had done those of Gamala, confounding the innocent with the guilty, if ever they should take it by storm, from a motive of compassion for the people, and the detestation in which he held those inhuman cruelties, bethought himself how he might gain upon them by treaty. The walls being now covered with soldiers, and the majority within the town of the corrupted party, he thus addressed them in an audible tone of voice:

Exhortation of Titus to the people of Gischala.

"It is wonderful to me, that, when all the rest of your towns are gone, and places, much better manned and fortified than yours, taken without any difficulty, (many of them at the very first attack,) you should be now so inconsiderate as to think of standing out; especially when you may yet be safe, easy, free, and happy, upon a return to your duty. This, I dare undertake, shall be made good to you; and all your insults pardoned, passed over, and imputed only to an inordinate desire of liberty. But if you do not know when you are well offered, and refuse to cast yourselves upon the faith and honour of the Romans; if you resolve, at last, to run head-long to your certain destruction, and to contend with impossibilities, you must expect to feel the weight of the Roman power and displeasure; and you will find, before you are aware, that your paper walls will fall like dirt before their engines: so that this is the way to shew yourselves to be the most arrogant slaves of all the Galileans."

Not one of the populace durst make a reply, or even come up to the wall; for the faction overruled, and had posted guards at all the gates, that none of the rest should pass in or out, to propose any terms of submission. John, at length, took upon him to return for answer, in the name of the people, "That he accepted the conditions, and that the town should agree to them likewise, or he would force them to it: only he made him this request, with regard to the inviolable strictness of the Jewish law for the observance of their sabbath, which would no more suffer them to treat of peace, than to fight a battle, that he would indulge them that day; it being a case wherein either their complying, on the one hand, or, as the Romans knew very well, the enforcing them on the other, would be equally unwarrantable. Beside, there could be no danger in putting off the treaty to another day; for, if they imagined that any man would attempt to escape that night, it would be an easy matter, by placing guards at all the avenues, to prevent it: besides, the reputation he would get by shewing himself as tender of their laws as they were of their own, and of their consciences as well as of their persons, which was a favour beyond their expectation."

John had recourse to this manœuvre with Titus, not so much from a regard to the seventh day, as to his own preservation; for he was apprehensive of being deserted, if the city should be taken; and all his hopes centered in making his escape that night. But the preservation, if eventually, tended to the destruction of Jerusalem, as it was the occasion not only of the truce, but likewise of the encampment of Titus, farther off the city, at Cydæstia, one of the strongest and most populous places in Tyria, and mortally averse to the Galileans.

The night being now come, and the town unguarded, John seized the opportunity, and made his escape to Jerusalem; taking with him not only his military people, but several substantial inhabitants of the town. The old men, women, and children, that had left the place at his instigation, with difficulty kept up with their leader for the first twenty furlongs; but finding themselves spent, and not able to continue the march, they betook themselves to lamentation, for those that had outstript them, and gone before; as the farther their friends were advanced from them one way, the nearer they accounted themselves to their enemies the other. Nay, they fancied the very noise of their own feet to be the tread of their adversaries, and still looking behind them, took their own people for their pursuers. In this imaginary fright they fell one over another; and the way was covered with the bodies of women and children, that were crushed to death by the crowd pressing who should get foremost. There was little more to be heard than the cries of miserable wretches to their husbands and friends to stay for them. But John's exhortations to save themselves by flight prevailed. He observed, that if the Romans should seize upon those whom they left behind, they would be revenged on them for it. The multitude upon this dispersed themselves, and every one made the best of his way.

When Titus came to the walls of the town to execute the treaty, he found the gates open, and the inhabitants ready, with acclamations, to receive and acknowledge him as their benefactor and preserver. They informed him of John's escape; entreated clemency for the innocent, and justice upon those left in the town, that should be found to have been abettors of the revolt. Titus sent out a part of horse in pursuit of John, but they could not overtake him before he got into Jerusalem. They slew, however, near two thousand of his party, and brought back near three thousand women and children, whom they found wandering up and down.

Titus was highly displeased at the escape of the impostor, which prevented his being brought to exemplary punishment: but then setting the advantages of the prisoners, the slain, and the taking of the town, against the disappointment of missing the single person of such a miscreant, he ballanced the one with the other, and entered the place with a friendly disposition towards the people. He took possession of it in form, by the ceremony of his soldiers breaking off a piece of the wall; and reduced the authors of the sedition rather by menaces than actual punishment. Titus wisely and humanely thought, that, in a case where so many family feuds, personal piques, and inordinate passions were concerned, it might be dangerous to inflict punishments, as a common rule of distinction between the good and bad, for fear of injuring the innocent, while doing justice to the guilty.

Upon

Upon this deliberation, he thought it more honourable and humane, rather to spare the lives of some criminals, than run the risk of destroying some innocents; there being no place left for remedy and atonement in the latter; whereas, in the other case, there might be hope of amendment, whether from fear of punishment, sense of shame, or an impulse of virtue. Upon conclusion, however, he placed a garrison in the town, partly to restrain turbulent spirits, and partly for the security of those who were disposed for peace. This action finished the conquest of Galilee, at the expence of much labour and blood.

John of Gischala imposes upon the multitude at Jerusalem with a false story. Inflames them to prosecute the war. Great confusion amongst the Jews. Outrages of robbers and incendiaries. The faction create and depose high-priests at pleasure. The multitude oppose them at the instance of Ananus, the high-priest. The faction withdraw to the temple. Gorion and Simeon, leaders of the seditious party. Jesus and Ananus, men of respectable character. Ananus states the case in an address to the people. An encounter in the temple. Character and history of John of Gischala.

UPON John's entry into Jerusalem with his party, the whole body of the people were in an uproar, and vast throngs gathered about them, to enquire concerning the state of affairs abroad. John and his companions had been so expeditious in their flight, as to indicate apparent tokens of want of breath: nevertheless, they endeavoured to support their pretences, by insinuating, that they had not fled from the Romans, but were come spontaneously to find out some spot for the encounter, where they might engage upon equal terms; alledging, that it would be unreasonable to expose themselves to desperate hazards for the defence of Gischala, and other places of little importance, when the metropolis itself was at stake, and every man obliged, in duty and honour, to exert his utmost efforts to defend it.

But, notwithstanding the plausible manner in which they related the capture of Gischala, and their own departure from that place, many of the people saw through the disguise, and considered that honourable retreat, as it was termed, as little less than an absolute flight.

The discovery, and story of the prisoners the Romans had taken, struck the people with as much terror, as if the ruin of Gischala had been the prelude to the destruction of Jerusalem. But John, regardless of the miserable condition of those he had left behind him, went amongst the multitude, animating them to the prosecution of the war, by affirming, that the power of the Romans was much decreased, and that of the party resolved to oppose it much enlarged; so that by these means of chicane and imposture, he wrought upon a credulous rabble. He farther insinuated the impossibility of the Romans taking Jerusalem, even if they had wings, from their finding so much difficulty, after so many of their projects were counteracted, in subduing some incon siderable places in Galilee. These pompous harangues had the desired effect upon the rash and inexperienced; but men of sober reason foresaw impending ruin.

Such was the confused state of things in Jerusalem at that time; but the country led the way to the sedition that followed afterwards in the city: for Titus being gone from Gischala to Cæsarea, Vespasian went also from Cæsarea to Jamnia and Azotus, and subdued them both, settled garrisons in them, and so returned, bringing up a vast multitude of people along with him, that were now entered into a league with the Romans. The cities were infested with tumults and intestine broils, and no sooner at peace with the Romans, than contention prevailed amongst themselves, and particularly between those of a warlike and those of pacific turns. The quarrel began in private families, which had been long adversaries upon the score of hereditary feuds. It thence passed into divided multitudes, and those who had been friends became enemies. It terminated in matter of faction and opinion, where men of the same mind formed an opposition of party to party, and so incorporated in a rebellion. Sedition and faction, in fine, universally prevailed; the young, rash, and active being bent upon arms and innovations, and the more grave and prudent disposed to moderation and candour; but the former overpowered the latter.

A general licentiousness now broke through all restraint, and a right to pillage was assumed, without any regard to law or conscience. Bands and parties were formed, who committed the most barefaced outrages and depredations, in the practice of which the Jews did themselves as much injury as they could the Romans: besides, the calamity would have been much more tolerable from an enemy than from their own countrymen.

The garrisons placed to guard the cities, consulting their own ease on the one hand, and being mortally averse to the people on the other, would not exert themselves in their protection or defence, till, in the end, some of the leaders of the faction entered Jerusalem with a great body they had raised in different parts. The city being under no rule or government, they met with no opposition: besides, according to ancient custom, the gates were open to all Jews, without exception, and at this time more especially, when they took all people that entered them as friends and assistants against the common enemy. This liberty, or rather licentiousness, eventually proved the ruin of the city, when infinite numbers of idlers and runnagates devoured the necessary provisions that were laid up for the soldiers who had the guard of the place. By these means the miseries of sedition and famine were added to the calamities of war.

There came, at the same time, another band of robbers out of the country, who joining themselves with those they found in the town, omitted no instance of insolence, rapine, and barbarity. To robbery they added the heinous crime of murder; not privately, or in the dark, or upon common persons, but in the face of the sun, and upon the most considerable men in the city. They began with the imprisoning of Antipas, a person of the blood royal, and of such credit and authority, that he was entrusted with the charge of the treasury. They treated Levias afterwards, and Sophas, the son of Raguel, with divers other persons of rank, with the same indignity.

Nor did these profligate wretches stop here, but finding their prisoners to be men of power, interest, and credit, and apprehending danger from keeping them longer in custody, either of rescue or revenge from their friends, or a popular tumult from so desperate a provocation, they proceeded to a formal sentence of death upon them, and employed a blood-thirsty hireling of their own band, (one John, the son of Dorcas,) with a train of ten bravoes, to execute the sentence. As a colour to this execrable villainy, they gave it out that these persons were in a conspiracy to deliver up the city to the Romans, and boasted the merit of a public service, in doing so necessary an act of justice upon the betrayers of the liberty of their country.

The faction now became so daring and arrogant, and the spirit of the people so depressed, that they assumed to themselves the right of disposing of the pontificate, and accordingly took that office out of the right line, abrogated the succession, and advanced creatures of their own, without dignity or virtue to produce as a title. By a choice of ministers like themselves, they subverted all government; for the wicked instruments of wicked masters are alike diabolical and pernicious to society.

Address of Ananus to the multitude.

Artificial calumnies, and feigned stories, were propagated, to create misunderstandings amongst those who had it in their power to frustrate their designs, and take advantage of the disagreements, till, in the end, having glutted themselves with indignities and cruelties towards men, they carried their impieties against God himself, against his laws and holy sanctuary. But, upon this daring attempt, the people, at the instigation of Ananus, the high-priest, made head against them. Ananus was a person no less venerable for his years, piety, and wisdom, than his general character, and might probably have preserved the city, if he could have escaped the hands of those who conspired against him.

The faction took sanctuary in the temple, as a place of defence against the resentment of the multitude, as well as the seat of their tyranny and usurpation. But the most sensible part of the calamity was the contemptuous mockery that attended it, in the wanton experiment of their own power, and the pusillanimous despondency of the people. For instance, they undertook to dispose of the pontificate by lot, according to precedent, as they pretended; whereas the sacerdotal function was originally a family privilege, and descended in a line by succession. This practice was no better than the abrogation of a positive law, to get the power into their own hands; but they were taken in their own snare; for, upon summoning one of the sacerdotal tribes, called Eniachim, in order to make choice, the lot fell upon a person that fully discovered the iniquity and corruption of the proceeding. His name was Phanes, the son of Samuel, of the village Aphthas, a man brutishly stupid, and not only unworthy of the high-priesthood, but wholly ignorant of the nature and duties of that sacred function. They compelled him, however, to relinquish his rustic concerns, and dressing him up in his pontifical robes, gave him his lesson how he was to behave, and exhibited him as a buffoon on the mimic stage. This horrid prophanation greatly affected the other priests, inasmuch that they could not refrain from tears, to see their holy laws trampled upon, and their profession and worship so impiously ridiculed. The people were at length so enraged with the sense of this oppression, that they had no longer patience to endure it, but zealously joined as one man to depose the tyrant, and cast off the yoke. Those who principally encouraged them in this necessary opposition, were Gorion, the son of Joseph, and Simeon, the son of Gamaliel, who inculcated the doctrine of liberty, and exhorted them, one and all, to stand up for the vindication of their religion and laws, against their prophane and sacrilegious enemies.

There was also Jesus, the son of Gamala, and Ananus, the son of Ananus, two priests eminent for their piety and virtue, who laboured unweariedly in frequent discourses to their disciples, to excite their detestation of the principles and practices of the zealots. They had assumed the denomination of zealots, from an hypocritical ostentation of holiness; though, in their lives and practices, they were the most abandoned and dissolute of men. The people being now assembled, were inflamed to a degree of indignation bordering on phrenzy, to see the havock these miscreants made in their holy places, and the murder and rapine they had committed without controul.

But, notwithstanding this passionate zeal, they did not attempt to oppose them in their impious proceedings, not thinking themselves able to encounter the zealots by force of arms, as, indeed, they were not; till, at length, Ananus, standing in the midst of them, and casting his eyes, deluged with tears, towards the temple, thus addressed them:

"Why did I not rather die than live, to see the house of God thus polluted and prophaned, and the wickedest of men admitted promiscuously into those sacred places of privilege that were only reserved for the high-priests? Why do I live and see all this? in my sacerdotal robes too, and with the venerable name of the great God written on my forehead? Why do I live any longer, after so

"glorious an opportunity now in my age of ending my days with honour? What have I more to do, in fine, under my circumstances, but to fall alone, and give up my life to my God and my duty? Why should any man desire to live in an inflexible generation, and among people that have neither the prudence to foresee calamities, or the courage to resist them? You stand still to see yourselves robbed, beaten, and abused, and your friends and companions murdered before your faces, without so much as one look, word, or action of tenderness or compassion that you dare own. A shameful and an insupportable tyranny! But why do I talk of the actors of the tyranny, and not rather of those that suffer it, and that trained up the tyrants themselves to the power of exercising what they now practise? Why did you not crush them when you might have done it? when they were but few, weak, and inconsiderable? It was your patience, and nothing else, that made these people your masters. When you should have turned your arms against your enemies, you must be cutting throats among yourselves. You should have called them to an account betimes, for the outrages they put upon your brethren. You should have considered that the sufferance of one affront naturally draws on and encourages another, as appeared in what followed. For when they found that they might commit all manner of insolence without controul, they advanced a step farther, and put several of the best men of the city in chains, (who were effectually betrayed by your tameness,) and dragged them to prison, not only unheard, and without a sentence, but without so much as an accusation; and all this was done without one creature appearing in their favour. After the loss of their estates and liberties, there remained nothing more to be taken away but their lives: and that was done too, and their throats cut, like so many beasts drawn out of the herd for sacrifices, before our very faces; and not a mouth opened, or an hand lifted up, in their defence. After all these sufferings, one after another, can you have the patience now to see your holy altars prophaned, and your religion exposed to scorn, without shewing some resentment worthy of your profession? What is it that you are afraid of, at last, but monsters of your own creating, and the professed enemies of all that is good and holy? If they stop here, it is not for want of good-will to be yet more and more wicked, but for want of fresh matter to work upon; for it is impossible for them to outdo the ill things they have done already. They are possessed, you see, of the strongest place of the city; and that which you call the temple serves them only for an impregnable castle, maintained against you. Considering now the strength of the place, and your enemies the masters of it, (as that you see is the case,) what is it that you propose to yourselves? Or what do you imagine will be the end of these things? unless you fancy that the Romans will espouse the cause of your religion and ceremonies: and, in truth, such is the misery of our present condition, that our very enemies cannot but pity us. If so many beasts were in your places, hunted, assaulted, and wounded, as you yourselves are, they would have the spirit to turn again upon their pursuers, and to revenge themselves upon their enemies; while you, at the same time, suffer all tamely, without so much as the sense or apprehension of the brutes. But will you bear this always? and sink in infamy, under the affronts, publick and private, that have been put upon you, without avenging yourselves? This abject patience looks as if you had no longer any sense of the most natural and powerful of human affections, the desire of liberty; but as if you had taken up, on the contrary, the love of slavery, instead of it; a temper which I am sure you never inherited from your ancestors: witness the many dangerous wars they underwent against the Medes and Egyptians, to assert their freedom. But what need of looking back for precedents, when the very war we are now engaged in against the Romans (whether it succeed well or ill) is advanced

"vanced evidently upon the same foot? And shall we now, that dispute our liberties with the masters of the whole world, crouch, like slaves, to our own countrymen? To be overcome by strangers is the chance of war, and may be imputed, without loss of honour, to the iniquity of fortune; but for people to give themselves up in subjection to their own brethren and countrymen, and to the very worst of them too, betrays a sordid servility of spirit, and a soul prepared for bondage.

"With respect to the Romans, make it the case that we were all actually now their prisoners, (which heaven forbid!) whether would our condition, in probability, be better or worse than it is now? For what misery could an enemy inflict upon us that we have not suffered already? Can any man stand a spectator to look upon the Jews, and see them robbing the temple of the oblations and donations that the Romans have bestowed upon it? Defacing the most glorious city under the sun; and dipping their hands in the blood of those heroes, which the Romans themselves, in the very triumph of their victories, would have had a veneration for? Can any man see all this, without tears in his eyes, and a bleeding heart? Whereas the Romans, on the other side, make a conscience of passing the bounds of sacred and prophane, and of breaking in upon the solemnities of holy customs, or but so much as casting a look, unless with reverence, and at a distance, toward the sacred enclosure, we have a sort of people among ourselves, trained up after our way too, and calling themselves Jews, that make no more scruple of walking in the temple than in a common place, and that while their hands are yet reeking with the blood of their fellow-citizens. Shall any man, after this, stand in dread of a foreign war, compared with such a domestic one? The enemy is, in truth, (to call things by their right names,) the greater friend of the two; for while the Romans shew themselves the preservers of our laws, our pretended friends destroy them. Certain it is that these tyrants have betrayed your liberties, and that no punishment can be equal to their crimes. I tell you no more in this, than what you all knew before I opened my mouth; and you need no other instigation against these men, than the sense of your own sufferings. But you are afraid of their numbers, perhaps, the daring boldness of these men, and the advantageous post they are now possessed of. What was it, I beseech you, but your want of resolution, that raised them up to this, and made them so considerable? You have no way left you now but a speedy, a generous, and a joint association among yourselves, to bring them down again; for delay gives time to settle, opportunity to increase, and heart to gather courage. The whole faction will flow in the party, which will make them numerous. They have nothing to fear where they meet with no opposition, and that makes them bold; and so for deferring the attempt, the longer it is put off, the more time they have to fortify and entrench. It is but one bold push, to shew that you are in earnest, to bring down their insolence; and you will find that, betwixt the terrors of a guilty conscience, and the infamy of base actions, they will have little joy of their station. Who knows but these impious wretches may be cut off by the just judgment of a righteous God, as a vengeance upon them for their contempt of his Divine Majesty? and that the very weapons they launch at us may, by a providential miracle, be turned against their own hearts; so that they shall not be able to stand the very sight of us, but with confusion. Or, to put matters at the worst, if we should fall every man of us in the contest, could any thing be more glorious than to lay down our lives, at the gates of the temple, for the honour of God, and in the service of his holy house and cause? As to the conduct of the enterprise, you shall have my heart, hand, example, and advice along with you."

This spirited address of Ananus encouraged the multitude to persevere in their resolution against the zealots; but being fully informed of their numbers, their choice of men, and their courage, together with the circumstances of the place, and the posture they were in, and finally their despair of pardon, in case they should be overcome, he was not too sanguine in his expectation of immediate advantage from the measures that were taken. He was determined, however, to run all hazards, rather than abandon his country in this distress; while the people expressed the most importunate desire that he would lead them on against these miscreants, in defiance of every danger they could possibly encounter.

The address of Ananus encourages the people to oppose the zealots.

Ananus, finding the multitude thus bravely resolute, selected the best men he could find, and ranged them in the best order the time would permit. The zealots, receiving intelligence from their spies of his motions and designs, advanced immediately towards him, first in small parties, then in large bodies, slaying all before them. Ananus collected his men with great expedition, and in point of numbers exceeded the others; but the zealots had the advantage of being better armed. But the alacrity from each party seemed to supply all other defects. The rage and indignation of the citizens increased their ardour in opposing the progress of the zealots; and the zealots, on the other hand, were inflamed by their resolution against the multitude. The inhabitants were assured they could not be safe, unless they cleared the city of the faction; and it was certain death to the faction if they came not off victorious.

Thus disposed, both parties engaged, and a skirmish began, not far from the temple, by casting stones, and throwing javelins, at a distance. Those that fled were cut off by the swords of their enemies, so that many fell on both sides. When any of the inhabitants happened to be wounded, they were carried off by their friends to their own houses; but the zealots were conveyed up to the temple, which holy place they polluted with their blood. The faction, however, in all their sallies and encounters, obtained the advantage.

A skirmish ensues.

The populace now became more numerous, and lost all patience with the fugitives for not standing their ground, insomuch that, closing up the way behind them in their flight, they turned them back again upon the enemy; so that they were forced to cut out their way forward in their own defence. By these means they were brought every man to the combat, and the faction not being able to stand the shock of the whole body, gave way by degrees towards the temple, when Ananus and his party fell into it at the same time together with them. When he had driven the faction before him out of the first court, they got into the second enclosure, hastily shutting the gates upon their pursuers. Ananus had too great a reverence for the holy place, to use any sort of violence for the forcing of his passage, though the enemy did all that was possible to be done, by darts and lances from above, to provoke him to it. But such was the conscience the high-priest made of polluting the holy temple with the mixture of an unpurified multitude, that, if he might have gained the main cause by such a dispensation, he would not have admitted it. All that he did at present was, to order a standing guard, of six thousand chosen men, upon the frontiers of the temple, and a succession of the same number to do duty, and be relieved. The first men of the city were not exempt from their part in this service; only they were permitted, when it fell to their lot, to have a substitute to watch in their stead.

Ananus forces his way into the temple.

His religious scruples.

He appoints a standing guard.

The popular party now carried all before them but John of Gischala, the fugitive, disconcerted their measures, and counteracted their designs. He was a subtle miscreant, ambitious to a degree, an inveterate enemy, and perfidious traitor to the public. To subserve his flagitious purposes, he assumed the mask of a patriot, statively attended the councils of Ananus in the day-time, and went round the guards at night. But the traitor divulged their secrets to the zealots; and every thing deliberated upon was, by his means, known to their enemies even before it had been well agreed upon amongst themselves. In order to evade suspicion, he cultivated, with assiduity, the greatest friendship with Ananus and the people; was most officiously respectful in his behaviour to the high-priest, and, in short, to every man of rank and power.

But his flattery was so gross, and his officiousness and assiduities were so palpably deceptive, that they naturally raised suspicions and jealousies, which were not a little augmented by his constant attendance on councils, without summons or invitation. It was evident, from divers circumstances, that their enemies were apprized of all resolutions taken against them at their consultations; nor was there any one whom they had so much reason to suspect of the discovery as this John. But he had played his part so artfully, and insinuated himself with such address into the good opinion of several great men, that it was deemed impossible to remove him from his post; so that they could think of no better expedient of putting him to the test, than administering to him an oath of faith and secrecy to keep their counsels, and serve them against the faction to the uttermost of his power.

He most readily took the oath; and Ananus and his party seemed as readily to believe him sincere; as they not only admitted him into their consultations, but sent him on a commission to the zealots, with proposals of accommodation. They were chiefly induced to adopt such measures, by an earnest desire of avoiding the pollution of the temple with the blood of the Jews, and the blame they should consequently incur. This perfidious impostor availed himself of the trust reposed in him to perpetrate his base designs, and accordingly went to the zealots, and totally misrepresented the whole matter by intimating to them, most artfully and maliciously, in the following address, that the oath he had taken was a confirmation of his good will towards them.

John of Gischala's speech to the zealots.

"I have run (said he) all hazards for your sakes, in order to give you authentic information of the designs and practices of Ananus and his party against you. I am now to assure you, that neither you or I were ever in such great danger as at present, if some providential interposition does not avert it, as Ananus has prevailed with the people to send deputies to Vespasian, to desire him to come immediately and take possession of the city; having ordered the people to purify themselves the next day, to the end that, under the pretext of religion, they might, either by fair means or foul, get into the town. I do not find, under their circumstances, how they should be able to hold out against such a number of armed men; but, as it hath pleased the Divine will, I am deputed to bring you proposals of peace, which, in fact, is no other than a stratagem of Ananus to amuse you with a treaty, and fall upon you by surprise when you think yourselves most secure. You have now no other choice than to throw yourselves at the feet of the besiegers, or call in a foreign power to your rescue. If you are taken, the consciousness of what you have done must exclude you from all hope of mercy. Besides, criminals prove frequently worse for repentance. Consider again, what you are to expect from the friends and relations of those whom you have slain, and from a furious multitude, in the height of their rage, for the abrogation of their laws and customs. A single individual may have some sense of humanity and tenderness, but what will that avail against the violence of an irritated million?"

The faction are alarmed at this speech.

This artful speech alarmed the factious party: but John durst not name what foreign assistance he hinted at, though there was every reason to think it was that of the Idumæans. After this he took some of the leaders apart, and loaded Ananus with calumnies and reproaches, in order to inflame their resentment against him.

CHAP. VI.

The Idumæans, being sent for to the assistance of the zealots, repair to Jerusalem with a formidable army. Jesus, the high-priest, reasons the matter with them. Simon makes a reply to the particulars of his speech. The Idumæans resolve to make good the siege.

ELEAZAR, the son of Simon, and Zachary, the son of Phalek, were deemed two of the ablest men the zealots had in their counsel, and the best qualified for business, either in point of advice or execution; and they were both of the sacerdotal race. These persons taking it for granted, that, besides the general menaces, their lives in particular were threatened, and that Ananus and his party had called in the Romans to their assistance, as John had represented; imagining also, that they should fall a sacrifice to the fury of the multitude, and that no foreign succours could arrive in time to prevent the execution of the plot; they came at length to a resolution of applying to the Idumæans, and wrote them a letter upon the occasion to this effect:

"Finding that Ananus, having first seduced the people, hath designed the betraying Jerusalem to the Romans, we have retired into the temple in defence of the common liberty, where we are now besieged, and upon the very point of falling into the hands of Ananus, and the rest of our enemies, and the city itself into the hands of the Romans, without immediate relief." The bearers had charge to relate many other circumstances verbally to the principal of the Idumæans. The persons chosen for this commission were both called Ananias: they were active, good speakers, endowed with the faculty of persuasion, and (which was equal to all the rest upon this occasion) men of resolution and dispatch. They made no doubt of the ready compliance of the Idumæans, being a people fond of broils and changes, brutal and churlish, that needed no great pains to be wrought upon, as they go to war with as much alacrity and delight, as other people do to a banquet. Expedition was therefore the main business, and the messengers did their duty.

When they arrived at Idumæa, and delivered their letters and instructions to the governors, the people were no sooner informed of the particulars, than they caught the flame, and encouraged and provoked one another to take up arms, insomuch that they soon assembled in a body of 20,000 men, which was speedily raised, and dispatched to Jerusalem, under the command of John and James, the sons of Sofas, Simon, the son of Cathlas, and Phineas, the son of Clusoth.

Though Ananus knew nothing of the deputation to the zealots, he had intelligence of the Idumæan expedition, and ordered the gates to be shut, and the walls guarded, but no act of hostility to be committed, till he had tried the effect of reason and fair words towards composing the broil; so that Jesus, the first priest next Ananus, mounted a tower over against the Idumæans, and thus addressed them:

"Of all the calamities that ever befel this famous city, nothing amazes me more than to see fortune in a conspiracy with the most abandoned people in nature to destroy it. Who could ever have thought to have seen you joining with a band of miscreants against us, even more heartily than would have become you toward barbarians themselves, if Jerusalem had desired your aid? But if you are of the same mind with your superiors, this you have to say for yourselves, that a similitude of manners naturally begets an agreement of affections. This, however, cannot be the case betwixt you and them. For if you consider their lives and actions, you will not find one man of them that does not deserve a thousand deaths. As to their quality, they are the very scum of mankind: then for their manners, after their squandering away their fortunes in luxury and debauch, they proceeded to rapine and pillage; and stealing “stealing afterward into the city like thieves, they “advanced to sacrilege and bloodshed, even in the “holy temple itself; wallowing in drink at the very “altar, without either fear or shame; devouring the “spoils of those they have murdered, and profan“ing the sacred place with all manner of pollutions.

 “In the middle of this confusion, I find your people “here in as regular a formality of order and equi“page, as if your army had been brought in at the “request of a whole body of the city against a “foreign enemy. What shall I call this, but the “iniquity of fortune, to see your whole nation uni“ted in so infamous a confederacy against your own “brethren? I cannot but admire, I must confess, “the suddenness of your resolution, as well as the “thing itself. It must be some great matter, sure,
 “that could move you to take up arms for thieves “and vagabonds against your allies. But you have “a report among you, I perceive, of our calling in “the Romans, and betraying the city to them; and “upon that pretence you take upon you to set up “for asserters of the liberties of Jerusalem against “a foreign power. Though it was a gross and ma“licious calumny, it was yet pertinent enough to “the purpose of the inventors of it: for our ene“mies could never have gained their ends upon “men that value liberty at the rate that you do, and “would venture so far for the preserving of it, but “by possessing you with a rage against us, as the “base and unmanly betrayers of a blessing and pri“vilege that you have so great a veneration for.
 “But you will do well to consider who they are that “thus bely and traduce us, and then form a judg“ment upon the whole; not upon the credit of “plausible tales, but upon the force of clear truths
 “and convincing reason.

“How will it be consistent that we should dispute
 “our liberties thus long with the Romans, and just “now own them for our masters? How came it “that we fell off from them at first? Or how came “it that we did not go over to them again, before “our lands, towns, and villages were totally laid “waste and destroyed? Neither is this a time for a “treaty, if we had ever so great a mind to it; for “the conquest of Galilee hath made them too proud “to hearken to any conditions. And then to go “out suing to them for a peace as soon as they shew “themselves before our walls, would be an infamy “more insupportable than death itself. For my “own part, I am rather for peace than war; but, on “the other side, when the war is once begun and “inevitable, I am rather for a glorious death than “the life of a slave.

“But how stands the case, I beseech you, of our “sending to the Romans? Is it that the ring-leaders “have privately sent some particular persons out of “their own number or families? Or will you have “it to be a deputation as the common act of the “people? If this was done by a particular com“mission, why are we not told the names of the “commissioners? Are there any letters to be pro“duced in proof of this suggestion? Or hath any “man been taken up going or coming upon this “errand? How comes it that, among so many thou“sands of people as we daily converse with in the “city, not so much as one man ever heard of it?
 “And how comes it again, that this secret, that has “been managed with so much caution out of the “city, should be only known to a few persons that “are locked up in the temple, and not at liberty so “much as to stir out of the walls? Is is not a “strange thing too, that this treason should never be “heard of, till the reporters of it were in danger “themselves, and in dread of being called to an ac“count for their own crimes? Neither could it be “called the people's act, without passing the vote “of a general assembly, which would have made it “impossible to be kept so long a secret. Or to what “end should there be a deputation, when the thing “was resolved before hand, and no room left for a “treaty? Then, as before observed, they would “have done well to have named the commissioners.
 “But drowning men will catch hold of any thing;
 “and all this prevarication is only to save them“selves. If it must be the city's fate, at last, to fall “by treachery, none are so likely to bring it to that “end as our accusers themselves; for it is but ad“ding treason to blood, sacrilege, and the rest of “the impieties they are guilty of already, to fill up

 “the measure of their iniquities.

“But since you are here upon the place with us,
 “and in arms, what can you do better than to join “with us in the relief of the city, and in the rooting “out of these tyrannical monsters? Wretches that “have trod all our laws under foot, to make way “for tumult and violence; treated our governors “worse than bond-slaves, or common criminals, in “jails, chains, nay, and with death itself, though “ever so innocent, and, which is worse, without so “much as any pretence to the contrary; and with“out any place, at last, for prayers or intercessions in “favour of the miserable. This is no more than “what you may be eye-witnesses of yourselves, if “you will but enter the city as friends, and believe “your senses. There you will see the ransacking of “houses, and the whole town in mourning for their “massacred kindred and friends; your ears will be “shocked with cries and lamentations, and not one “creature to be found, upon the whole, but has his “part in this oppression. They have carried their “insolence to so extravagant a pitch, that, after the “barbarous robberies and outrages committed in “the country towns and villages, they have brought “the scene likewise into the mother-city itself, tho'
 “the head and glory of the nation; carrying the “outrage from thence also into the very temple “itself, which they have made the seat of the war.
 “From thence it is that they make their sallies, and “thither their retreats: there they keep their guards, “their stores, and their magazines. At this rate it “is, in fine, that these profligates (of our own “tribe and extraction too) profane, dishonour, and “trample upon God's holy habitation, and the “place that is venerable all over the world, save only “among our own people. They are never so deli“perate, but, in the depth of their despair, they “still take delight in forcing all things to extremi“ties, and in setting cities and nations against each “other, and all in a confusion of civil broils. The “most righteous and reasonable thing that you can “do (and that which would best become you) “would be, to go hand in hand with us, in deliver“ing the nation from these firebrands, and in taking “your revenge upon them for the imposture they “have put upon you, and for presuming to invite “you into their party for assistance; whereas they “should rather have dreaded the vengeance and “justice from you, that belongs to a common “enemy. If you take it to be matter of decency “and respect, to pay some sort of deference to their “requests, be but pleased to pass into the city as “friends: leave your arms at the gates, make your“selves neuter, give the cause a fair hearing, and be “yourselves the judges of the controversy. But for “those people that have so many notorious crimes “to answer for themselves, and particularly the “hurrying away of so many men of quality to “death, without so much as the forms of either “charge or defence; for these people, I say, to be “admitted to so impartial and easy a way of trial, “will be a condescension very extraordinary, and “it will become them to acknowledge the obliga“tion they have to you for the favour. But if you “will neither join with us in the equity of the cause,
 “or appear in the capacity of judges betwixt us, “withdraw from both parties, without either insult“ing over honest men in their affliction, or siding “with traitors and usurpers against your mother “city. Or, if you are not as yet thoroughly satisfied
 “of our innocence, as to any secret correspondence “with the Romans, send out your scouts and agents “to spy upon the passes and avenues; and whenever “you find one creature of us guilty of such a prac“tice, spare neither the actor or the party. That “will be the only proper time for you to stand up “for your metropolis: and there is no danger in the “mean time; for, as you are posted, it is not possi“ble for any enemy to interpose to your prejudice.
 “If this may work upon you, it is well; but if “otherwise,

"otherwise, you cannot think it reasonable for us
"to open our gates till you lay down your arms."

Notwithstanding this spirited and reasonable address of Jesus, the multitude continued much enraged, because they did not meet with a ready entrance into the city; and the generals looked upon the very mention of laying down their arms as the highest indignity that could be offered them. Simon, however, the son of Cathas, one of their principal officers, quieted the tumult they had raised, and standing upon an elevated place, so that the priests might hear him, spoke to the following effect:

Simon, an Idumæan general, replies to the speech of the Jewish priest.

"I do not wonder to see the defenders of our country's liberties shut up in the temple, when the very besiegers of those patriots have likewise shut up the city itself, which ought to be free and open to the whole nation; but at the same time ready enough, perhaps, to entertain the Romans with garlands and acclamations. It is enough for us, you think, to talk to us from your towers, advise us to lay down our arms, (though taken up in the common cause,) and not to trust our nearest friends with the guard of the city. But, instead of defending our capital, we are held in hand with proposals of being made judges of the matter in question; and, in the same instant, while you are laying a load upon others for destroying your fellow-citizens without any colour of law, you yourselves pronounce judgment at will and pleasure on the whole nation, and violently keep your own brethren out of a city that gives admittance, upon the account of piety and devotion, to all mankind beside. But is this your way then of acknowledging obligations? Do you call it an expedition against you, and a siding with your enemies, to make all the haste we could to your rescue? At the same rate are those in the temple your enemies; and you have just as much to say against us as against them. You have, at present, the very supporters of the commonwealth prisoners in the temple; and we are to be amused with a pretence, that the end of your keeping all the world out of the city, is to avoid their tyranny, when, in fact, the very tyranny you complain of yourselves practise. This is too gross to pass on any man who hath eyes to see. Keeping us out of the city is not all neither, for we are barred, by that exclusion, from the exercise and enjoyment of the religious rites and ceremonies of our profession. And it is the same case again with those who are besieged in the temple, for punishing certain traitors, whom you are pleased to honour with the title of honest men and persons of quality, for the credit of the confederacy. The only thing they were to blame for was, that they did not begin with you; that is to say, at the root of the conspiracy. But if they were over tender, it will concern us to act with more vigour, for the maintenance of the house of God, and of the rights of our country, as well within the city as without, and against all opposers. So that this siege we are resolved to make good, till either the Romans deliver you, or the consciousness of what you have done amiss bring you back to your duty."

C H A P. VII.

The Idumæans encamp under the city walls. A dreadful storm. Several opinions and forebodings upon it. The great concern of the zealots for the security of their friends. The Idumæans enter the city by night, and join the zealots. An inhuman massacre ensues. The priests Ananus and Jesus put to death.

THE Idumæans testified, by their acclamations, their approbation of the speech of their general; while Jesus, on the other hand, went away penfive and sorrowful, on finding the Idumæans opposed all moderate counsels, and that the city was besieged on both sides. Nor were the minds of the Idumæans at rest, being enraged at the affront offered them by their exclusion from the city, as well as at their disappointment with respect to the supposed strength of the zealots, together with the difficulties they had met with in their expedition. But the shame that would attend them, in case they returned without making any attempt, outweighed all other scruples, so that they lay all night before the wall, though in a very bad encampment. The following night there arose an horrible storm of wind and rain, accompanied with such peals of thunder, flashes of lightning, and dreadful earthquakes, as produced an universal consternation. The prodigies were deemed a manifest indication of some approaching destruction, as the system of the world appeared to be in general disorder.

The inhabitants and Idumæans were both under the same apprehension. Their opinion was, that the Almighty was displeased with them for taking arms, and that some vindictive judgment threatened them both, if they persisted in a war against the mother city.

But Ananus and his party looked upon it as a declaration from heaven in their favour; taking it for granted, that Providence would interpolate in their behalf, and give them a victory without a battle. But the event proved the fallacy of their conjecture; for that which they applied to the enemy, befell themselves in the conclusion. In this storm the Idumæans fenced one another by edging together as close as they could press, thereby keeping themselves warm, and connecting their shields over their heads, were not so much hurt by the rain. The zealots all this while were in more pain for the Idumæans than for themselves, and therefore entered into a consultation to devise means for assisting their friends. The more daring and resolute were for forcing the guards with their arms, and, after gaining that point, bursting open the gates, and making way for the Idumæans; as supposing the guards would be in disorder, and give way at such an unexpected attempt, especially as the greatest part of them were ill armed, and unskilled in military discipline. Besides, the multitude would not be easily assembled, as they were dispersed to their several habitations by the storm. They were determined, however, at all events, and in spite of every danger, to support and protect their friends and allies, who came so generously to their assistance.

But the more prudent part disapproved of this method, persuaded that the guards, at this critical time, were doubled, and that a stricter watch than ordinary was set upon the walls on account of the Idumæans. They also supposed that Ananus would be every where up and down at all hours, to keep the soldiers to their duty. This, indeed, was the case every other night but that, when Ananus went to refresh himself, not through slothfulness or inattention, but rather a kind of fatality to the ruin of himself and people; for the night being far spent, and the tempest increasing, Ananus permitted the guards at the temple gates to go to rest.

At this fatal instant it occurred to the zealots, that, if they could but destroy the bars of the gates, their design would be accomplished. Upon this they took certain instruments belonging to the temple, and cut them asunder; and it fell out fortunately for them, that, through the raging of the wind, and roaring of the thunder, the noise was not heard by the besiegers. They then went privately to the city gates next to the Idumæans, which they opened as they had done the former. The Idumæans at first apprehended that Ananus and his party were making a sally, so that every man made towards the palace sword in hand; but, on finding their mistake, they entered the city, and with such rage, that, if they had discharged it upon the people, they might have put the whole body to the sword. But, as their first concern was to deliver the zealots, their friends, out of custody in the temple, according to their earnest request, and it was pointed out to them how much easier they would find the enterprize, if they began with the guards, whereas, if the inhabitants took the alarm, they would gather in multitudes, and dispute every inch of the ground upon such such advantage, that they could never carry their point. The Idumæans were brought to coincide with them in opinion, and therefore made it their main business to pass directly through the city to the relief of their friends, who were prisoners in the temple, and waited their coming with great impatience.

They had no sooner entered, than the zealots came boldly out of the inner temple, and joined with them in an attack upon the guards. Some they killed in their sleep; but the multitude, alarmed by the outcry, arose, and, in great amazement and confusion, seized upon their arms, and stood in their own defence. Imagining, at first, that they were only a party of the zealots, they had no doubt of overpowering them by numbers, and therefore pressed on boldly; but when they found others advancing, and that the Idumæans had joined the zealots, the greater part dropped their arms with their courage, and lamented the horror of their situation. Some few, more brave and resolute than the rest, covered themselves with their armour, and valiantly encountered the Idumæans; but the major part ran up and down bewailing, in direful yell, the ruin of the city. Not a blow was struck, when it was generally known that the Idumæans were masters of the place. The streets rang with hideous outcries and doleful lamentations; the shrieks of the women were rendered more piercing by the shouts of the Idumæans and zealots, and the tempestuous violence of the winds and thunder. Such were the barbarity and fierceness of the Idumæans, aggravated by the thought of being shut out of the city, and exposed to the stress of weather, that they spared neither age or sex. Some of the distressed mortals pleaded religion, others kindred; but death stopped all mouths. There was neither place for flight, or hope of preservation; but as they were driven one upon another in heaps, so were they slain. Nay, the very fear of death contributed as much to the execution of it as the rage of the enemy. In this extremity of distraction some of them, to avoid one death, leaped headlong down a precipice into another. Rivers of blood flowed round the temple; and, by day-light, the place was strewed, upon computation, with 8500 dead bodies.

The rage of the Idumæans was not satiated by this horrid massacre, but afterwards turned upon the city, where they pillaged all the houses indifferently, and slew every one they met. The rabble they looked upon as below further notice, and chiefly wreaked their vengeance upon those of the sacerdotal order, which they did by taking off their heads without the least distinction, and then trampling on their bodies, deridingly upbraided Ananus with his popularity, and Jesus with his elaborate harangue upon the wall. They proceeded to that degree of impiety, as to forbid the rites of burial; though the Jewish laws, from a reverence to the dead, have provided for the taking down even of executed criminals from the very crosses, and burying them before sun-set.

I presume I shall not be found guilty of an error, if I date the destruction of this city from the death of Ananus, and affirm that Ananus and Jerusalem fell both on the same day; for, in the loss of this man, they lost the support of their government, and all hope of safety; and Jerusalem was, in fact, as much extinct as Ananus. Besides the dignity of his extraction and character, he was highly esteemed for his personal virtue and justice; and his humility was an ornament to all his good qualities. He was a zealous assertor of the cause of liberty, and ever preferred the public to private interest. His study and concern were to promote peace, well convinced of the insuperable power of the Romans, and that the only security of the Jews was to maintain a good understanding with them. To sum up the whole, if Ananus had survived, the Romans and Jews would have come to an agreement. He was a powerful orator, and endowed with the faculty of persuading his hearers in an eminent degree. He had already humbled those incendiaries called zealots; and the Jews, under such a leader, would have made a vigorous opposition to the power of the Romans.

He was so happy as to be aided in his counsels by Jesus, a person of very great abilities, though inferior to Ananus. But it seems to have been the Divine will to doom this city to destruction, and purge the sanctuary, as it were, by fire, for all the pollutions and abominations that had been committed in it. This was done by removing these two illustrious persons, who were the only means of preserving it. These who, a little before, were venerable for their sacred garments, the protectors of our holy religion, and the delight not only of their own people, but of all foreigners who had the honour to know them, were now wantonly exposed as a prey to dogs and wild beasts, to the astonishment and grief of all good men, who lamented to see virtue dejected, and vice triumphant.

CHAP. I.

Cruelty of the zealots and Idumæans. Zachariah falsely accused of treason. Makes an honourable defence, and is acquitted. Is afterwards murdered in the temple. The Idumæans discover the iniquitous practices of the zealots, discharge their prisoners, and leave the city. Gorion, and Niger of Peræa, put to death. Divine vengeance overtakes the tyrants.

Barbarities of the Idumæans and zealots.

AFTER the murders of Ananus and Jesus, the people, in general, were treated with the most horrid barbarities by the Idumæans and zealots, who carried devastations and slaughter every where before them. As to persons of rank, and those who were in the prime of life, they only kept them in custody, in hopes that, for the sparing of their lives, they might be brought over to their party; but they chose rather to die than join in a conspiracy with traitors against their native country. Death, however, might be accounted the least part of their misery, as it was brought on by the most exquisite torture: their bodies were torn and lacerated with scourges till they were covered with ulcers; and, when they could no longer sustain the torments, they had recourse to the sword for finishing the work. Those whom they caught in the day were crowded into prisons, and slain in the night; and then their dead bodies were carried out in order to make room for others. These horrid massacres excited such terror in the minds of the people, that they durst not affect sorrow, or perform funeral rites for their nearest relations: nay, they were even afraid to shed a tear in their own houses, without the utmost caution, lest any should be privy to it; for humanity was become so dangerous a crime, that it was death even to shew a tender regard for the memories of those who were departed. All they could do, was, now and then, in the night, to cast a little earth upon the body; though some few were so daring as to venture upon it in the day. There perished, in this manner, 12,000 persons of the first rank.

These inhuman monsters being almost surfeited with their barefaced cruelties, had the effrontery to set up fictitious tribunals, and constitute judicatures, under a pretended form of law and equity. The first who became amenable to this mock court was Zachariah, the son of Baruch, a man of the first rank, and a character eminent for piety and virtue. He was looked upon by the zealots as a man so dangerously popular, that, to ensure their own safety, it was necessary to remove him. Resolving, therefore, to take away his life, they put him upon his trial, and to that purpose convened seventy of the principal men amongst them, under the name of judges, but without even the semblance of juridical authority. This self-constituted court being met, the zealots exhibited a formal charge against Zachariah, of a design to betray Jerusalem to the Romans, and treating with Vespasian about it. There appeared not the least colour of a proof; nevertheless, they attempted to establish their affirmation as sufficient evidence. Zachariah, perceiving manifestly that his life was at stake, and that the whole design was fraudulent, in this state of despair, prepared for his defence with that serenity and freedom of mind which are the inseparable concomitants of conscious integrity.

He began with pointed reflections on the scandalous practices and frivolous pretences of his accusers, and proceeded to shew the evident calumnies and inconsistencies of their allegations, exposed the futility of their objections, and turned all their arguments against themselves, setting forth the whole course of their iniquities, and the dreadful consequences which had attended them. The noble and spirited conduct of Zachariah enraged the zealots to such a degree of malice, that they had certainly murdered him on the spot, if they had not been restrained by a necessary deference to their pretended court of judicature, and a design of making the experiment whether their new judges would venture their lives on so dangerous a point.

When it came to the issue, the whole court pronounced the prisoner innocent: nor was there one out-of the seventy judges, but chose rather to run the hazard of his own life, than take away that of so good a man, by a sentence repugnant to conscience and equity. This judgment of acquittal highly incensed the zealots, who censured the judges as idiots, in not comprehending the design of their appointment. Two of the most splenetic and daring fell outrageously upon Zachariah, and murdered him in the middle of the temple, and having insolently exclaimed, "Thou hast also our verdict, which will prove a more sure acquittal than the other," cast the body down a precipice into the valley. The lives of the judges were spared: their punishment was a sentence of infamy, to be beaten out of the temple with the backs of their swords. By this means they were dispersed up and down as so many eye-witnesses of the slavery of the capital city at that time.

By this time the Idumæans repented of their coming, and were disgusted at the horrid proceedings of the zealots. While they were conferring on the subject, they had secret intelligence sent them by one of the party, of the transactions and principles of the people that invited them, to the following effect:

"That they took up arms upon the credit of a report, that the high-priests were treating with the Romans for betraying of the city; however, upon further enquiry, they found nothing at all in it; but, on the contrary, the pretended assertors of our liberties were actually the subverters of them, and they themselves the tyrants that ought to have been timely suppressed. But (said the zealot) since it hath been your unhappy lot to join with them thus far in their iniquities, it will be time for you to break off to criminal an alliance with the professed enemies of your laws and country. You took it ill to be kept out of the town: and are you not sufficiently revenged upon those that excluded you, in the death of Ananus, and to many thousands of the citizens in one night? an action which many of your people will live to repent. I speak this only to shew you the barbarity of your confidants that had the effrontery to commit these shameless cruelties even before the face of their preservers, and by doing the basest things that ever were heard of in the sight of their allies, to transfer the infamy from the zealots to the Idumæans, who, in truth, should either have hindered them, or left them. Now, since it is as clear as the sun, that the whole story of the conspiracy is nothing but a calumny, and that there is no such thing in prospect as the dread of a Roman army, beside the impregnable strength of this city, if it were true to itself, since thus it is, what have you more to do than to return whence you came, and, by abandoning these monsters, expiate, in some degree, the ill things you did in their company? Wherein you are thus far excusable, that you were rather passive under a well meaning mistake, than voluntary actors at your own liberty and choice."

These persuasions wrought so effectually on the Idumæans, that they immediately set all the prisoners at liberty, being about two thousand, left the city, and returned home. Their unexpected departure greatly surprized both the inhabitants and the zealots on several accounts. The people, who knew the cause, took courage, from the consideration of being delivered from so many of their enemies. The zealots, on the other hand, became insolent upon it, in confidence of their own strength; and, from reflecting that the check was removed which kept them in some degree of awe of the Idumæans, they were now at liberty to pursue their own measures, without the least restraint or delay, they went on without deliberation or counsel, perpetrating whatever could be either iniquitous or cruel.

But their deadly rancour was levelled at men of honour and valour, whom they persecuted to the utmost extremity; those of rank from a principle of envy, those of resolution and virtue from a principle of fear; for they could never think themselves safe so long as any of that character was living. This was their motive for taking off Gorion, a man of birth and virtue, and a generous assertor of the cause of liberty. Niger of Peræa fell under the same disastrous fate. He was an officer who had displayed his courage against the Romans, and gloried in the wounds he had received in the service of his country as they dragged him along the streets. When they brought him out of the gates, and he despaired of life, he made them this request, that his body might be buried: but it was denied him; and they put him to death with this prophetic imprecation in his last breath, "that the Romans might come to avenge his blood: and Divine Justice overtake them with famine, sword, pestilence, and mortal divisions among themselves, in proportion to the enormity of their crimes."

Nor was it long before the Almighty, in righteous judgment, poured down all those plagues upon them, according to the good man's imprecation, beginning with their intestine broils. The removal of Niger so far dissipated their fears, that there was no part of the people but they found out some pretence to destroy. Some they put to death for pretended offences past. In other cases, where matter of fact could not be produced, bare jealousy or possibility was sufficient. If they made court to the faction, they were spies; if they kept off, it was construed into enmity and contempt; but, whether the pretended crime was great or small, the penalty was still the same, and none escaped that possessed either dignity or property.

CHAP. II.

Distracted state of the Jews. Vespasian deliberates about besieging Jerusalem. Many of the Jews desert from the zealots to the Romans. Tyranny and oppression prevail in the highest degree. Predictions verified concerning the destruction of Jerusalem.

THE ambition of the Roman officers prompting them to the capture of Jerusalem, they could not embrace a fairer opportunity for the advancement of their design, than that afforded by the present distracted state of the city. To this end they urged Vespasian, as their commander in chief, to improve the same, without allowing the Jews a proper time to concert measures of defence. They also represented to him, that the interposition of Providence evidently appeared upon these factions in favour of the Romans. The general replied to them in terms to the following effect, observing,

"That their bravery was more than their policy; and that they considered the glory of the action, in the ostentation of their courage, (as it were to fight a prize,) more than the prudence and advantage of it. For to attack the city hand over head, would be the ready way to make them all friends again, and to draw their forces upon us, which are very considerable, into a conjunction, as against a common enemy; whereas, if we do but wait with a little patience, they will do our business to our hands, in spending their numbers and their spirits one upon another. God does better for us than we can do for ourselves, in delivering up the Jews to the Romans without labour or peril, and giving us victory without so much as a battle. Are they not already involved in a civil war? (which is the heaviest of all judgments.) Who but a madman then will enter into a needless contest with madmen, and run the risque of bearing a part in the tragedy, when he may do his business better in the quality of a spectator? Those people are rash and furious, and, rather than not be destroyed, will kill one another. As for those that look upon a cheap victory to be inglorious, they would do well to set the advantages of a temperate accommodation, without blood, against the uncertain chance of war. This is not to derogate from the honour of military virtue; for, provided the same thing be done, it matters not whether it be by arms or council. Undoubtedly Gorion and Niger put to death.

“Undoubtedly that must be the best way of doing it, which at the same time that it weakens the enemy, keeps our own men, by daily exercise, in discipline and in breath. Neither is this a time for us to propose to ourselves the fame of a glorious exploit, when the Jews are playing our game for us, and mind neither their arms, their works, or their walls, or the making of interest and friends, but are destroying one another, and doing the part of the worst of enemies one to another, till they have brought themselves into such a condition, that the best they can hope or wish for is to be our slaves. As to the prudence and honour of the matter in question, if they have a mind to plague one another, why should we hinder them? Nor is there, in fine, any reputation to be got by a victory that was rather cast upon us by the faction of the one side, than gained by the valour of the other. And this is the truth of the case.”

The Jews desert in numbers to Vespasian.

Additional instance of the barbarity of the zealots.

Thus did Vespasian deliver his opinion, with which, from the sequel, the officers appeared to coincide; for deserters came over to him from the zealots, in great numbers, day after day; though the passages were so beset, that it seemed almost impossible to escape. They put every man to the sword that fell in their way, upon pretence, that he was going off to the Romans, unless he redeemed himself for a sum of money, which never failed to procure his deliverance. There was no charge of treachery where there was no want of money; so that the rich compounded; and the poor were obliged to submit not only to oppression, but even murder itself. The massacre was so outrageous, that the dead bodies lay piled in heaps upon the highways; and many, who had meditated their escape, changed their minds, and chose rather to perish in the city, from the mere hope of a little earth to cover them. But such was the inhumanity of those monsters, that they would not allow burial either to those slain within or without the city; but, like professed enemies to the instinct of nature as well as the rites of their country, they offended God and man, and exposed the bodies to rot above ground in the face of the sun. Nay, it was deemed as unpardonable a crime to attempt the burial of a friend, as to go over to the enemy; and he that had but lately buried another, wanted, perhaps, the next moment, a friend to do the same office for himself. Compassion, the most humane of affections, seemed to be wholly extinct in the hearts of these miscreants; and misery was rather a provocation to rage than a motive to pity.

The spectacle, in fine, was so hideous, that it caused the living to envy the dead; and the want of a grave was much more tolerable than the miseries of a prison. Nor did they only trample upon all that was sacred amongst men, but trifled with the Deity, and paid as little regard to the predictions of the prophets, as they did to the fabulous reports of necromancers. But, notwithstanding this contempt of the laws and precepts of their forefathers concerning the measures of good and evil, they found the predictions verified, in the conclusion, concerning themselves and their country. There was a traditional prophecy handed down to them from antiquity, that, in future time, there should break out a violent sedition in Jerusalem, and that the Jews themselves, with their own hands, should profane the holy temple; that the city should be afterwards taken, and all that was sacred in it laid in ashes. The zealots made no doubt of the authority of this prophecy, and contributed the utmost in their power towards the fulfilment of it.

C H A P. III.

John usurps sovereign power. The faction divided into two parties, Zealots and anti-zealots. John espouses the latter. Heavy judgments fall on the Jews. An excursion of the Sicarii from the citadel of Massada. Engaddi taken by storm. Judea becomes the seat of war. The Jews hold secret correspondence with Vespasian, and sue to him for relief. Gadara invites and receives him. The factious betake themselves to flight. Placidus follows and puts them to the rout. The fugitives make their way to Bethennabris. Placidus rifles the place, and lays it in ashes. The country terrified with a false alarm. The Jews are forced into action, and lose fifteen thousand men.

SUCH was the ambition of John of Gischala, that nothing would content him less than sovereign power; so that withdrawing insensibly from the rest of his companions, and bringing over to his interest a party of the most abandoned miscreants, he assumed to himself a kind of despotic sway. He took upon him to impose his own orders and opinions imperiously upon others, and of treating theirs with contradiction and contempt, and this he did from a manifest affectation of sole and absolute authority. Some joined with him out of fear, and several from affection and good-will; for he was a great master of the art of persuasion, and well knew how to work upon the human passions. Many followed him for their own security, hoping that their misdemeanors would be imputed to him as the original cause, if they should be called to an account for them. But divers fell off from him; some from envy, and others from a disdain of subjection to one that had so lately been their enemy. But the grand objection was the dread of monarchy, and the despair of dispossessing him of that power if he once obtained it. Besides, they were persuaded he would never forgive those that opposed him in his pretensions at the beginning.

The people, upon these deliberations, came at last to a resolution, rather to stand the events of a war, than perish under the infamy of making themselves voluntary slaves. The faction, upon this, divided into two parties; John putting himself at the head of the anti-zealots. They stood both upon their guard one against the other, and not without some slight skirmishes; but rather with the people in general, than betwixt themselves, for the main point, which of the two parties should get the greatest booty.

Jerusalem labouring at this time under three heavy judgments, war, tyranny, and sedition, the people, taking the former to be the most tolerable of the three, quitted their habitations, fled from their own countrymen for sanctuary to strangers, and found afterwards that safety and protection from the Romans they could not obtain one from another.

The three forementioned judgments were followed by a fourth, which contributed as much to the destruction of the Jews as any of the rest. There stood a castle not far from Jerusalem, called Massada, a place of great antiquity, strength, and importance. It was erected and made use of by our kings, in former times, for a royal treasury, and a magazine of all kinds of stores and necessaries for war, and for an impregnable retreat in times of danger. It was now in possession of a band of ruffians, called Sicarii, who over-ran, plundered, and laid waste the country. It happening, at this juncture, that the Roman army lay quiet while the Jews were divided between sedition and tyranny, these assassins took the opportunity of making still bolder attempts than they had ventured on before. It was now the feast of unleavened bread, a festival celebrated by the Jews with great solemnity, in commemoration of their deliverance from Egyptian bondage, and translation into the Land of Promise. On that night the ruffians broke into Engaddi by surprise, scattered the people, and made themselves masters of the place, before the inhabitants could take to their arms. They drove them out of the town; and having put to death upwards of seven hundred persons, mostly women and children, rifled their houses, and seized upon all the fruits that were in season, which they carried to Massada. Indeed, they laid waste all the villages in the neighbourhood of the fortress: for their numbers increased daily by the accession of an abandoned rabble, that came flocking in to join them.

The

viation throughout Judæa.

The region of Judæa now became one scene of violence; and, as it is with the human body, when any of the nobler parts are indisposed, all the rest sympathize, to it is with respect to a seditious and disorderly city. When the capital is rent by faction, the subordinate parts suffer, of course, in proportion as they are tainted by evil example. Having plundered all within their reach, those robbers marched off with the booty into deserts, joined in conspiracies, and gathered together in multitudes little inferior to armies, sufficient to destroy cities, and lay temples desolate.

The sufferers, as was very natural, availed themselves of every opportunity to revenge themselves upon their oppressors: but that was rare, for the robbers were too dexterous and active, and generally got off with their prey before the pursuers could reach them; so that there was not a spot in Judæa but what partook of the calamity of the metropolis.

The Jews

Vespasian
for their relief.

He complies with their request.

The faction had guarded all the avenues with the utmost caution, so that there was no stirring without imminent danger of life. But, notwithstanding all this vigilance, deserters stole away with intelligence of the state of the city to Vespasian, and to implore his relief, in the name of the miserable remainder of distressed citizens, as great numbers had lost their lives through their attachment to the Romans, and many more were at present in danger of perishing by the same fate. Vespasian, in generous compassion for the lamentable condition of an unhappy people, advanced with his army nearer the town; not, as some imagined, to lay close siege to it, but with a view of delivering them from any siege at all, by reducing all the strong holds about it, so as to leave no obstacle to impede him in the prosecution of his design.

Enter Ca-
sarea.

When he came to Gadara, the richest and strongest city beyond Jordan, and the metropolis of that province, he entered the place on the fourth day of the month Dystrus, upon an invitation of some of the leading men, by their deputies, to take them under his protection. This they did to save both their lives and estates, being a very wealthy people. The opposite party knew nothing of this embassy; but suspecting it, when they found the Roman general drawing near the walls, they became greatly embarrassed. They were assured it was utterly impossible for the town to hold out against so many enemies, both within and without; the majority of the citizens being against them, and the Roman army at hand. They had nothing to trust to but flight, which was a point that, in honour, could not be resolved upon, without first taking revenge upon some of the authors of their ruin. Upon this consideration they apprehended Dolefus, the first man of the city, both for rank and merit, caused him to be put to death, and ordered the dead body to be scourged, which being done, they went privately out of the town.

Upon the nearer approach of the Romans towards the city, the inhabitants met Vespasian on the way, and conducted him in with congratulatory acclamations; and, besides the ceremony of oaths of allegiance, and assurances of that kind in similar cases, they made it their own act and deed to demolish their own walls, as a farther security of their good faith and peaceable intentions. Vespasian, after this, gave them a garrison for their safeguard; and sent away Placidus, with 500 horse and 3000 foot, after the fugitives, while he himself, with the rest of his troops, went back to Cæsarea.

When the fugitives found themselves pursued, and a party of horse behind them, they turned off into a village, called Bethennabris, before the Romans could come up to them. Here they engaged a number of young men to join them, and with this party sallied out, and made a desperate charge upon Placidus, who gave way at the onset; but it was only to draw his adversaries a little farther from the town. The scheme succeeded; for Placidus got them into a place of advantage, and there attacked and put them to the rout. Those that fled for their safety were intercepted by the Romans, and those that fought were cut off by their foot. In fine, they were totally defeated. When they attacked the Romans, it was to no effect; for they stood so firm and close, that there was no breaking the body; and they lay upon such a guard under their arms, that no lance or dart could touch them. Whereas the Jews, on the other hand, lay exposed to all sorts of weapons, and to all manner of assaults, till, in the end, in a fit of despair and brutal rage, they cast themselves, with the utmost fury upon the points of their enemies swords, and so perished. Some were dispersed by the horse, and trampled under foot. Placidus made it his particular care, as far as possible, that none of the fugitives should get back into the town. If any of them attempted it, he intercepted them with his horse, and forced them off again. Those within reach were slain with lances. Some, however, swifter and stronger than the rest, made their way to the very wall; so that the watch were puzzled whom to admit, and whom to exclude, deeming it hard to open the gates to the townsmen, and refuse entrance to those of Gadara. On the other hand, they were fearful, lest, by opening to all indifferently, they might endanger the loss of the place, as had like to have been the case soon after; for the Romans, having pursued some of the fugitives up to the wall, had very near fallen into the town; but, with much difficulty, they shut the gates, and thereby prevented them.

No. 33.

The fugitives are routed by Placidus.

Placidus, upon this, vigorously assaulted the place, in so much that he made himself master both of the wall and the village in a few hours. The wretched common people, who had no means of defence, were all put to the sword; but the rest endeavoured to save themselves by flight, carrying terror along with them wherever they went. To finish the calamity, they first pillaged the houses, and then laid the village in ashes. The misery of the inhabitants was great in fact, but much greater in report; for it was given out that the whole Roman army was coming toward them. This alarm so terrified the people, that they quitted their habitations, and retired in great numbers to Jericho, being a garrison well fortified, and, of course, the safest retreat to which they could betake themselves. Placidus, in the career of his successes, pursued them to the river Jordan, putting to the sword all that were taken on the way.

The Romans take

bris, and

When the fugitives came to the river side, a great fall of rain had caused such an overflow of the waters, that there was no passing, nor, as the case stood, any possibility of getting away. In this dilemma they found themselves under an absolute necessity of coming to an action. The Jews posted themselves along the bank of a river, which they made good for some time; but when once they were broken, betwixt those who were drowned, and those who were slain, the loss could hardly be computed. It was estimated at fifteen thousand killed on the spot, and about two thousand two hundred taken, besides a mighty booty of sheep, camels, and oxen. This was one of the greatest disasters that ever befel the Jews. The highways, where they marched, were all covered with dead bodies; the river Jordan so choaked with carcasses, that there was no crossing it; and vast numbers floated down several channels that led to the lake Alphatitis.

mans obtain

Placidus being now in the train of his good fortune, reduced Abila, Julias, Belemoth, and other places as far as the lake, where he settled garrisons of the choicest men he could select from amongst those that came over to the Romans. His next care was to embark his soldiers, and cleanse the lake of all the fugitives that fled thither for refuge, in so much, that, by this time, the Romans were masters of all Perea, as far as Machærus.

CHAP. IV.

Gaul revolts. Vespasian fortifies all the places he had taken in Judæa. Description of the country about Jericho. Of the lakes of Asphaltitis and Tiberias. Elisha's fountain.

Vespasian receives intelligence of commotions in Gaul.

DURING these transactions in Judæa, advice was received that Gaul had revolted from Nero, and that Vindex, and several principal men of the country, abetted the malecontents. Vespasian, on this intelligence, prosecuted the present war with more vigour, as it was probable that one revolt might be productive of another, and the whole empire at length be in danger from a civil war; whereas, if the troubles in the east were first composed, Italy would have the less to fear. But it being the winter season, all that could be done to it at present, was to place garrisons in all the towns and cities he had subdued, and order such reparations as might be found needful.

Reduces great part of Judæa.

In the beginning of the spring he marched, with the greatest part of his army, from Cæsarea to Antipatris, where he stayed two days to put things in order, and on the third day proceeded, laying all the neighbourhood waste with fire and sword, from the borders of the toparchy of Thamna, and thence to Lydda and Jamnia.

When he had peopled them with inhabitants from other towns, such as he thought he might best confide in, he advanced to Emmaus, and possessing himself there of the passage that leads to the capital city, pitched his camp, and ran a wall about it. Having left the fifth legion there, he moved with the rest of his troops into the toparchy of Bethlepton, which he burnt and destroyed, together with the neighbouring country, and the borders of Idumæa, leaving only some strong castles, which he manned and fortified. Having taken two towns in the very midst of Idumæa, called Bethabri and Caphartoba, he slew upwards of ten thousand of the people, reserving near a thousand for slaves, drove out the rest, and left a considerable part of his troops to sally out and commit outrages upon the mountainous part of the country.

He returned, after this, with the remainder of his army, to Emmaus, and passing from thence to Samaria and Neapolis, (called, by the natives, Mabartah,) arrived, the second day of the month Desius, at Corca, where he encamped, and shewed himself next day before Jericho. At this place he was joined by Trajan, one of his principal officers, with the troops under his command, after the entire reduction of all the country beyond Jordan. But most of the inhabitants were withdrawn to the mountains over against Jerusalem before the arrival of the Romans. A great part, however, of those that stayed behind, were put to the sword.

Description of Jericho and its environs.

Vespasian found Jericho a desolate city. It is situate in a plain, that is overlooked by a naked and barren mountain, and of such extent, that it reaches upon the north side to the region of Scythopolis, on the south as far as Sodom, and the borders of the lake Asphaltitis, a country uninhabited by reason of its barrenness. Opposite to this, and on the farther side of the river Jordan, lies another mountain, which rises at Julias towards the north, and stretches southward up to Gomorrha, and so borders upon Petra, a city of Arabia. There is also another mountain, which they call the Iron Mountain, and runs out as far as the land of Moab. Betwixt these mountains lies a place called The Great Plain. It begins at Genabara, and stretches out to the lake Asphaltitis. The length of it is two hundred and thirty furlongs, its breadth an hundred and twenty, and the river Jordan crosses the middle of it.

The Great Plain.

There are two remarkable lakes, the one called Asphaltitis, the other Tiberias, but of very different, if not contrary, qualities; the former being salt and crude, without fish, the other sweet, kindly and fruitful. The summer heats there are excessive, the country being burnt up with them, and the air hot and sickly, without any refreshment, but from the river Jordan, as appears from the palm trees, which thrive much better upon the banks than at a distance.

Near Jericho there is a large and plentiful fountain, which overflows all the grounds thereabouts, and takes its rise not far from an ancient city, the first place that Joshua, the son of Nun, and famous general of the Hebrews, gained from the Canaanites by the sword. There goes a tradition that this fountain in time past was so dangerous, that it not only corrupted the fruits of the earth, as well grain as plants, but likewise caused abortions in women, and tainted with a blasting infection whatever it touched that was capable of such an impression. It is further reported, that, from the days of the prophet Elisha, the illustrious successor of Elijah, the waters of this fountain became not only innocent, but wholesome and nourishing, and upon this occasion: Elisha having been treated with great hospitality and respect by the people of Jericho, he thought himself of such an acknowledgment, as they themselves, their country, and posterity, might be the better for to time immemorial. The prophet, upon this, went out to the fountain, and causing an earthen vessel, full of salt, to be let down into the bottom of it, advanced his right hand towards heaven, and presenting his oblations at the side of it, besought the Almighty, in his goodness, to correct the waters, and to sweeten the veins that passed from them; to soften the air, and render it temperate and fructifying; to bestow children, as well as fruit, upon the inhabitants in abundance; and never to withdraw these blessings so long as they continued in their duty. Upon the offering up of this prayer, with all due form and ceremony, the quality of the fountain was changed, and, instead of sterility and famine, the waters now became an efficacious means of plenty and increase; insomuch that the bare touching of the ground with them gives every thing a more savory relish. Besides, there is not another water in the country that runs through such a track of land.

Elisha's fountain, a king's 21.

The country is seven furlongs in length, and twenty in breadth; abounding with curious gardens and thick groves, with palm trees along the banks, of different kinds, names, and tastes. They press out of some of them great quantities of a sort of honey, not much inferior to other honey, which they have there also in plenty. There is great store of balsam, cypreis, and myrobalanus: and it is undoubtedly a remarkable blessing from heaven for a country to produce not only the choicest of all the fruits of the earth, but the largest and best of the several sorts. Nor are they less happy than other countries in the production of other fruits, and in the improving of them, as well in growth as in virtue. This, I presume, may be ascribed to some peculiar property of the water, and to a certain kindly warmth in the air: the latter to draw out and diffuse the virtue of the subject matter it has to work upon, as in the disclosing of leaves, flowers, and the like. The other serves to bind and confine the roots, and to fortify them, by increasing the sap, against the parching heats, which are so excessive, that nothing would sprout or bud without it. In the extremity of these heats, they have likewise every morning such refreshing breezes, that the very breath of them renders the water, that is drawn before sun-rise, cool and comfortable. In the winter it is warm and salutary to bathe in. Such is the temperature of this climate, that even when the rest of Judæa is covered with snow, the natives of this place are clothed in linen. It lies an hundred and fifty furlongs from Jerusalem, and sixty from the river Jordan; and the whole country, betwixt it and Jerusalem, is rock and desert. Thus much for the happy situation and natural advantages of Jericho.

Extraordinary qualities of the lake of Asphaltitis. Sodom produces a fair fruit to the eye, that falls to ashes upon the touch.

THE nature of the lake of Asphaltitis is also worthy of description. It is bitter and unfruitful, and so light, that it bears up the heaviest things that are thrown into it. Vespasian, having heard of the strange qualities of this water, took a journey out of curiosity to see it, and ordered several persons, that could not swim, to be thrown into it, with their hands tied behind them. They all rose as if by means of a puff of wind, and floated on the surface of the water. This lake changes colour thrice a day, according to the various refractions of the light of the sun-beams upon it. There are also to be seen, in several parts of it, large lumps of a dark bituminous matter, not much unlike the bodies of bulls without heads. The natives draw them up in their boats; but the substance of them is so viscous, and one part so glued to another, that there is no getting the vessel off again, but by dissolving the lumps, and separating that part without the boat, from the other within, which is effected by most extraordinary means. This bituminous matter is not only used for caulking of ships, but as a medicine for the cure of many disorders. The length of the lake is five hundred and eighty furlongs, the breadth an hundred and fifty, and it reaches to Zoardinin Arabia.

The lake of Asphaltitis borders upon the land of Sodom, once famous for the wealth of its inhabitants, and the fruitfulness of its soil; but it is since become totally desolate, having been destroyed by a judgment of fire from heaven, for the abominations of the people. There are yet to be seen some remains of five cities that perished in that conflagration; and there are mock fruits to be seen to this day, springing out of the ashes, fair and lovely to the eye, but dissolving into smoke and ashes upon the touch; so that we have not only tradition, but ocular testimony of this history.

C H A P. VI.

Vespasian invests Jerusalem. Gerara taken by storm. Vespasian receives intelligence of the death of Nero, and, in consequence thereof, suspends his design upon Jerusalem.

VESPASIAN, being determined to invest Jerusalem on every side, raised two forts at Jericho and Adida, putting into each of them garrisons both of Roman and auxiliary troops. He then sent Lucius and Annius, with a body of horse and foot, to Gerara, which he took by storm upon the first attack. He caused a thousand young men to be slain, whom he intercepted in their flight, carried away whole families prisoners, and gave the soldiers the pillage, which done, he set fire to the place, and so went forwards. The men of power fled, the weaker part were destroyed, and whatever they took they burnt. Nothing, in short, escaped them, neither mountains or vallies, places or people; but all suffered in the outrages of the war. Those who were shut up in Jerusalem could not stir; the zealots keeping to strict a watch upon those that were friends to the Romans; and the town being so beset by the enemy, that the zealots durst not venture forth, through fear of falling into their hands.

When Vespasian was returned to Cæsarea, and preparing to advance with his whole army against Jerusalem, he received intelligence of the death of Nero, who had now reigned thirteen years and eight days. I deem it needless for me to relate minutely and circumstantially the particulars of his history, respecting the dishonour he reflected on his character, in suffering himself to be imposed on by Nymphidius and Tigellinus, two infamous miscreants, that attended on his person; his being betrayed by them, abandoned by his senators and guards, and being forced to fly into the suburbs only with four of his freemen; the death he inflicted upon himself; the issue of the war with the Gauls; the succession of Galba to the empire, who, upon his coming out of Spain to Rome, was calumniated by the soldiers as a pusillanimous being, and afterwards slain in the middle of the great market-place; the succession of Otho, who marched with his army against Vitellius; the troubles of Vitellius; the combat before the capitol; the defeat of the German troops, by Antonius Primus and Mucianus, who, having slain Vitellius, put an end to the civil war: these particulars I omit, as they have been accurately described by several eminent historians, both Greek and Latin, and contenting myself with this sketch, return to my own narrative.

Vespasian, upon this intelligence, put a stop, at first, to his expedition against Jerusalem, till he could learn how the government was disposed of after the death of Nero, and finding Galba appointed to the succession, he deemed it imprudent to proceed without orders. Hereupon he sent his son Titus to Galba, to congratulate his accession to the empire, and to receive instructions and commands as to his future conduct. King Agrippa accompanied Titus on the commission: but, as they were upon their passage near Achaia, they were informed of the death of Galba, who was slain after a government of seven months and seven days; as also of the succession of Otho, who reigned three months. This revolution did not hinder Agrippa from proceeding to Rome; but Titus, through an extraordinary impulse, sailed from Achaia into Syria, and from thence very seasonably got back to his father at Cæsarea. They were now both in suspense concerning the public affairs, the Roman empire being in so fluctuating a condition. They suspended their expedition against the Jews; nor was it a time to think of extending the empire, when intestine broils prevailed amongst those of their own country.

Vespasian suspends his design.

C H A P. VII.

Another war in Jerusalem. Simon commits ravages and depredations. Attempts the conquest of Idumæa. Encounters the zealots. Eleazar, one of his party, summons Herodion, and the garrison receives him. He is detected as the agent of Simon, and puts an end to his life. Perfidy of James of Idumæa. Idumæa is taken without a stroke, and afterwards laid waste. The zealots seize upon Simon's wife, but, upon his dreadful menaces, they dismiss her.

ON this revolution there broke out another war in Jerusalem. There was one Simon, the son of Gioras, by birth of Gerara, in the prime of life, and though not so dextrous and artful as John of Gischala, who had already seized upon the city, superior in bodily strength and resolution of mind. As he was found to be a person dangerous to the community, Ananus, the high priest, drove him out of his government in the toparchy of Acrabatena, and made him fly to the free booters in Massada for refuge. At first they suspected him, and only permitted him to come, with the women he brought with him, into the lower part of the fortress, while they dwelt in the upper part of it themselves. Finding, at length, his disposition and manner correspond with theirs, they reposed confidence in him, and appointed him head of a party upon an adventure, in pillaging and depopulating the country about Massada. He endeavoured to inspire them with an ardour to attempt greater things, and seemed to affect sovereignty; but all his efforts proved abortive, till the death of Ananus.

Immediately upon the removal of this obstacle, he took his course into the mountainous parts of the country, and issued out proclamations of liberty to all all slaves, and rewards to all freemen who would enlist under his banner. This brought over to him a number of licentious rabble from all quarters; and as his power thereby augmented daily, he first ransacked the villages that were situated upon the hills, and then proceeded to the plains, rendering himself formidable to all the places through which he passed. His party, in process of time, was not composed merely of slaves and robbers; for many men of power came over to his interest, and the populace seemed to treat him with the respect and reverence due from a subject to a prince. He then made several incursions into the toparchy of Acrabatena, and the Greater Idumæa, where he made choice of Nain, a town he had himself walled in and fortified, for his retreat. In the valley called Pharan, he found many caverns ready for his purpose, and others he enlarged, for granaries, stores, magazines, and, in a word, repositories for the fruits of his rapine. From these preparations it was generally taken for granted that his main design was upon Jerusalem. The zealots being of the same opinion, and finding it dangerous to suffer him to augment his strength daily, determined, by one vigorous effort, to stop the career of his ambition, before it was too late. Pursuant to this resolution, they advanced in a full body to charge him at the head of his troops. Simon met and encountered them with great valour, made a considerable slaughter amongst them, and put the rest to the rout.

He is opposed by the zealots.

Undertakes the conquest of Idumæa.

An obstinate engagement ensues.

Death of Eleazar, associate of Simon.

James, the Idumæan, betrays his country.

But not thinking his forces yet adequate to an attempt upon Jerusalem, he chose rather to begin with the conquest of Idumæa, and therefore marched, at the head of twenty thousand armed men, towards the borders of that country. Upon their appearance, the leading men, with great expedition, raised a body of twenty-five thousand choice troops, leaving a competent number to secure the country from the ravages of the freebooters in Massada. They then waited for Simon upon the borders, where, upon his advance, the two armies engaged, and the action continued from morning till night, upon terms so equal that the superiority could not be decided. It appeared, however, that both parties had sustained great loss; for Simon retired to Nain, and the Idumæans returned home.

Nor long after this, Simon took the field again, with a very considerable reinforcement, and encamping near the village of Thecue, sent Eleazar, one of his associates, with a summons to the governor of Herodion, requiring him to deliver the castle into his hands. The officers received him, at first, with all tokens of military honour; but, upon coming to understand his commission, they all drew upon him in an instant; and Eleazar, finding it impossible to make his escape, leaped down the precipice from a wall, and was dashed to pieces.

The Idumæans were possessed with such apprehensions of the power and ambition of Simon, that they were not disposed to contend with him again, till they were perfectly well informed of the state and strength of his army. James, one of their commanders, very readily (but with a treacherous design) took upon him the office of a spy. Upon this commission he went away from Olivius, where the Idumæan army lay encamped, and thence proceeded to Simon. After some discourse upon the business, he entered into a solemn contract with him, to deliver up his country to him, upon condition of being treated, after the performance of it, as his first minister and favourite; and undertaking, in the next place, to assist him in subjecting all Idumæa. When Simon had gratified this treacherous instrument with a splendid entertainment, fair words, and large promises, he returned to his own people, and magnified every particular, as to strength, conduct, number, and order, which made such an impression not only upon the ignorant multitude, but the very officers themselves, that they came to a resolution not to dispute the point any longer by arms, but rather surrender themselves to Simon, for fear of worse consequences.

James, at that instant, dispatched messengers to Simon to come off immediately, and by no means neglect so fair an opportunity, assuring him that Idumæa would be his own without shedding a drop of blood. His assurance proved valid; for, upon the approach of the army, James was the first man that took horse, and fled, together with those whom he had corrupted; and this struck the whole multitude with such a terror, that they dispersed several ways; and the whole army was dissolved without coming to any action.

Simon being now almost miraculously possessed of Idumæa without bloodshed, surprized the town of Hebron with corn in it, and other booty of immense value. This city is of great antiquity; not only as it respects that province, but, if we may credit the natives, of more ancient date than Memphis in Egypt, being computed to be of 2300 years standing. They have a tradition that Abraham, the original father of the Jews, took up his habitation there upon his leaving Mesopotamia, and that his posterity removed from thence into Egypt, where there are monuments of the most excellent marble, with inscriptions confirming the same. There is also to be seen, at the distance of six furlongs from the place, a very large turpentine-tree, that, according to report, has remained there from the creation of the world.

From this place Simon made his inroads throughout Idumæa; not only ravaging the cities and villages, but laying waste the whole country; for, besides those that were completely armed, he had a train of 40,000 followers. The progress of this multitudinous throng was as destructive to the people as locusts are to the vegetable creation. They left every place desolate behind them, nor was there to be seen the trace of any thing that contributed to human aliment. It was utterly impossible to find provisions for such an host, which, added to the natural ferocity of Simon, and the inveteracy of his rage against the Idumæans, aggravated that pinching want. In fine, from their burning, demolishing, and devouring the fruits of the earth, or trampling them to dust, Simon's troops did not leave so much even in a fruitful, well cultivated country, the least sign or memorial of what it had been formerly.

These rapacious proceedings of Simon could not fail to incense the zealots, though they durst not bring it to an open war, but contented themselves with what they occasionally got by surprise. At length a valuable acquisition fell into their hands, for they took Simon's wife prisoner, with several of her attendants, and carried her away to Jerusalem with as much joy and triumph as if it had been the husband himself, making no doubt but he would lay down his arms, and enter into a composition. But this violence upon the woman wrought, it seems, a contrary effect upon the husband, and, instead of moving him to tenderness and compassion, enraged him into the most furious extravagance.

He hastened immediately to the gates of Jerusalem, and there vented his spleen upon all that fell in his way, causing men, women, and children, that came out of the city upon any necessary occasion, to be apprehended and scourged to death, young and old, without distinction. He cut off the hands of many, and sent them into the city to astonish his enemies, and in order to make the people fall into sedition, and desert those who had been the authors of his wife's seizure. He also enjoined them to declare, "that Simon swore, by the Great God of the Universe, that, unless they immediately restored him his wife, he would force their walls, and inflict the like punishment upon every creature, whether young or old, guilty or innocent." These menaces terrified not only the multitude, but the zealots themselves, that they sent back his wife, and thereby so far appeased him, that he suspended the continuance of his dreadful massacres.

C H A P. VIII.

*The Roman empire rent by faction and intestine broils.
Transactions and fate of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius.
Vespasian meditates the absolute conquest of Judæa.
Cerealis takes Capharis, and lays Hebron in ashes.*

SEDITION and civil war prevailed now not only throughout Judæa, but in Italy also. Galba was slain in the midst of the market-place at Rome, and Otho was declared his successor. Then started up Vitellius, who, being elected emperor by the German legions, disputed his title with him. They had two battles near Betriacum, in Gaul. Otho gained the advantage on the first day, and Vitellius the next, under the command of his two generals, Valens and Cecinna. After much slaughter, Otho, when he heard of his defeat at Brixillum, slew himself, after a nominal reign of three months and two days. Upon this event, Otho's soldiers went over to the party of Vitellius, who presently marched away with his army to Rome.

Vespasian, in the mean time, removed from Cæsarea, on the fifth day of the month Desius, with a design of making an absolute conquest of Judæa, by reducing those places that yet stood out. He went first up the mountainous country, and made himself master of the toparchies of Gophnis and Acrabatena, possessing himself afterwards of the cities of Bethel and Ephraim, and, when he had settled garrisons in them, proceeded towards Jerusalem, in his way to which he took captive and slew great numbers of Jews.

Cerealis, one of his commanders in chief, in the mean time, with a body of horse and foot, over-ran the Upper Idumæa; took and burnt the castle of Caphetra by the way; and laid siege to Capharis, a strong walled town, and supposed capable of making a good defence; but the inhabitants opened their gates, and surrendered themselves to the assailants. Having thus carried every thing before him, he went to Hebron, the ancient town upon the mountains before mentioned, not far from Jerusalem, which he attacked and carried on the first assault. He put the people to the sword, and sacked and burnt the city. There were yet three castles in the possession of the free-booters, Herodion Mal-lada, and Machærus; though nothing might be said to be wanting to put a final period to this destructive war, but the conquest of Jerusalem.

C H A P. IX.

Simon arranges the seizure of his wife upon the Idumæans. Infamous principles and practices of the zealots. The Idumæans revolt, rout the zealots, pursue them to the palace, and thence to the temple. A resolution formed to admit Simon into the city, which he enters amidst the acclamations of the people. An assault upon the temple.

AS soon as Simon had recovered his wife from the zealots, he turned his rage upon the remainder of the Idumæans, and driving them before him from all quarters, divers of them, in a fit of despair, fled to Jerusalem for sanctuary. He pursued them to the very foot of the wall, putting to death all that came within his reach; so that Simon, without the wall, was a greater terror to the people than the Romans themselves; and the zealots within were more injurious to them than both. They seem to have imbibed these principles from the Galileans, who improved them in the arts of wickedness, by instruction, encouragement, and example. John of Gischala, having been advanced by them, made them a suitable requital from the authority he had obtained, by permitting them to live in the most licentious manner, without the least degree of controul. In matters of rapine and pillage, their avarice was insatiable. They sported with the lives of men and the honour of women; and when they had sated themselves with blood and oppression, they wallowed in the very sink of brutality, gloried in the commission of horrid and unnatural crimes, and polluted the whole city with impurities that decency forbids us to mention. At the same time that they proceeded in these infamous practices, they continued their bloody massacres, and had their weapons constantly ready to slay all that opposed them. He that escaped John fell into the hands of Simon, the most inhuman monster of the two; and those who got clear of the tyrant within the wall, were destroyed by the other before the town; so that all the passages were blocked up, and there was no possibility of deserting to the Romans.

At length the Idumæans, through envy of John's power, and detestation of his horrid barbarities, revolted from the tyrant, and made head against him. An engagement ensued, and many of the zealots were slain upon the spot: the rest fled into the royal palace, which was originally erected by Grapte, a relation of Izates, king of the Adiabeniens. The Idumæans pressed in with them, and forcing the zealots into the temple, made themselves masters of the whole of John's treasure, which was there deposited under the roof of his own habitation. Upon this, the zealots, that were dispersed throughout the town, gathered together, in order to join those of their clan that were got into the temple; and John immediately prepared for a sally upon the Idumæans and the citizens. The latter were under no apprehension from the numbers of the opposite party, but fearful lest they should privately sally out of the temple, and set fire to the city. Upon this occasion they called a council, and deliberated with the high-priest what measures they should pursue. But, as if Providence designed to infatuate their policy, they proposed a remedy worse than the disease, and resolved, amongst themselves, to cast off John, and admit Simon, a second tyrant, into the city. The resolution accordingly passed; and Matthias, the high-priest, was sent to invite Simon into the town for the governor. Those also, who had been driven out of Jerusalem by the zealots, joined in this request, from a desire of preserving their houses and effects. Simon arrogantly told them that their petition was granted; and entered the city amidst the acclamations of the populace, as their protector and deliverer. He had no sooner made his entrance with his troops, than he attended to the security of his authority, as he looked upon those that invited him to be no less his enemies than those against whom the invitation was intended.

Simon got possession of Jerusalem in the third month, called Xanthicus; upon which John, with his party, being hindered from coming out of the temple, and having lost their power in the city, were in despair of deliverance. Simon, with the assistance of the people, made an assault upon the temple; but the assailants were so galled with stones, darts, and arrows, from the galleries and battlements overhead, that they were repulsed with great loss, several slain, others carried off wounded; so that, upon the whole, they were fatally disappointed; the zealots having the advantage of situation, where the weapons of their opponents could not reach them. They had, besides, four large towers, of their own erecting, to annoy the enemy from above: one to the eastward, another to the north, a third upon a gallery at the corner over against the lower town, and a fourth upon the top of what they call the "Pastophoria;" a place where one of the priests stood to make proclamation, by sound of trumpet, when the sabbath began, and when it ended, that the people might know when to leave off work, and when to return to it again. The archers and slingers were posted upon these towers, with all their engines and military implements. Simon, however, persevered in his opposition, depending on his superiority in point of numbers, though he sustained very great loss from the weapons of the adverse party.

C H A P. X.

Vitellius makes the whole city of Rome his camp. Vespasian is alarmed at his promotion to the empire. The soldiers are disgusted from the same cause. The officers inveigh against Vitellius and his party, to the honour of Vespasian and Titus. Salute Vespasian as emperor. He accepts the empire with reluctance.

Great dissensions prevail in Rome.

IN the midst of these intestine broils in Jerusalem, Rome was rent by civil dissensions. Vitellius came out of Germany with a prodigious multitude of foreign troops; and, as the departments allotted for the soldiers could not contain them, was under a necessity of quartering many of them in private houses. The sparkling of the ore they had taken from their enemies, was such an attraction to those who had not been accustomed to it, as to excite a desire of pilfering or taking it by force. Such was the state of Italy at that time.

Upon Vespasian's return to Cæsarea, after laying waste all about Jerusalem, he received intelligence of strange tumults that prevailed in Rome, and that Vitellius had been declared emperor. Though Vespasian was a man of order and discipline, and as ready to obey as he was able to govern, he could not but be disgusted at the idea of subjection to a man who had seized upon the empire, without one requisite qualification. This strange turn of affairs affected him so much, that he could not attend any foreign wars at a time when his country laboured under such calamities at home. But, as his indignation spurred him to revenge on the one hand, so the difficulties of so long a journey, in order to the execution of it, especially in the winter season, restrained him on the other: besides, many mischiefs might happen before he could reach Italy.

While this was in agitation, the officers and soldiers formed cabals and parties, and consulted about a change in public affairs. The prevailing opinion was as follows:

Invective of the soldiers against Vitellius.

"That there were soldiers at Rome so effeminate and delicate, that the noise and clangor of war would terrify them: That such creatures, truly, were well qualified to dispose of empires, or rather to sell them to the best bidder: That, after the fatigue and labour of a life worn out in service, they would never submit to an emperor of their choosing, while they had among themselves one much more worthy of governing: That, if they lost the present opportunity of expressing their gratitude for the favours so generously conferred upon them by Vespasian, it was probable the like would never return: That Vespasian was in himself as much superior to Vitellius, with respect to qualification for an emperor, as they were themselves, in point of choice, to those who made him one: That they had run as many hazards, and borne as great a part in the war, as the German legion, that brought the usurper into the metropolis, and were as well skilled in military discipline as they were: That, as to Vespasian, there could be no possible competition; for the people and senate of Rome would never bear so licentious an emperor as Vitellius, when compared with a character so eminent for moderation and temperance as Vespasian: That it could not be expected, his son Titus, though a prince of extraordinary virtues, should be chosen in preference to his father; but that, however, if either maturity of experience, or vigour of youth, might be allowed a title to choice, they had the one in Vespasian, the other in Titus, with all the advantages that attend wisdom and resolution: That it was farther to be considered, that, in electing the admirable father of so incomparable a son, the three imperial legions and auxiliaries would be strengthened by the whole power of the east: That part of Europe, that lies out of the reach of Vitellius, and all the interest that the friends of Vespasian, his brother, and his son, (Domitian,) could make

"in Italy; (the one being præfect of Rome, a charge of great influence, and the other as popular,) and the flower of the nobility, would espouse him in the same cause: and that, finally, if they delayed in this point, the senate might chuse an emperor who might be obnoxious to the soldiers."

This was the topic of discourse amongst the soldiery in their several companies; and their confidence increasing with their numbers, they came unanimously to the point, and declared Vespasian emperor, requesting him, at the same time, to take the tottering state under his protection. Notwithstanding he might still be said to have been the support of the empire a long time, he wished to decline the title of emperor; nay, absolutely refused it; protesting that he had much rather spend the remainder of his days in the freedom of a private life, than amongst the snares and difficulties of a more illustrious station. The more he refused, the more pressing were the offers for his acceptance; till at length, upon perseverance in denial, they came up to him with their drawn swords, and threatened to kill him, unless he would submit to accept of the honour he deserved; so that, after much reluctance, when he found they would not be denied, he yielded to their importunity.

C H A P. XI.

Vespasian is urged to proceed against Vitellius; but declines it, and proposes to begin with Alexandria. Description of Egypt, and the port of Alexandria, with the Tower of Pharos. Tiberius Alexander joins Vespasian.

VESPASIAN was no sooner advanced to the empire, than Mucianus, and the rest of the officers who invited him to the government, were unanimous for his marching against Vitellius. But Vespasian thought it more expedient to begin with Alexandria. Egypt being one of the most considerable spots with respect to the corn it produces, if he could but reduce that country, he was in hopes that Rome itself would rather dethrone Vitellius than run the hazard of famine, which must inevitably be the case without relief from Egypt. He also desired a reinforcement of two legions that lay at Alexandria. He likewise considered with himself, that he should then have that country as a defence against the uncertainty of fortune.

Egypt is hard to be entered by land, and has no good port towards the sea. It is bounded on the west by the parching country of Libya; on the south, Syene divides it from Ethiopia, and the impassable cataracts of the river Nile; on the east, the Red Sea serves it for a rampart, as far as the city Coptos; and on the north, it stretches out as far as Syria, and that which they call the Egyptian Sea. The coast throughout has no havens for ships; so that nature seems to have provided for the security of Egypt in the very situation of it. Its length, from Pelusium to Syene is computed at two thousand furlongs; and the passage by sea, from Plinthine to Pelusium, is three thousand six hundred furlongs. The Nile is navigable as far as Elephantine, beyond which there is no passing for the cataracts.

Alexandria, in the fairest weather, is a dangerous port, the entrance being very narrow; and the rocks so scattered up and down in shallow water, that it requires the utmost skill in the pilot to steer without accident. On the left hand it is encompassed with a dyke; and on the right lies the isle of Pharos, which has been so celebrated for a famous landmark. The light of it is seen three hundred furlongs out at sea, and serves as an unerring guide to mariners. About this island there are great piers, against which, when the sea dashes, and its waves are broken, the passage is rendered very dangerous. But the haven, when once entered, is very safe. The length of it is thirty furlongs, and it is furnished with with convenient store-houses both for the importation and exportation of all manner of commodities.

With great propriety, therefore, did Vespasian desire the acquisition of Alexandria, in order to settle the empire; and he immediately sent to inform Tiberius Alexander, the governor, that, being prevailed upon, by the importunity of the soldiers, to take upon him the burthen of government, he could not do better than request the favour of his assistance and advice in the administration. Alexander had no sooner read the letter, than he readily obliged the legions and the people to take the oath of allegiance to Vespasian, which they did with the utmost frankness and alacrity, being well convinced of his distinguished virtue and valour. Alexander, in the mean time, made a just and generous use of the power that was given him for the service of the public, and applied himself to the making of every necessary preparation for the reception of the new emperor.

CHAP. XII.

General joy on the advancement of Vespasian to the imperial dignity. He calls to mind the omens that foreboded the same, and particularly the prediction of Josephus, whom he sets at liberty, and treats with respect and honour.

FAME spread the report over the east that Vespasian was emperor more suddenly than could have been imagined; so that every city kept festivals, and celebrated sacrifices and oblations upon the auspicious event. The legions that were quartered in Mysia and Panonia, and had lately taken up arms against Vitellius for his tyrannical conduct, readily took the oath of allegiance to Vespasian on his accession to the empire.

Upon his removal from Cæsarea to Berytus, ambassadors from Syria, and other provinces, presented him with congratulatory addresses. Mucianus, in particular, assured him, with what joy the people received the news of his advancement, and with what alacrity they had professed an inviolable attachment to him.

Vespasian succeeding in his undertakings to his utmost wish, began to consider that he had not arrived to the summit of human grandeur without the interposition of Divine Providence. He also called to mind several prophetic hints and tokens he had observed in the course of his life, all tending to one and the same point. But he was more sensibly impressed with a prediction of Josephus, who ventured to foretell his advancement to the empire in the very life-time of Nero. This produced such a concern for his imprisonment, that, calling for Mucianus, and several of his friends and officers, he took occasion to mention the bravery of Josephus, in the instance of the siege of Jotapata, and then related the prediction he at that time suspected to be fictitious, and suggested by apprehension and personal danger, but had now been demonstrated to be of Divine origin. From these circumstances he concluded, that "it was shameful in him to suffer the man who had foretold his coming to the empire, and been the means of conveying to him a Divine message, to be retained in the abject state of a prisoner;" and therefore caused Josephus to be sent for, and set at liberty. This instance of generosity in Vespasian towards a stranger, afforded his officers a most pleasing prospect of his future administration, as conducive to the interest and honour of the empire. Titus, however, being then present, represented to his father, that the scandal should be taken from Josephus, together with his iron chain; as barely to loose his bonds, without cutting them to pieces, would not be a sufficient reparation for the injury he had sustained. Vespasian approved the observation, and ordered the chain to be destroyed. Josephus not only obtained his freedom, but every token of honour and respect, as a testimony of his integrity.

CHAP. XIII.

Vespasian leaves Berytus, goes to Rome, and sends Mucianus, with a great army, into Italy. The party of Vitellius go over to Vespasian at the instance of Cecinna. They afterwards desert, and seize Cecinna as a traitor. An encounter between Anthony and Vitellius, in which the latter is worsted, and, flying towards Cremona, totally routed. Cecinna is discharged, and sent to Vespasian with the news of the victory. The capitol seized by Sabinus. Vitellius is ignominiously exposed, and stabbed to death in the midst of the city. Popularity of Vespasian.

WHEN Vespasian had given answers to the ambassadors, and properly disposed of the offices under government, he declined his intention of going to Alexandria, and proceeded for Rome, where affairs were greatly disordered by Vitellius. He sent Mucianus over land into Italy with an army of horse and foot, by the way of Cappadocia and Phrygia; for he durst not venture his troops upon a winter sea.

Antonius Primus, governor of Mysia, with the third legion, that lay in that province, was greatly desirous of coming to an encounter with Vitellius, who, on the other hand, sent Cecinna, at the head of a strong army, to oppose him. As he was upon his march, he met Anthony upon the borders of Italy, not far from Cremona, where, after he had observed the numbers, the order, and discipline of the enemy, he thought it most prudent to decline coming to an engagement. In this dilemma he called his centurions, tribunes, and, in fact, all his officers together, and took that opportunity to descant upon Vespasian and Vitellius, derogating from the merit of the one, and extolling that of the other, with a design to draw the party of Vitellius over to Vespasian. He then observed to them, that the former had but the name of an emperor, the other the right and authority, as well as the true stamp of an imperial character in his very person; that it was therefore better for them to prevent mischief, and obtain favour; and, as there was every reason to suppose they would be overcome in battle, avoid the danger, and go over willingly to Anthony; and, lastly, that Vespasian was able of himself to subdue those who had not yet submitted without their assistance, while Vitellius was not able to protect himself, nor any party that adhered to him.

Cecinna, by these means, gained his point, and brought the soldiers over to Anthony; but the next night, through repentance for what they had done, and fear of punishment, if Vitellius should get the better, they came in a rage, with their swords drawn, up to Cecinna, to kill him, which they would certainly have done, if the tribunes had not interposed in his behalf. Though they spared his life, they kept him in chains, and sent him bound to Vitellius as a traitor.

When Anthony heard of this, he commanded out a party to fall upon them as deserters. They made a short stand, but, after the first shock, gave ground, and took their flight towards Cremona. Anthony, with his horse, cut off their entrance into the city, and encompassing them, slew great numbers on the spot, and gave the soldiers the pillage. There perished promiscuously, in this ravage, foreign merchants, as well as inhabitants, in abundance, together with the whole army of Vitellius, to the number of thirty thousand two hundred men. There fell of those whom Anthony brought out of Mysia, no more than four thousand five hundred. He then set Cecinna at liberty, and sent him to Vespasian with the news of the victory, where he was received with great and unexpected honours, to balance the disgrace he had incurred for his treachery to his master.

Upon the news that Anthony was approaching Rome, Sabinus, the brother of Vespasian, took courage, and drawing together the city guards, seized upon the capitol in the night. Great numbers of persons of rank came in to him next day, and amongst the rest his nephew Domitian, who had a great hand in the glory of that action. Vitellius was not so much incensed against Anthony as against Sabinus, and those who joined with him in the revolt; but, being naturally ferocious and cruel, especially towards such as were of noble extraction, he sent a body of his own troops against the capitol, who, as well as those in the temple, gave signal proofs of valour. At length the Germans, being too numerous for their adversaries, got the hill in their possession. Domitian, and several of the principal Romans, escaped by a miracle; but Sabinus was brought to Vitellius, who ordered him immediately to be slain. The soldiers plundered the temple of its ornaments and utensils, and then set it on fire.

The next day Anthony came up with his army, and being met by Vitellius, they engaged in three several places, till the army of Vitellius was totally destroyed. Vitellius then came out of his palace, wallowing in gluttony and drunkenness, where he was taken up, and dragged through the street, vilified with every kind of scurrility, and, in the end, stabbed to death in the midst of the city. He had now reigned eight months and five days; and such was his profusion, that it was supposed, if he had lived longer, the revenue of the empire would not have been adequate to the charge of his luxury. This action happened on the third day of the month Apelleus, in which it is computed that fifty thousand men were slain, over and above those already mentioned.

Mucianus, the following day, entered Rome with his army; and, having restrained the fury of Anthony's soldiers, who were slaying all before them, whether guilty or innocent, pointed out to the people the expediency of choosing Domitian for their governor, till his father should arrive. But the people, being freed from every disagreeable apprehension, would hear of no other governor than Vespasian, whom they extolled to the skies, celebrating a double festival; one for the blessing of the accession of Vespasian to the empire, and the other for their deliverance from the tyranny of Vitellius.

Vespasian is congratulated from all quarters at Alexandria. Sends Titus towards Jerusalem. His several stations in the course of his progress.

WHEN Vespasian arrived at Alexandria, he not only received the agreeable news of what had passed at Rome, but congratulatory addresses from all quarters, upon his advancement to the imperial dignity. Though Alexandria was deemed the largest city in the world, Rome excepted, it proved too small to contain the multitude that resorted thither upon that occasion. The state of affairs at Rome being now settled and secured, the people quiet and easy beyond all expectation, and the winter season passed, Vespasian turned his thoughts towards subduing the remainder of Judæa, and preparing for his journey to the seat of his empire. When he had put every thing in order at Alexandria, he dispatched his son Titus, with a select part of his army, upon an expedition against Jerusalem. Titus went as far as Nicopolis by land, which is twenty furlongs distance from Alexandria, and then embarked his troops, passed down the Nile, along the banks of the Mendesian Canton, to the city of Thumis, and went on shore at a small town, called Tanis. From thence he proceeded to Heracleopolis, and so to Pelusium, where he stayed two days to refresh his troops, and then marched away across the desert, and encamped near the temple of Jupiter Cassius.

The next day he went to Ostracine, a place so extremely dry, that the inhabitants have no water, but what they fetch from other places. His next station was at Rhinocorura, where he stayed awhile, and then went on to Raphin, the first city upon the borders of Syria; thence to Gaza, thence to Ascalon, so to Jamnia and Joppa, and lastly to Cæsarea, in order to strengthen himself by reinforcements.

CHAP. I.

A threefold sedition in Jerusalem. Eleazar begins the breach by setting up the zealots against the people. John of Gischala and Eleazar contend for power. As do afterwards John and Simon. A terrible slaughter in the temple. The deplorable state of Jerusalem. March and order of the army of Titus.

WHEN Titus had marched over the desert, which lies between Egypt and Syria, in the manner before mentioned, he at last came to Cæsarea, with a resolution to draw his troops together, and form his army. But while he was assisting his father Vespasian, at Alexandria, in settling the administration of the empire which Providence had put into their hands, the sedition at Jerusalem was revived, and the factions split into three parties, each faction contending with the other. With respect to the faction of the zealots, which may be deemed the leading cause of the destruction of the city, we have described its rise and progress. It was, in fact, one sedition originating from another, and resembled the fury of a wild beast, that, for want of prey, satiates its ravenous appetite by devouring, as it were, its very self.

Eleazar, the son of Simon, was the first who began the separation in the temple, by setting the zealots against the people, upon a pretence of indignation at the insolent attempts of John of Gischala, while himself was guilty of the same enormities. But the fact was, that the former tyrant could not submit to the tyrant that came after him; and being desirous of gaining the entire power and dominion to himself, revolted from John, and took to his assistance Judas, the son of Chelcias, Simon, the son of Ezron, and Hezekiah, the son of Chobar, all men of rank and eminence, and each of them followed by a great party of the zealots. This party took possession of the inner temple, and placed guards on the sacred porches and doors, in confidence that the provisions of the place, from the multitude of daily oblations, would supply them with all necessaries, and making no difference betwixt things sacred and prophane.

Being thus posted, the only thing they feared was want of men for the execution of any considerable design. John was much the stronger of the two; but what Eleazar wanted in number, was abundantly made good by the advantage of the place, for he had his enemy under him. John could not attempt any thing without loss; so that through fear of a rash action on the one hand, and impatience of inactivity on the other, he was greatly embarrassed. Ambition, however, at length prevailed over discretion: he made several attacks, with darts and other weapons, till the temple was polluted with the gore of dead bodies.

Contest between John and Eleazar

On the other side, the tyrant Simon, the son of Gorias, whom the people, in their distress, had invited and entertained as their governor and protector, having in his possession the upper town, and a great part of the lower, made a vigorous assault upon John and his party, seeing how he was pressed from above by Eleazar. John had the same advantage over Simon that Eleazar had over him; so that, in fact, he had a double contest to maintain; and his efforts proved as powerful with the one as ineffectual with the other; for, in proportion as Eleazar was too hard for John, whom he had under him, so was John too hard for Simon, who was before him. He had little or no difficulty in repelling the attacks from beneath; but was obliged to repel those from above by the engines of war, while these engines did execution not only upon the people in arms, but on those who came out of devotion to worship. It must be acknowledged that these miscreants, even in the outrages of their impieties, gave admittance to all who offered themselves on religious pretences, although the Jews were more liable to examination. Notwithstanding, strangers, that were so happy as to escape the effects of a military fury, frequently fell through casualty and mischance, being cut off by stones and lances, that reached the very altar: nay, the priests themselves, in the exercise of their holy function, fell victims, together with a multitude of persons sons assembled for Divine worship. The altar, by these means, was defiled with the blood not only of the Greeks, but even the wildest barbarians, who had the greatest veneration for the rites of our holy religion. The dead bodies of strangers and of natives, persons holy and prophane, were promiscuously confounded, and their gore streamed in one common flow.

Josephus
deplores the calamities of the Jews.

“O wretched city! The fire and sword of the Romans, which entered by force, and purged it from the pollutions of faction and apostacy, with all the desolation that ensued thereupon, could not be compared with its present deplorable state. It was now no longer the residence of the Most High, being converted by civil broils into a common charnel-house, a just punishment for its most impious provocations. But yet it is not impossible, but that unfeigned repentance might appease the incensed justice of a righteous God, that inflicted this heavy, but deserved, judgment.” But here let me stop, and restrain those passions which I feel as a private individual, while I proceed to relate the consequences of this horrid outrage.

The rage of the factions against each other.

As before observed, Jerusalem was divided into three factions. Eleazar and his party, who had the charge of the first fruits and oblations, became intoxicated, and fell upon John. John sallied out upon Simon, and the people that assisted him with provisions against himself and Eleazar. When John happened to be attacked, at the same time, by Eleazar and Simon, he divided his forces, and held those in play that assaulted him on the city side with stones and arrows from his engines. If at any time he had a little respite from those above him, he was at liberty to make stronger sallies upon Simon and his accomplices; and, as he drove him farther into the town, he burnt all before him, whether magazines or granaries, and, in fact, whatever came in his way. Upon his retreat, Simon followed him, and acted the same destructive part as John had done before. Such, in a word, were their malevolent efforts, that they seemed to have been actuated by a most diabolical spirit, as if they had entered into a conspiracy for betraying Jerusalem to the Romans, by putting it out of a condition of defence, in destroying all that was necessary to preserve it. Accordingly, all places about the temple were burnt down, the city was turned into a desert by the very natives, and intermediate spaces were opened by them for shedding the blood of each other. The provision of corn, and other necessaries, sufficient to have maintained a siege for several years, was almost consumed, which led inevitably to a famine, and the destruction of the city, which they brought upon themselves.

The lamentable calamities of Jerusalem.

Jerusalem now, betwixt the faction within the town, and the assailants without, was like a great body rent asunder. The aged and the women were so distressed by their internal calamities, that they prayed for the success of their very enemies the Romans, and for a foreign war in exchange for a civil one. The citizens were under terrible consternation; nor had they an opportunity of taking counsel, or changing their measures. All passages were guarded; and the heads of the factions, averse to each other as they might be in other points, were agreed in this, that whoever deserved to live should die. They suffered not an individual to escape, who was but suspected to be amicably disposed towards the Romans, but treated them all as common enemies. The clamour of shouts, and the clangor of arms, was heard day and night. The fear of evils to come was a greater misery, though present consternation prevented outward lamentation. No regard was paid to those that were living by their relations; nor was any care taken of burial for those that were dead. The cause of all this was an universal desperation, as he who hath nothing to hope for, hath nothing to fear. Every man that was not of the faction gave himself up for lost, and carried his life in his hand, as if he were to resign it the next moment. The faction, at the same time, maintained their contest, with heaps of carcases under their feet, with a triumphant ostentation, as if the horror of the spectacle had rendered the living as insensible as the dead.

They meditated mischief against themselves; and when they had resolved upon any thing, they executed it without mercy, nor omitted any instance of torment or barbarity. John even perverted to prophane uses the sacred materials that were set apart for the service of the holy temple.

The people and the priests had formerly determined to raise the temple twenty cubits higher, and carry up an arch to support the work. To this end, king Agrippa, at incredible charge and labour, brought from mount Libanus certain curious pieces of timber, both for length and size; but the war breaking out, interrupted the design. John, having occasion for the materials, had the trees cut out into lengths for his own proper use, and then framed into turrets for his security and defence against Eleazar. They were raised along the wall to the westward, over against the great hall, as the only place capable of such a structure, as there were so many staircases in the way. John flattered himself that this impious contrivance would have laid his enemies at his feet; but Providence disappointed him, by bringing the Romans in upon him before he could perfect the work.

When Titus had collected part of his forces, and ordered the remainder to meet him at Jerusalem, he went to Cæsarea, where he had with him, besides the three legions which had formerly made such havock in Judea under his father, the twelfth legion also. They were animated by a desire of revenge for the disastrous encounter they had under Cestius. He ordered the fifth legion to meet him by way of Emmaus, and the tenth by Jericho; while he himself marched with the rest, in conjunction with a body of royal auxiliaries, larger than heretofore, and a great number of Syrians. The detachments that were sent by Vespasian, under Mucianus, into Italy, out of the four legions, he made good out of 2000 choice men of the Alexandrian army that he brought along with him, and 3000 men that followed him from the Euphrates. His best friend and counsellor was Tiberius Alexander, formerly governor of Egypt, but now appointed to command the army, being the first man that espoused the interest of Vespasian in the infancy of his government, entered into a league with him, and stood firm to it, in despite of all the hazards of uncertain fortune. He possessed, in a word, every qualification, natural and acquired, for martial undertakings.

CHAP. II.

Titus marches to Jerusalem. The Jews make a desperate sally as he takes a view of the city. Titus is miraculously preserved. His valour and conduct.

THE following was the order in which Titus marched with his army into the country of the enemy. The auxiliaries led the way. After them came the pioneers, to prepare the roads, and mark out the camp. These were followed by the officers, baggage, and a sufficient guard. Then came Titus himself, with a select body of men, and his ensign bearers about him; a body of horse following them at the head of the engineer of war. After them the Roman eagle, with the ensigns of the legions about it, and trumpets before them; the body of the army marching rank and file, six in front, and the common servants, every one following the legion he belonged to, with the baggage before them. The mercenaries and their guards brought up the rear.

In this order Titus advanced, according to the method of the Roman discipline, by the way of Samaria up to Gophna, a place that his father had formerly taken, in which, there being a garrison, he passed that night, and prosecuted his march next morning to a place the Jews call “The Valley of Thorns,” near the village of Gabath Saul, or “The Valley of Saul,” where he encamped, about thirty furlongs distant from Jerusalem.

At this place Titus put himself at the head of six hundred chosen horse, and led them toward Jerusalem, to take a view of the city, and learn what he could of the state and disposition of the Jews. Being well assured that the people were desirous of peace, weary of their oppressors, and therefore wanted nothing but strength and opportunity for a revolt, he apprehended that, upon sight of him and his army, they might be inclined to bring matters to an accommodation, rather than proceed to extremities.

With this idea he marched towards the city; and, while he went forward in the ready road to the walls, nobody appeared upon the battlements. But, upon crossing over towards the turret called Psephinos, there sallied out a vast number of Jews from the gate over against the sepulchre of Helena, in the quarter they call the Womens Tower, that broke through the main body of the Romans, and cutting off the communication between the two divided parties, they could not relieve one another. Thus confused, the Jews singled out Titus, with a very small number of his people about him, in a place where there was no going forward for the enclosures, gardens, and ditches betwixt him and the wall; and his retreat was intercepted, on the other hand, by a strong body of the enemy, who had got betwixt him and his own people. The guards, not knowing the danger their general was in, supposing him to be yet safe, and in the croud, thought they had nothing to do but to follow on. Titus, therefore, finding, in this extremity, that he had nothing but his sword and his courage to trust to, called out to his fellow-soldiers to follow him, and, at the same time, rushed into the midst of the enemy, to force his way through to the rest of his men.

We may hence learn how far Divine Providence interposes in the events of war, and in the personal preservation of princes. For Titus, who came not out to fight, but to make discoveries, had not provided himself with armour either for his head or body; and yet not one dart or arrow, out of the showers that were launched at him, touched him, but were carried off from the mark, as if they had been designed to miss it.

Titus, in the mean time, cleared his passage on both sides sword in hand, overbearing all before him, and trampling his enemies under his horse's feet. This dauntless resolution of the Roman general drew the rage of the whole party upon him with fury and clamour, insomuch, that they cried out one to another to fall upon him, as the only check to their successes. But which way soever Titus turned the Jews fled before him; yet, at the same time, others pressed him flank and rear; whilst his guards bravely supported him. They found, at last, there was no means of coming off, but by one seasonable, resolute charge quite through the enemy. The gallant effort was made. One of the companions of Titus was slain; another overthrown from his horse, and carried off; while Titus, with the remainder of this noble few, got back to his camp, without so much as one wound. The Jews were elated by this temporary advantage, and looked upon it as an earnest of future success; but they were totally deceived in their expectation.

C H A P. III.

Titus pitches his camp. Domestic factions are united by a foreign war. The Jews sally out upon the Romans, and drive them from their camp. The Romans are alarmed at missing their general. Titus presses upon the Jews as they retire.

ON the coming up of a legion, that night from Emmaus, to join Titus, he marched away, early next morning, to Scopos, a place seven furlongs to the northward from the city. It stands low, and in a fair prospect both of the town and temple, and is therefore very properly called Scopos, or The Prospect. He ordered two legions to encamp upon that spot; and the fifth legion to withdraw three furlongs off, where they might entrench without any danger from the enemy, being much wearied with a tedious night's march. These legions had no sooner proceeded to the execution of their orders, than the tenth legion came up from Jericho, a place lately taken and garrisoned by Vespasian. This last was appointed to encamp six furlongs to the east of Jerusalem, and the Mount of Olives, which is over against the city, and the valley of Cedron betwixt them.

The factions continued to vent their fury upon each other as the bitterest adversaries, till the dread of a foreign war, and a common enemy, produced a reconciliation. Upon the very sight of the Roman camp, the three parties began to think of concord, reasoned with themselves upon the equity and necessity of a composition, and thus expostulated in their present situation: "What will be the end of this, if we suffer ourselves to be surrounded with forts and troops, and remain pent up within walls, the tame spectators of a war, to the advantage of our enemies, and our own destructions? We are only valiant against ourselves, in shedding the blood of each other, to make way for the Romans to a conquest without blood."

Upon this they gathered into parties; and that instant betaking themselves to their arms, made a furious excursion across the valley upon the tenth legion, with horrid clamours and outcries, as they were entrenching their camp.

This sally greatly alarmed the Romans; and their surprize was much increased from an opinion they had entertained, both that the Jews durst not offer it, and that their divisions had rendered them incapable of such an agreement. The soldiers being at work without their arms, the Jews fell upon them unawares, so that every man quitted his station. Some ran away; others fled to their arms, but were cut off before they could make use of them. Flushed with this success, the Jews came flowing in still more and more; and though they were not, in truth, very numerous, their good fortune made them appear so both to the Romans and themselves.

Though the Romans, of all nations upon the face of the earth, are most expert in the art and discipline of war, and discharge their military duties with singular grace and alertness, they were struck with such astonishment at this surprize, that they turned their backs, while the Jews followed them upon the pursuit. As the numbers of the Jews increased through their sallying out of the city, so did the confusion of the Romans through the alarm, till, in the end, they were forced to abandon their camp, and the whole legion had been entirely cut off, if Titus had not come at the precise moment to their succour, and, betwixt reproaches for their cowardice on the one hand, and exemplary bravery on the other, put a stop to their flight. The general took this opportunity of joining the fugitives with a party of choice men of his own, and charging the Jews in flank, killed several of them upon the spot, wounded more, and drove the whole body down into a valley in the greatest disorder. Upon their passing the valley they made a stand, and maintained a fight with the Romans across it till mid-day. In the afternoon Titus reinforced the legion with the troops he had brought to succour it, and posting parties up and down, to secure the Romans from sallies, he ordered the remainder of his forces up the mountain to fortify their camp.

The Jews, that were within distance of observing this motion from the walls, took it for a direct flight; and, as the centinel gave them to understand as much by shaking a garment in the air, as a signal concerted among themselves, they rushed out, upon this intimation, with such outrageous fury, that they resembled an herd of ferocious animals, rather than a number of men. Their violence was so impetuous, that not so much as one man of the contrary party could sustain the shock; and they were all driven, as if it had been by a blow from an engine, some one way, some another, flying up the mountains for refuge.

The factions are compelled to agree by a foreign war.

The Jews sally out upon the Romans.

The Romans are driven from their camp.

Skirmishes between the Jews and Romans.

The Romans are beaten back by the Jews, and retire to the mountains.

In the midst of the acclivity, Titus made ■ stand with a few of his generous resolute friends, who, from the veneration in which they held the dignified character of their general, besought him not to expose his own life any longer against the lives of a desperate rabble of Jews, whose condition was such, that death was the best thing that could befall them, but rather consult his own quality and safety. They reminded him, that he was not there in the circumstances of ■ soldier only, but in the character of the sovereign of the universe, in whose preservation the state of things upon this habitable earth absolutely depended.

Another instance of the fortitude of Titus.

Titus paid not the least attention to their exhortations, but stood upon his guard against all opposition, and encountered all assaults, maiming some, slaying others that pressed upon him, and forcing some again down the mountain into the valley. The vigour and resolution of the prince kept them in some degree of awe, though not sufficient to frighten them into the city again; so that opening to the right and left, they attacked his people on each hand, while Titus, by galling them in the flank, gave some obstruction to the pursuit.

A panic seizes the Romans.

When the Romans, who were fortifying their camp upon the hill, observed the havoc that was made of their companions below, it struck them with such horror and amazement, that the whole legion dispersed, taking it for granted that the Romans were not able to stand before the Jews, and that Titus himself had quitted the field, or (as they thought) his soldiers would never have forsaken him. In the midst of this distraction, an alarm was given to the whole legion, by some who had seen Titus struggling for his life in the midst of his enemies, calling upon them to hasten away to the rescue of their general. The reproach of having abandoned their commander enraged them to such a degree, that, without regard to consequences, they fell with all their might upon the Jews, and drove them before them down the brow of the mountain. The Jews, however, for a while, disputed every foot of ground they lost, till the Romans, through the advantage of the higher station, forced them all down into the valley. Titus pressed upon the Jews as they retired, and sent the legion back again to fortify their camp, staying with those who were with him before to keep the enemy at a distance. It may be affirmed, with that truth which becomes an impartial historian, that this was the second time that Titus saved this legion in the same day, which afforded the soldiers full liberty to fortify and settle their camp.

The Jews make a running fight.

CHAP. IV.

The revival of sedition at the feast of the passover. John overcomes Eleazar. The three factions are reduced to two. Titus moves towards Jerusalem.

A sedition at the feast of the passover.

An execrable design under the mask of religion.

FOREIGN hostilities ceasing for a time, internal sedition was revived. The Paschal feast, or the feast of unleavened bread, being now at hand, Eleazar, and his party, caused the temple gate to be set open for a free entrance to all people that came up to worship. John made use of this religious pretext as a cloak for his treacherous designs, and armed the most inconsiderable of his own party (of whom the greater part were not purified) with weapons concealed under their garments, with instructions how they were to proceed. A tumult immediately arose both within and without; and the uproar was looked upon as a general design upon the whole multitude, by all those who were not in the plot. But Eleazar and the zealots were persuaded that the malice of this exploit was principally levelled at them. The guards drew off from the gates, others leaped down from the battlements without striking a blow, and crept into the temple vaults to hide themselves. The common people, that betook themselves to the altar, were miserably destroyed; some of them crushed and trampled to death in the crowd; others lay weltering in their blood, up and down, as spectacles of horror and despair. Many were slain from private enmity; and to call a man a zealot was a sufficient pretence for taking away his life. But, amidst these barbarities towards the innocent, they granted a truce to the guilty, and connived at their escape out of the caverns, where they had absconded. John's party now seized upon the inner temple, and, by resolutely opposing Simon, reduced the factions to two.

Titus, forming ■ design of decamping from Scopus, and advancing nearer Jerusalem, in order to his removal, posted a competent number of his best troops, to prevent and encounter inroads, and gave it in charge to another detachment, to see all the ways levelled betwixt that and Jerusalem. Upon this they demolished all the hedges and walls which the inhabitants had made about their gardens and groves, cut down all the fruit-trees that lay between them and the wall of the city, filled up all the chasms, and plained the rocky precipices with iron instruments. The whole space was by this means levelled from Scopus, or The Prospect, to Herod's sepulchre, which adjoined to the pool, called The Serpent's Pool,

CHAP. V.

The Romans are deluded by the Jews. Titus suspects the pretence. Titus reproaches his men, and delivers them up to the martial law. The soldiers intercede for their comrades, and obtain their pardon. The siege of Jerusalem.

THE Jews at this time concerted a plot to delude the Romans. The most resolute of the seditious went out of the town a little beyond the place called The Womens Tower, on a pretence that they were ejected by those who were for peace, and durst not venture any farther for fear of the Romans, but there they kept themselves close, and as much out of sight as possible. There was, at the same time, another party upon the walls, that cried aloud for peace, and an alliance with the Romans, imploring them, at the same time, to come over to them, and assuring them that they would open the gates. To grace the imposture, they counterfeited a squabble among themselves; some pretending to press out to the Romans, and others casting stones at them to hinder them, and still persisting, in appearance, either by fair means or foul, to make their way. After several feigned attempts and repulses, they went their way, affecting the utmost chagrin at their disappointment.

The stratagem lured the common soldiers, who looked upon the tower as in their possession already, and pressed most eagerly to be in action, as if there had been nothing wanting but the ceremony of opening the gates to make them masters of it. But Titus had too much penetration and discernment to place confidence in this pretext for invitation, having made them an offer by Josephus, but the day before of what they now affected to desire, when they peremptorily rejected the proposal. He therefore commanded his soldiers in general to stand to their arms, and maintain their posts: but in the meantime, some, that were employed in the trenches, betook themselves to their weapons, and ran towards the gates. Those, who pretended to have been ejected, let them pass without any interruption; but as soon as they had reached the towers on each side of the gate, the Jews followed them close upon the rear, hemmed them in within reach of stones, darts, and other missile weapons, from their engines, plied them with vigour, and killed and wounded great numbers, being so pent up by those that pressed upon their backs, that there was no getting clear of the wall. Besides, through shame and confusion on the one hand, and the fear of punishment on the other, they were hardened into a resolution of prosecuting what they had begun. At length, after a long dispute, and with equal loss on both sides, the Romans forced their way through the body of the Jews, who yet pursued them, in their retreat, with lances, lances, and such like weapons, as far as the sepulchre of Helena, and not without contemptuous reproaches for their foolish credulity. This they did by waving their bucklers over their heads, and exulting all the way with shouts of joy and triumph.

The Roman soldiers, in consequence of this delusion, were upbraided by their officers, and reproved by Titus himself, who, with a degree of resentment and indignation, thus addressed them :

“ How comes it (says he) that the Jews, who have nothing but their despair for their directors, should yet manage their affairs with so much consideration, stratagem, and success? The question is answered in one word : They live in obedience to their superiors, and in good will and union one with another : Whereas the Romans, that have been hitherto so famous for their excellent order and discipline, and consequently for their good fortune, are now fallen off, and destroyed by the headstrong intemperances of their own folly, in making war without officers ; and, which is worst of all, Cæsar himself to be a spectator of this. What a scandal will this be to the very rules and orders of arms ! Or what will my father say, when he shall come to hear of it ? A general that, in the whole course of a long and military life, never met with any thing like it before. Now, such is the severity of martial law, that it makes it capital for any man to depart from the strict rule of discipline, even in a small matter ; but in this case the whole army are deserters. And be it known to you all, that, according to the strictness of the Roman discipline, victory itself is a scandal when it is gained without order for fighting.”

From the manner in which Titus delivered these words, it was evident to the officers, that he determined to put the martial law into execution ; so that the whole body of offenders gave themselves up for lost, being conscious they deserved the justice they feared. The other legions, however, applied to the general with petitions in behalf of their unfortunate fellow-soldiers, imploring his pardon for the failings of a rash few for the sake of a great number that stood firm, upon assurance that they would atone, by their future services, for their past faults. Titus, upon reflection, calling to mind, that however requisite severity might be towards individuals who were delinquents, the same reason did not hold good with respect to numbers, complied with the petition of the intercessors, and forgave what was past, upon condition of their behaving in a more prudent, as well as obedient, manner in future ; and thenceforward meditated means of avenging himself upon the Jews for their treachery.

When the space between the Romans and the walls had been levelled, which was done in four days, he ordered the choice part of his army to advance towards the ramparts betwixt north and west ; the foot drawn up in seven battalions, and the horse in three squadrons, with archers betwixt them. This being a force sufficient to prevent or repel all sallies, was, of course, a security for the baggage and train thereunto belonging. Titus himself encamped at the distance of two furlongs from the city, over against the tower called Psephinos, upon that angle of the wall where it winds off from the north to the westward. He entrenched another part of his army towards the tower of Hippicos, about two furlongs from the city ; while the tenth legion continued in its former situation upon the mount of Olives.

CH A P. VI.

Description of Jerusalem. Three famous towers. A dismal conflagration. Structure of the temple. Its utensils and appurtenances. The fort of Antonia particularly described.

THE city of Jerusalem was fortified with three walls on those parts which were not encompassed with impassable vallies, where there was but one. It was built upon two hills opposite to each other, and a deep valley betwixt them covered with houses. Of these hills, that which contains the upper city is much higher, and in length more direct, so that, from the strength of its situation, king David formerly called it “ The Citadel : but it is now called by us “ The Upper Market-Place.”

The hills on which the city was built.

The lower town is seated upon another hill, that bears the name of Acra, with a steep declivity round about it. There was formerly another hill over against this, but lower than Acra, and formerly parted from the other by a broad valley ; but the princes of the Asmonæan race caused it to be filled up, being desirous of joining the city to the temple, which by that means overlooked and commanded all the rest. The name of the aforesaid valley, that divides the upper town from the lower, is Tyropæon : it stretches as far as the fountain of Siloam, that affords an excellent water, and in great abundance.

The fountain of Siloam.

The oldest of the three walls was almost impregnable, by reason of the depth of the valley below, and the overhanging of the rock from above, upon which it was erected. Besides the natural advantage of the situation, David, Solomon, and several other princes, contributed to the further strengthening it by all the means of art, industry, and expence. This wall began on the north, at the tower of Hippicos, and extended as far as a place called the Xistus, ending at the western porch of the temple. It passed on the other side, reckoning from the same place by Bethso to the Essene-gate, and to the southward by the fountain of Siloam, where it strikes off to the eastward, towards the pool of Solomon, and thence by Ophlas to the east porch of the temple.

The three walls.

The second wall begins at Genath, a gate belonging to the former wall, and so runs on upon the north side of the city to the fort of Antonia.

The third wall began at the tower of Hippicos, and ran northward to that of Psephinos, over against the sepulchre of Helena, queen of Adiabena, and mother of king Izates, passing along by the royal caverns, from the tower at the corner, towards that which they call the Monument of the Fuller, whence it came up to the old wall in the vale of Cedron. This wall was the work of Agrippa, for the security of that part of the town he had built, which before was naked and defenceless. The city, by this time, became so populous, that its space was too circumscribed for the inhabitants, so that, by degrees, they crept out into a kind of suburbs ; and on the north side of the temple, next the hill, their building increased extremely.

There was another hill that fronted Antonia, with ditches cut out of a prodigious depth betwixt them, so that there was no coming at the foundation of Antonia to undermine it ; beside that the sinking of the trench added so much to the height of the tower. They gave the fourth hill the name of Bezeth, or Bethelda, being an enlargement only of the former. When this place came to be inhabited, the people earnestly desired to have it fortified ; and Agrippa, the father of the king of the same name, modelled his design, and ran up this wall about it that we have described. But it occurring to him that Claudius Cæsar might take some offence and jealousy at the pomp and ostentation of so magnificent a work, Agrippa went no farther than laying the foundation, and so dropped the project ; whereas, if he had pursued it, Jerusalem might never have been taken.

The stones of this wall were twenty cubits in length, and ten in breadth, and so hard and firm, that they were proof against either mining or battery. The wall was also ten cubits thick, and would have been high in proportion, if they had persisted in the work. The Jews, indeed, carried it up afterwards to twenty cubits, with battlements of two cubits at the top, and parapets of three, which, in all, make twenty-five cubits. The wall was fortified with towers of twenty cubits square, as substantial as itself, itself, and not inferior, for strength and beauty, to the stones and workmanship of the temple.

The circumference of the city. These towers were raised twenty cubits above the wall, with winding stair-cases leading up to them, convenient apartments at the top, and cisterns for rain water. Upon the third wall there were ninety towers of the same form, and at the equal distance of two hundred cubits one from another. The middle wall had only fourteen towers, and the old wall sixty. The compass of the whole city was thirty-three furlongs.

The third wall was an exquisite piece of workmanship from one end to the other; but yet not comparable to the tower called Psephinos. It stood upon the angle of the wall, north-west of the city, upon that quarter where Titus had encamped. Being seventy cubits high, it afforded, on a clear day, a prospect of Arabia, the sea, and uttermost confines of the Hebrews. It was, in figure, an octagon; and over against it was the tower of Hippicos: and hard by it were two other towers, erected by Herod on the old wall, which, for magnitude, beauty, and strength, were looked upon as master-pieces. For, besides other instances of the magnanimity and magnificence of this king towards the city of Jerusalem, he caused these to be erected in so extraordinary a manner, to gratify a particular inclination, dedicating them to the memory of three persons, for whom he possessed the greatest esteem, his brother, his friend, and his wife; the two former having signalized themselves by dying gloriously in the field of battle, and the other being slain at his own instance in a fit of jealousy.

Three famous towers erected by Herod, Hippicos, Phasaelus, and Mariamne.

The tower of Hippicos, so named from one of his friends, had four angles, five and twenty cubits in breadth, and thirty in height, and the whole body of it solid. Above this was a platform of stone accurately joined, and a receptacle for rain water of twenty cubits depth. On this terrace were two stones of five and twenty cubits each, divided into several apartments; and over that building were two battlements of two cubits in height, and parapets of three cubits all round, amounting, in the whole, to the height of eighty-five cubits.

Herod called the second tower Phasael, from the name of his brother. Its breadth and height were forty cubits. It was solid within from top to bottom. Above this was a porch ten cubits high, supported with arches, and embellished with divers curiosities. Over the middle of this porch was another, with elegant baths and apartments belonging to it, suitable to the magnificence of the royal founder. On the top of it were battlements and fortifications; the whole height of the tower falling little short of ninety cubits. It had, at a distance, some resemblance of the watch-tower of Pharos, the famous land-mark to those that sailed towards Alexandria; but much larger; and at this time the residence of Simon, that oppressive tyrant.

The third tower was Mariamne, so called from the name of his queen. It was twenty cubits square, and 55 cubits high. It must be allowed, that the structure, apartments, and furniture of the other two towers were pompous and elegant; but they were as much beneath the curiosity, beauty, and ornament of this, as this fell short of the strength of the other two, being properly adapted to the delicacy of the fair sex.

Though these towers were very high, they appeared more so from the place on which they were raised: for the old wall they stood upon was itself erected upon a very high piece of ground, and those turrets were advanced upon the top of a hill that was yet thirty cubits higher than the ancient wall. Nor were they less admirable for the materials they were composed of than the structure. The stones were neither common, or of a weight to be removed with hands: they were of white marble, cut out into planks, twenty cubits in length, ten in breadth, and five in depth, and put together with such art, that there were no joints to be seen; so that every distinct tower looked like one entire piece.

As these towers were on the south-side of the wall, the king had thereunto adjoined a palace, The palace royal. magnificent beyond description. It was enclosed with a wall thirty cubits high, and adorned with turrets, of the best workmanship, planted around it, at an equal distance one from the other, with elegant apartments, and spacious halls for public entertainments. There was an incredible collection of the choicest marble, for variety of colours, that could possibly be purchased. The roofs were wonderful, both for the length of the beams, and the splendour of their ornaments. The number of apartments was very great, and they were amply furnished with whatever could tend to elegance or convenience. There were porches and galleries in abundance, leading in a kind of circle from one to another, and in each of them a row of pillars. The courts, that lay to the open air, had the agreeable prospect of divers groves, and many nurseries of plants, long and pleasant walks, beset with cisterns, fountains, pipes, and brazen figures issuing forth water, with flights of tame pigeons gathering about it for refreshment. But, indeed, it is impossible to give a complete description of this sumptuous palace: besides, it is irksome to call to remembrance the devastation that was made of it by an impious crew of incendiaries and traitors. This conflagration was not the work of the Romans, but a band of miscreants, as we have already observed, upon the breaking out of these tumults, who burnt all from the fort of Antonia, and then carrying the fire into the palace, set the roofs of the three towers in a blaze.

The temple, as before observed, was built upon a very hard rock, which was so steep, that, at first, there was scarce ground on the top sufficient for the sacred fabric, and the enclosure that was to be about it. When king Solomon erected this edifice, he commanded the running up a wall to the eastward of it to keep up the earth; and having thus far secured it, he built a porch upon the rampart. There was not as yet any other fortification; but the people carrying up mould from time to time, the banks became greatly enlarged. They broke down, some time after this, the north-wall, and took in as much ground thereto as served, at length, for the foundation of the whole temple.

The design succeeded so much beyond expectation, that they encompassed the hill with three walls, at a prodigious expence of time and treasure: for it was not only the work of ages, but the whole mass of religious oblations from all parts of the world, to the honour and service of the Most High, was expended upon this undertaking, computing the charge as well of the upper as of the lower temple, which latter was erected upon a foundation of three hundred cubits deep; but the depth did not appear, as the valley was now filled up to the very level of the streets in the city. The stones, provided for this immense work, were forty cubits in length, which proves, upon the whole, that liberality, constancy, and perseverance can effect astonishing things.

As the foundations were wonderful, so the magnificence of the superstructure was not inferior to that of the ground-work. The galleries were all double, upheld by pillars of white marble, all of a piece, and five and twenty cubits in height, wainscotted with cedar, most curiously carved, so that they exhibited a most elegant view to the spectator. They were all thirty cubits over, and six furlongs the whole compass of them, including the tower of Antonia. These entire courts, that were exposed to the air, were laid with stones of all sorts: but the second court was lined on each side with stone ballustrades of three cubits high, delicately wrought, and highly polished. In this passage were several pillars, disposed in regular form and order, with moral precepts inscribed upon them in Latin and Greek, and positively forbidding strangers to enter into that holy place; for the second court was called the sanctuary, and was ascended by fourteen steps above the first. The figure of it was four-square, with a wall peculiar to itself, which, though forty cubits without, was but twenty-five within, the place being covered with steps that led to ascend it. This wall being being built upon an advanced ground, with steps to it, part of the inside was so obscured by the hill, that it could not be discerned. At the top of these fourteen steps there was a plain level of three hundred cubits up to the wall, and from thence five steps more to the gates of the temple. There were also four from the north, as many from the south, and two from the east.

The women had an oratory, or place of worship, by themselves, with a partition wall to it, and two gates, one to the south, and the other to the north, which were the two only passages of entrance for the women; nor were they permitted to pass their own. This place was free indifferently to women, inhabitants as well as strangers, that came hither on purposes of devotion. The west side was a dead wall, without any door at all. Betwixt the aforesaid gates, and over against the wall, near the treasury, there were galleries, with stately pillars to support them, single, and, excepting their magnitude, not inferior to those of the lower court.

Some of the gates were plated over with gold and silver, posts, fronts and all: but there was one without the temple of Corinthian brass, which was much the richer metal of the three. There were double doors to every gate, each thirty cubits high, and fifteen broad. They were wider within, and had drawing rooms on each hand, of thirty cubits square, after the manner of turrets, upwards of twenty cubits high, each of them borne up with pillars of twelve cubits in thickness, the other gates being of the same dimensions in proportion. As to the Corinthian portal, on the east-side of the temple, where the women entered, it was certainly the largest and most magnificent of them all, being fifty cubits high, and the gold and silver plates upon it more substantial than those that Alexander, the father of Tiberius, laid upon the other nine. There were fifteen steps which led from the wall of the court of the women to the greater gate, whereas those that led thither from the other gates were five steps shorter.

The holy temple itself, called emphatically the sanctuary, was placed in the middle, with twelve steps to ascend it. The height of it was an hundred cubits, and the breadth as many in the front; but behind it wanted forty of that number. The height of the first gate was seventy cubits, and twenty-five over; but it had no doors, being an emblem visible and open to the whole world. The front and out-sides were gilt; nor was there any thing in the middle of the temple that had not a brilliant lustre.

The inner part was divided into two partitions. The first of them in sight was open to the top, which was ninety cubits in height, forty in length, and twenty in breadth. There were lavers and branches of vines over head, and large clusters of grapes that hung pendant, between five and six feet deep, all of gold. The other partition of the temple, being coiled above, appeared the lower of the two. The doors also of it were of gold, fifty-five cubits in height, and sixteen in breadth, with a piece of Babylonian tapestry hanging before them of the same dimensions, interwoven with blue, purple, and scarlet, in a most curious manner. Nor was this mixture of colours without a mystical interpretation, as it alluded to the four elements, either by the colours themselves, or the matter of which they were composed; the scarlet representing the fire, the silk the earth that produced it, the azure the air, and the purple the sea from whence it comes. So that this veil, or hanging, was, in miniature, an emblem of the universe.

This entrance led to the lower part of the temple; the height and length of it was sixty cubits, and the breadth twenty. This length of sixty cubits was then subdivided into two unequal parts, one of forty cubits, and the other of twenty. The former part, of forty cubits, had in it the three wonders that had been celebrated over the whole world, the candlestick, the table of shew-bread, and the altar of incense. The candlestick had seven branches all out of the same stem, with seven lights, representing the seven planets. The twelve loaves of shew-bread, upon the table, pointed at the twelve signs of the zodiac, and the course of the year. By the thirteen sorts of perfumes in the censer upon the altar of incense, with which the sea replenished it, we are given to understand, that the Almighty Creator is sovereign of the universe, and that all things are formed for his honour and service.

The inner part of the temple being only twenty cubits in height, was also divided by a veil from the other: nor was any man permitted to enter, or so much as look into it. It was called the Sanctuary, or Holy of Holies. Upon the sides of this lower temple there were several apartments leading from one to another, with three stories over head, and passages into them out of the great portal. The upper part, being narrower than the other, could not have the convenience of the same order of chambers; but it was forty cubits higher, though the less splendid of the two. Thus we collect that the whole height, including the sixty cubits from the floor, amounted to an hundred cubits.

The curiosity and beauty of the outside of the temple was charming to a degree, being faced every where with substantial golden plates, that sparkled like the beams of the sun, and dazzled the eye of the beholder. Where there was no gilding, the parts were so delicately white, that it appeared, at a distance, to travellers, like a marble mountain, or pillar of snow. The roof was covered with sharp-pointed spikes, to prevent any pollution by birds sitting upon it. Some of the stones of this building were forty-five cubits in length, five in height, and six in breadth.

The altar before the temple was fifteen cubits high, and forty square, with four angles to it, resembling horns. The passage to the altar was by an insensible acclivity. It was formed without any iron tool. There was a partition raised of stone-work, curiously wrought, and of one cubit in height, enclosing the temple, or the sanctuary and the altar, and separating the people from the priests. No unclean persons, either male or female, were suffered in the temple, or even in the city: nor were men allowed to enter the inner temple without being first purified, and even then also they were not to mix with the priests.

Those of the sacerdotal race, that were hindered by any defect from the exercise of their function, took their places with those that had none, and had their allowance in common with the rest, but under the distinction of a lay habit: for no man is allowed to wear the vestments of a priest, but he that actually executes the office.

The priests that ministered in the temple, and at the altar, were to be men exemplary in their lives and conversation, and without either scandal or blemish. Their cloathing was to be fine linen, and they were to be abstemious and temperate in their eating and drinking, out of reverence to their holy function. The high-priest went up, with the other priests, to the altar every seventh day, upon the first day of every month, and upon all public anniversary festivals, when he officiated in a veil girt about him, and hanging down over part of his thighs, with a linen veil under it, that reached down to the ground. On both these he wore a large violet coloured garment, fringed at the bottom, and golden bells and pomegranates interchangeably fastened to it; the bells representing the thunder, and the other the lightning. His pectoral, or girdle, that tied the garment to the breast, was embroidered with five rows of variegated colours, as gold, purple, scarlet, linen, and violet, which were the colours also of the veils of the temple.

The like embroidery was upon the ephod; but it had more gold in it, its form resembling that of a breast piece. It was bound together with two golden buckles, and set with the largest and richest sardonyx stones that could be procured, with the names of the twelve tribes of Israel inscribed upon them. There were also four rows of emeralds hanging down in the order of three and three in a row; that is to say,

The tower of Antonia.

The fort of Antonia was built in an angle betwixt the two galleries of the firſt temple, looking weſt and north. It was raiſed upon a rock of fifty cubits in height, inacceſſibly ſteep on all hands, and, in fine, the greateſt of Herod's works, both for magnificence and contrivance. The rock was faced with thin ſcales of marble from the bottom to the top, both for ornament and ſecurity, as it was ſo ſlippery there was no poſſibility of aſcending or deſcending it. This tower was encloded with a wall only of three cubits high; and within that compaſs ſtood the fort of Antonia, of forty cubits, with the ſtate, ſplendor, and conveniencies of a court, containing apartments and offices for all purpoſes, with ſpacious halls and places of parade for the uſe and ſervice of a camp: ſo that, in point of accommodation, it might be deemed a city rather than a fort; and, in point of magnificence, it vied even with a palace. It bore, upon the whole, the reſemblance of a tower; and was encompassed with four other towers at equal diſtances from each other, and one from every corner. Three of them were fifty cubits in height; but the fourth, that looked to the ſouthward and eaſtward, was ſeventy, and from thence had a view of the whole temple. From the place where the galleries joined them were, upon the right and left, paſſages for the ſoldiers to go down to the temple. For when the Romans were maſters of Jeruſalem, there were guards poſted ſtill at that quarter to prevent ſeditious upon their public feſtivals and meetings. The temple commanded the city, as Fort Antonia commanded the temple. This place had a guard upon it; and Herod's palace was as good as a fort to the upper town. The hill Bethelda was cut off from Antonia, and joined to part of the new town, and was the only place that hindered the ſight of the temple on the north ſide. Let this then ſuffice for a deſcription of the city of Jeruſalem and its appurtenances.

C H A P. VII.

Simon's party greatly increaſed. John is poſſeſſed of the temple. The factions are as violent as ever, though the Romans are at the very gates of the city. Titus takes a ſurvey, in order to make an aſſault. Nicanor being baſely wounded, Titus meditates revenge. Orders three attacks. The factions fall heavy on the Roman engineers. Titus ſupports them. The Romans beaten back to their camp. A party of Alexandrians recover the honour of the day. Titus forces the Jews into the city.

THE party of the ſeditious Jews, under Simon, amounted to ten thouſand men, beſides Idumæans, which were five thouſand more, comprizing in the whole fifteen thouſand. The ten thouſand Jews had fifty commanders, of whom Simon was chief. The other five thouſand, under twenty officers, were the moſt daring of the whole faction. The principals were James, the ſon of Soſias, and Simon, the ſon of Cathlas.

ſeſſion of the

John was now in poſſeſſion of the temple, with ſix thouſand men, under the command of twenty principal officers. There came into him alſo two thouſand four hundred of the zealots, who enliſted themſelves under Eleazar, whom they had formerly ſerved, and Simon, the ſon of Arinus.

In this oppoſition of the two parties the people were common robbers, and thoſe who were peaceably diſpoſed were plundered by both factions. Simon was now maſter of the upper town, and the great wall as far as Cedron, and as much of the old wall as bent from Siloam to the eaſt, and reached down to the palace of Monobazus, who was king of the Adiabeniens, a people beyond the Euphrates. He was poſſeſſed alſo of the hill of Acra, the ſeat of the lower town, as far as the palace of queen Helena, the mother of Monobazus. But John, in the mean time, held the temple, and the places thereunto adjoining. As for Ophlas, the vale of Cedron, and what lay between him and Simon, it was all conſumed to aſhes, and could only ſerve as a ſpot for action.

Though the Romans were at this time drawn up at the very gates of Jeruſalem, internal ſedition did not ceaſe. The enemy preſſing upon them, brought them ſometimes to a degree of reflection and moderation; but, upon the leaſt ſuſpenſion of aſſault, they relapſed into factions amongſt themſelves, and contended together upon former pretenſions. They tended to the advantage of the Romans, as they treated each other with more malignity than they were treated by the common enemy, and were in ſo wretched a ſtate that they had no new calamity to fear. They were reduced to harder extremities, indeed, before the city was totally deſtroyed: but the Romans atchieved a much greater exploit than the taking of the city; for, if the ſedition deſtroyed the city, the Romans deſtroyed that very ſedition, which was a far greater work than the bare demolition of the walls: ſo that, in fact, the Jews themſelves brought this ruin on their own heads; and the Romans were only the executioners of Divine juſtice upon them for their wickedneſs.

While affairs were in this poſture in the city, Titus, with a ſelect party of horſe, took the whole tour of the walls, to find out upon what quarter it lay moſt expoſed to an attack. It was totally inacceſſible, he obſerved, by the way of the vallies; and on the other ſide, the firſt vale was ſo firm as to repel the force of battery. After ſome pauſe, he pitched upon that part of the line towards the ſepulchre of John, the high-prieſt, as the moſt convenient place for an aſſault, the firſt wall being lower there, and likewise cut off from the ſecond wall; for they had neglected the fortifying it, the new city being but thin of inhabitants. Here alſo was an eaſy paſſage to the third wall, and ſo to the upper town; and, with the help of fort Antonia, they might take the very temple itſelf.

While Titus was weighing theſe matters in his mind, one of his particular friends, by name Nicanor, was wounded in his left ſhoulder by an arrow from the wall, as he was endeavouring, together with Joſephus, to perſuade the Jews to pacific meaſures. Titus was ſo tranſported at this inſtance of ingratitude towards thoſe that endeavoured to perſuade them to what tended to their own preſervation, that he immediately determined on a moſt vigorous proſecution of the ſiege. He alſo, at the ſame time, gave his ſoldiers leave to pillage, and ſet the ſuburbs on fire, ordering them to make uſe of the rubbiſh and ruins for works and platforms. He divided his army into three bodies, aſſigning to each diviſion their employments and ſtations. He diſpoſed of his archers and ſlingers in the miſt of the banks that were then raiſing, with engines to caſt javelins, darts, and ſtones before them. This ſerved for two purpoſes, either to repel the enemies ſallies, or to hold them in play upon the walls. The trees were all cut down, the ſuburbs laid naked in an inſtant, and the timber employed in raiſing the banks. The whole army, in fine, were buſily engaged in their works, nor were the Jews idle at ſo important a criſis.

Titus
ſolves to the ſiege.

Thoſe of the citizens of Jeruſalem, who had been formerly expoſed to robberies and murders, finding the faction ſo wholly taken up in their own defence, began to flatter themſelves with ſome proſpect of eaſe, in the very hope that the Romans themſelves, if they obtained the victory, would be avenged on those who had been the authors of their miseries.

John's party made a resolute defence against the assailants; but he himself durst not stir out of the temple, for fear of Simon. Simon, being posted next the enemy, was never out of action. He planted all along the wall the engines he had formerly taken from Celsus, and out of the fort of Antonia. But they were of little advantage to the people, through a want of understanding the right use and management of them, as all the skill they had was derived from the information of a deserter. They plied them, however, so as to gall the enemy from the ramparts with arrows and stones, falling out also in small parties, and entering into skirmishes with the Romans, who, on the other side, covered their workmen with hurdles.

The Roman legions had engines of wonderful contrivance to repel the efforts of the enemy, and especially the tenth, not only for the casting of large stones, but throwing them more forcibly, and to a greater distance. Every stone cast by these engines was of a talent weight, and did execution not only at hand, but at the top of the walls and ramparts, though at the distance of a furlong, and where it fell it carried a whole file before it. The Jews were several ways apprized of these stones: first, as they were white, and easily discerned in their passage; secondly, by the noise they made in the air; and, thirdly, from the notice given them by the watchmen placed upon the walls, who had instructions to observe the playing these engines, and when any of them was discharged, to exclaim, in the mother tongue, "The stone comes." This gave every man time to secure himself. The Romans, after this, discoloured the stones, that they might not be discovered in their course, and, by means of that invention, sometimes slew several Jews at one blow. But all was not sufficient to divert them from opposing the progress of the enemy in raising their banks; for they persisted, night and day, in doing all that was possible to be done, by policy and courage, to obstruct their proceedings.

As soon as the Romans had completed their works, they measured the distance from the bank to the wall by the lead and line, for it could not be done otherwise, as there was no approaching it on account of the arrows and darts that were showered down from above. When they found the engines could reach the walls, Titus ordered them to be brought up, and placed at proper distances, but under the objects, that they might have more liberty to play. Hereupon they set three batteries to work at a time upon three several parts of the wall. The terrible noise of the engines was heard throughout the city: the citizens exclaimed with horror at it, and the factions trembled with apprehensions. The divided members of this sedition, finding themselves exposed to one common danger, deemed it expedient to join in one common defence. They were now sensible that, as they went on, they were furthering the design of the enemy; and that, if they could not come to a final accommodation, it was indispensably necessary, at present, to join unanimously against the Romans.

Simon, upon this, dispatched a messenger to those who had shut themselves up in the temple, and a commission to tell them, that to many of the Jews were disposed to come out, and advance to the wall, had free liberty to do so. John, however, placed no confidence in the good faith of the messenger, but left his party to their own freedom.

The factions coalesced immediately upon this venture, and laying aside particular quarrels, they set up to the walls in a full body. When they had posted themselves for their purpose, they first set their fires and torches upon the Roman engines, pressing furiously upon those who had the direction of them, with darts and other weapons without intermission. Nay, in the heat of their rage and resolution, the Jews leaped down desperately from the walls in troops upon the very engines, tore off their covers, and broke in upon the soldiers that were to defend them.

No. 3.

Titus, in this confusion, dispatched, with all expedition, a party of horse and archers upon the guard of the engines, to keep off the fire, and, by holding the Jews in play upon the walls, leave the engineers at liberty to do execution. But all this bartering made little or no impression. One ram, of the fifth legion, indeed, shook the corner of a tower, but without any damage to the wall itself; for the tower being much higher than the wall, it fell without drawing any part of the wall after it.

The Jews having, for a short time, intermitted their sallies, the Romans imputed it either to fear or weariness, and so became indolent and inattentive, as in a state of security. But when the Jews observed this from the town, and that they were scattered and out of order, they made a furious sally from the tower of Hippicos, set fire to their works, and, in the heat of this success, forced the assailants back to their very camp. The alarm spread immediately throughout the whole army, and the Romans, far and near, drew presently together, for the relief of their companions. The grand conflict was about the engines, how to burn them on the one side, and save them on the other. The air was rent with outcries from both parties, and many brave men fell in the encounter; but the Jews were much the bolder and more adventurous. The fire at length seized the engines, and they had certainly been destroyed, with all that belonged to them, had they not been supported by a choice party of Alexandrian troops, who performed wonders upon the occasion, and had a great share in the honour of the action.

This was the state of things, till the general himself, with a select body of horse, attacked the enemy, slew twelve men with his own hand, and drove the rest before him into the city. This exploit was the saving of the engines. It happening in this encounter that a Jew was taken alive, Titus ordered him to be crucified before the wall, to try how far such an exemplary terror might work upon the rest. But after the Jews were retired, John, a principal officer of the Idumaeans, as he was talking with a soldier before the walls, was shot with an arrow through the heart by an Arabian, to the great grief of all that knew him, being a man eminent for his valour and wisdom.

CHAP. VIII.

The Romans are alarmed by the fall of a tower in the night. The Jews are greatly annoyed from the towers. They behave with great intrepidity, and make several bold sallies; but the Roman discipline prevails against their temerity. Attackment of Simon's men to their leader. Extraordinary fortitude of Longinus.

THE next night a dreadful tumult in the Roman camp. Titus had given orders for the raising three towers, of fifty cubits, upon three several ramparts, so as to have the command of the town wall. In the dead of the night one of these towers fell down to the ground with so dreadful a noise, that the surprize alarmed the whole army. Supposing that the enemy was coming to attack them, they all ran to their arms, which occasioned a great tumult and disturbance amongst the legions. Some fancied the Jews might have a hand in it; various, indeed, were their conjectures; till, in the end, they became jealous of each other, and every one demanded of his neighbour the "Watchword" with great earnestness, and with the same formality and strictness, as if the Jews had invaded their camp. They lay under the consternation of this panic till Titus was informed of the whole matter, and made the truth of it public by proclamation. This, with some difficulty, put an end to the commotion.

The Jews stood firm against all difficulties but those of the towers, which could not be disputed, nor avoided. From thence they were palled by all kinds of engines, archers, &c. while they had no remedy remedy against them; for it was impossible for them to carry up the platform to the height of these turrets: they were also too strong and heavy to be overturned; nor could they be burned, as they were plated with iron. The Jews had, therefore, only to retire out of reach of the darts, arrows, and stones, without endeavouring to oppose the force of the battering rams, which, through the shock of repeated strokes, at length prevailed.

The Romans had one formidable engine, which the Jews called Nikon, or the conqueror, and it was this that made the first breach. The besieged were, by this time, so spent with watching and fighting, (having been upon duty all night,) that, betwixt disposition and ill advice, they came to an agreement among themselves to quit the first wall, having two others yet to trust to.

The Jews retire from the first wall, and the Romans get possession of it.

Upon this they retired, and the Romans mounted the breach that the Nikon had made, and after that opened the gates to the whole army, the Jews being all withdrawn to the second wall. Thus did the Romans get possession of the first wall on the fifteenth day of the siege, which was the seventh day of the month Artemesius, when they demolished great part of it, as they did of the northern parts of the city, which Cestius had ravaged before.

Titus, being now removed to a place they call the Camp of the Assyrians, possessed himself of all betwixt that and the valley of Cedron, something more than a bow-shot from the second wall, resolving from thence to begin his attack, and accordingly immediately entered upon it. The Jews posted themselves upon the wall, and made a gallant resistance. John, and his party, engaged in the fortrefs of Antonia, and at the north side of the temple, from the sepulchre of Alexander. Simon, and his party, maintained the passage from the monument of John, the high-priest, to the gate, by which water is conveyed to the tower of Hippicos. The Jews made several desperate sallies, and fought closely with the Romans a considerable time; but the discipline of the latter overcame the inexperience and temerity of the former, who were therefore repulsed with great loss; only upon the walls they had the better of them. The Romans had both fortune and conduct on their side; but the Jews supported themselves by a kind of despairing ferocity, and a hardiness against fatigue and danger.

Make bold sallies. Effects of the Roman discipline.

It is farther to be considered, that the Jews fought for life and safety, the Romans for victory and honour; and they were neither of them to be tired out; for approaches, assaults, sallies, and combats of every kind, were their daily exercises. They began with the dawn of the day, and so continued till night parted them, when both sides were kept waking; the one from fear of their walls, the other from fear of their camp; all night in arms, and the next morning, by day-light, ready for a battle.

Intrepidity of the Jews.

The Jews valued themselves so much upon contempt of death and danger, that they made it a point of emulation, who should dare most, as the only way to ingratiate themselves with their superiors. Such were the fear and reverence they had for Simon, that all and every man of his party would have died at his feet, if he had but said the word; nay, would have been their own executioners. As to the Romans, they were so accustomed to victory, that they scarcely knew what it was to be overcome; so that they needed no other incentive to behave gallantly than experience and success. Besides, war was familiar and habitual to them, by the continual exercise of arms in the service of a glorious empire, which, with the presence and assistance of a martial prince, over and above all the rest, could not but inspire them with more than ordinary courage. What could be more infamous than cowardice under so gallant a leader? Or what more glorious, on the other hand, than the bounty and esteem of a leader famed for great and noble exploits? Such ardour and ambition have transported heroic spirits to soar to daring attempts almost beyond human power.

The Romans invincible.

There was, at this time, a strong body of Jews drawn up before the walls, and they were come within distance of exchanging weapons with the Romans. While they were engaging, Longinus, one of the equestrian order, rode into the midst of the enemy, and slew two of their bravest officers. One of them he struck through the jaw with his lance, and ran the other through the body with the same weapon, coming off to his party without a wound. He gained renown by this action, and inspired others with a generous emulation of following his example.

Heroic action of Longinus.

The Jews, at this time, were so intent, through despair, of doing mischief, that they were heedless of what they suffered, and let death itself at defiance, if they had but one life in exchange for another. But Titus, on the other hand, had regard to the lives of his men as well as the obtaining of victory, and justly looked upon an inconsiderate temerity as another kind of desperation. Nor would he deem any exploit truly valiant that was not directed by caution or prudence.

CHAP. IX.

Castor, a bold, crafty, and treacherous Jew, imposes on the humanity of Titus. Makes his escape through the very flames. Mercy misapplied, bad policy.

TITUS having ordered one of his engines to be pointed against the middle of the tower, on the north-side of the city, it poured in such showers of arrows upon the besieged, that they all quitted their posts; but a certain crafty Jew, whose name was Castor, and ten others like himself, lay in ambush behind the battlements. Being alarmed by a violent shock, that caused the tower to totter under them, they arose, and Castor, in behalf of himself and the rest, addressed Titus, in the posture and language of an imploring suppliant, for mercy and pardon. The Roman general, from a principle of moderation and candour, thinking that the Jews repented of their rashness and obstinacy, ordered a stop both to the engine and the archers, and gave Castor to understand that he was disposed to hear what he had to offer. The subtle Jew submissively assured him that he desired nothing so earnestly as a treaty. Titus cordially assented, and told him, that, if his companions were of the same mind, he was ready to grant them his pardon. Five of the ten dissembled with their principal: the other five exclaimed, that, while they could die free, they would never live slaves. This occasioning a suspension of the attack, Castor, in the interval, sent privately to Simon, and informed him that he had now time to deliberate on future measures, as he would delude the Roman general, under the pretext of advising those of his associates, who remained inflexible, to come into terms of peace.

Perfidy and treachery of Castor and ten associates.

The artful Jew performed his part with admirable adroitness; swords were drawn by the contending parties, blows given, and men apparently slain. Titus, and those about him, were amazed at the obstinacy and hardiness of the Jews; nor could they refrain from compassionating their miserable state: but being upon the lower ground, they could not see so distinctly what was done above. While this passed, Castor, being wounded with an arrow upon the nose, drew it out, and held it up to Titus, as an appeal to him for justice. The noble Roman resented the seeming injury to such a degree, that he ordered Josephus, who stood by him, to go to Castor, with assurance, in his name, of amity and fair quarter. Josephus begged to decline the commission, and dissuaded his friends from going upon it, telling them, that the pretended submission was founded on a fraudulent design. Eneas, however, one of the deserters to the Romans, undertook to go upon the invitation of Castor, who promised him a gratuity for the execution of his commission. Allured by these terms, Eneas hastened, and had no sooner put himself in a posture to receive the present, than Castor dropt a huge stone down from the wall, which Eneas with difficulty avoided; but it wounded a soldier who stood near him. When Titus, by this this means, detected the delusion, he was convinced of the danger of humanity misapplied, and, persuaded that rigour was the best defence against fair words and plausible pretences to avenge himself upon Castor and his companions, he ordered the engines to be plied with greater violence than before. The treacherous accomplices finding the tower totter, and ready to sink under them, let it on fire, and made their escape into a vault through the very flames. From this last exploit the Romans were as much astonished at their resolution, as they had been incensed at their treachery.

Castor and his associates escape through the flames.

Titus made himself master of this part of the wall within five days after taking the first; and now finding the way open to the second wall, he drove out the Jews before him, and, with a thousand choice men, entered the town, and passed through the cloth-market, and other avenues, up to the wall. If Titus had immediately demolished the greater part of this wall, as by the martial law he might have done, he would have obtained the victory at an easy rate. But considering the miserable state of the Jews, on the one hand, if they stood it out, and the security of their retreat, on the other, if they were disposed to fly, he once again relented, in confidence that they would be duly sensible of his clemency, nor treat again with treachery and ingratitude, the man to whom they owed the preservation of their lives.

C H A P. X.

Extraordinary humanity of Titus. Malice and calumny of the faction. The Jews overcome the Romans in an encounter. Titus recovers the day. The Romans gain the second wall, but are quickly repulsed. Famine a greater calamity to the Jews than the war. Titus carries the second wall on the fourth day of assault.

How the Jews are treated by Titus.

THE Roman general, having entered the town, would not permit his soldiers so much as to put to death one prisoner, or set fire to one house: nay, he was so candid to the very faction, that he left them at liberty to contend the point in dispute, provided they did not force or oppress the people. He promised the inhabitants also, at the same time, to maintain them in their lawful possessions, and to restore to them what had been taken from them.

Malice and calumny of the faction.

These proposals were generally acceptable; some desiring the city might be spared for their own sakes, others that the temple might be spared for the sake of the city. But this humanity and tenderness was imputed, by the obdurate and relentless faction, to pusillanimity in the general, whom they represented as having offered these conditions, because he was apprehensive he could not perfect his design of reducing the city. They also threatened those with death who should even throw out a hint of a surrender.

How the Jews are treated by Titus.

The Romans were no sooner got into the town, than the Jews annoyed them by divers means, such as blocking up the narrow passes, galling them from the tops of the houses, and forcing the guards, by sallies from the walls, to quit their towers, and retire to the camp. Never was greater confusion and outcry than betwixt the soldiers within the town in the midst of their enemies, and those without the town for fear of their companions within. The Jews, being more numerous, and better acquainted with the bye-ways and secret passes, than the Romans, had the advantage of them in their encounter; and the breaches not being wide enough to march out many a breast, they were so hampered in the crowd, that they would have been cut to pieces, if Titus had not come to their relief. By posting a body of archers at the end of every street, and taking place himself where there was most danger, with Domitius Sabinus for his second, (a man eminent for his valour,) they held the Jews in play with their darts and lances, till they brought off their men under cover of that diversion. Thus were the Romans, after gaining the second wall, again repulsed.

The resolute part of the citizens flattered themselves into an opinion, upon their success, that the Romans would never venture into the city again, and that if they kept within it themselves, they should not be any more conquered. But these devoted objects seem to have been judicially infatuated, or they would have considered, that the Romans, whom they had lately worsted, bore no comparison, in point of numbers, to those with whom they had to encounter; nor did they foresee the dreadful famine that approached. They had hitherto rioted on the public, and drank, as it were, the very blood of the city. Many excellent members of society fell into extreme necessity, and not a few died even of famine itself. But the loss of men of candour and moderation afforded joy to the factious, who only wished such to survive as were for carrying on the ruinous war with the Romans. The rest they looked upon as an useless burthen, so averse were they to their own real interest.

Famine more calamitous.

The Romans made another attempt to recover the wall which they had failed in before, and for three days, without intermission, plied the assault, attack upon attack, and were as valiantly repulsed: but, on the fourth day, Titus gave so furious a charge, that they could resist no longer, and by that means got possession of the wall, demolished the northern part of it, and immediately placed garrisons in all the towers to the southward.

Titus carries the second wall after an assault of three days.

C H A P. XI.

Titus prepares for the prosecution of the war. Tries the effect of advice and argument with the Jews. Deputes Josephus to reason and remonstrate with his countrymen on the blessings of peace and miseries of war, as deducible from the history of their own nation. His generous resignation for the good of his country. The Jews accessory to their own destruction.

A RESOLUTION was taken by Titus to relax the siege for a short time, and afford the factious an interval for consideration, in order to try whether the demolition of their second wall would not render them more compliant, or whether they were not fearful of a famine, as the booty they had obtained by rapine would not long suffice them. Upon a day of general muster, he commanded his troops to be drawn up, and paid in sight of the enemy; the foot advancing with their swords drawn, and the cavalry with their horses elegantly caparisoned. No sight could be so grateful to the Romans, or so tremendous to the Jews, who were assembled in multitudes upon the old wall on the north-side of the town. The houses were crowded, and the whole city covered with people, gazing at this pompous display of the power and greatness of the Romans. A consternation seized the boldest of the Jews, and would probably have brought them over to the Romans, had not a consciousness of their provocations and affronts worked them up to a despair of pardon. Assured, therefore, that immediate death would follow surrender, they rather chose to fall in the contest; but it seems to have been so ordered by the great ruling power, that the innocent should fall with the guilty, and the city itself with the faction.

The siege intermitted.

A general muster of the Roman troops.

When Titus had passed four days in mustering and paying his army, without any act of hostility, but found no disposition in the Jews towards peace, he divided his legions, and began to raise banks at the fortrefs of Antonia, near John's monument, in order to gain the upper town from that quarter, and make himself master of the temple from Antonia; for he knew that, without taking the fort, the city was

was not to be maintained. At each of these parts he raised banks, each legion raising one. Those that worked at John's monument were annoyed, and, in some degree, obstructed by the Idumæans and Simon's party, who made occasional sallies upon them; while John's faction, and the multitude of zealots with them, did the same to them that were before the tower of Antonia. These Jews had the advantage of the Romans, not only as they stood upon higher ground, but, through constant practice, had attained a perfect knowledge of the use of the engines. They had three hundred engines for darts, and forty for stones, by which means they greatly annoyed the Romans, and impeded their design of raising the banks.

Titus, however, assured that the city, whether saved or destroyed, would eventually fall into his hands, not only prosecuted the siege with vigour, but tried again the effect of advice and persuasion to bring the Jews over to reason and reflection. Being sensible that exhortation is sometimes more prevalent than force, he counselled them to surrender the city, in a manner already taken, and thereby save themselves; and sent Josephus to address them in their own language, imagining that they might yield to the arguments and remonstrances of their countryman.

Josephus, pursuant to commission from the noble and generous Roman, went round about the wall, and finding a place secure from weapons, and convenient for hearing, delivered himself in words to the following purport:

Exhortation
of Josephus to the Jews.

"I am now to beseech you, my dear friends, as you love your lives and liberties, your city, your temple and your country, let your tendernefs appear upon this occasion, and learn to be merciful to yourselves from your very enemies. The Romans, you see, have so great a veneration for holy things, that they make conscience of laying violent hands upon any thing that is sacred, and without pretending to any part or interest in the communion; whereas, instead of defending the religion you were brought up in, you are engaged here in a direct conspiracy to suppress it. Do you not see that your strength is all beaten down already, your weakness exposed, your walls defenceless, and that, in this condition, it is morally impossible for you to hold out any longer against so formidable a power? Neither is it a new thing (in case of the worst) for the Jews to be subject to the Romans. It is truly a glorious cause when liberty is the question, provided it be early enough, and before that liberty is either forfeited or lost; but for people to talk of shaking off the yoke, after they have once submitted to it, and continued in that obedience till they became slaves by prescription, is not the way to live free, but rather to die with infamy. It would be a scandalous bondage, indeed, to serve a master that a man of honour would be ashamed to own; but it is another case to be subject to a people that have the whole world at their feet. As where is that spot in the universe that has escaped the dominion of the Romans, saving only where extreme heats or colds have rendered the places intolerable and useless. Fortune is effectually gone over to them; and the Great Disposer of Empires himself hath, in his providence, at present made Italy the seat of the universal monarch. Beside that, it is according to the sovereign law of nature, that governs in beasts, as well as in men, to give way to the stronger, and submit quietly to the sword. It was this that made your ancestors, though, in power and politics, much your superiors, pay allegiance to the Romans; which they would never have done, if they had not been thoroughly convinced that it was God's will to have it so. But to what end is it for you now to dispute a point any longer that is the same as lost already? For if the walls were yet entire, and the siege raised, famine alone would do the work. It has begun with the multitude, and the soldiers turn will be next, and every day still worse than the other: for the calamity is insuperable, and "there is no fence against hunger. Wherefore you would do well to bethink yourselves in time, and to take wholesome advice before it be too late. The Romans are naturally a generous enemy, ready to forgive and forget all that is past, provided you do not carry on the affront to an unpardonable extremity. They are not a people to sacrifice their interest to their revenge, and to charge themselves with the incumbrance of a depopulated city, and a desolated province, but rather for receiving you with open arms into their friendship. But if ever you come to be taken by storm, you must expect to be put to the sword every man; those especially that, in defiance of the emperor's grace and mercy, shall continue obstinate to the last. As for your third wall, what have you to look for from it, but the fate of the other two that are gone before? Or what if your works were absolutely impregnable? the very want of bread, as I have before observed, would do the office of the sword."

This exhortation had so little effect upon the obstinate contumacious Jews, that they not only derided and reproached the speaker, but discharged weapons at him from the wall. Desirous, however, from a principle of genuine patriotism, if possible, to avert their impending destruction, he proceeded thus to expatiate on many historical facts, that he might terrify, if he could not persuade.

"Ah miserable and ungrateful wretches, to forget your best friends, and encounter the Romans with common weapons, as if the victories you have formerly obtained had been the effect of your own wisdom and virtue! Can you say that the Great Creator of heaven and earth ever failed of protecting the Jews when they were oppressed? Will you never be wiser? Do but consider whence you come, where you are, what you are doing, and how glorious a Protector it is that you provoke by these outrages. Do you not call to mind the divine exploits of your illustrious ancestors, and the wonderful deliverances that God hath wrought for them by the sacredness of this holy place? It gives me horror to think of exposing the history of God's miraculous dispensations to a people so unworthy of the blessing; but yet, upon this occasion, I shall dispense with that scruple, to shew you that the war you are now engaged in, is not so much against the Romans as against God himself.

Josephus
turns or exhorts the Jews.

"Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt, carried away, with a mighty army, Sarah, the queen and mother of us all. You would have thought, perhaps, that Abraham, the husband of Sarah, and our common father, having, at that time, the command of three hundred and eighteen lieutenants, and troops innumerable under them, should have attempted the righting of himself by arms: but he chose rather to lie quiet; and offered up his prayers towards this holy place, which you have polluted, to implore God's assistance. What came of it, but the king's sending the queen back again untouched to her husband, the second night after she was taken away; the Egyptian, in the mean while, contracting a veneration for the place, which you have defiled with the blood of your countrymen, till, in the end, finding himself haunted with frightful dreams and visions, he posted back again to his own country; but first scattered large donations of gold and silver among the people, in token of the reverence he had for a nation so much in God's favour.

"What shall I say of our predecessors transporting themselves into Egypt, their four hundred years bondage under a foreign tyranny, and their submitting with patience and resignation to God's good pleasure, even at a time when they were strong enough to have redeemed themselves by force? If I should tell you now how the Egyptians were infested with serpents, and tainted with all manner of diseases; how the fruits of the earth were blasted, the Nile corrupted, and ten “ plagues succeeded one another, it would be no more than what every body knows : but those of our ancestors that God had designed to the priesthood, were conducted out safe and sound, without either blood or danger, under the guard of a special Providence.
"plague"

“ So when the Assyrians forced away from us the holy ark, how did Palestine, Dagon, and the whole nation fare that was concerned in the seizure of it ? their bowels became putrid, and their pain intolerable ; inasmuch that their bowels and blood came away together. What was the end of it, but the bringing of the ark back again to us with the sound of musical instruments, and with the same sacrilegious hands that took it away, to expiate, in some degree, for the wickedness ? This was the work of God himself in favour of our ancestors, for casting themselves entirely upon his Providence and mercy, without having any recourse to common means.

“ What became of Sennacherib, king of Assyria, and that prodigious army of his, when he sat down before this place with the whole strength of Asia at his command ? Was he cut off by the arm of flesh, or any human power ? No. But when the Hebrews were quietly at their prayers, the angel of God confounded in one night that mighty army ; and the Assyrian found 185,000 of his men dead upon the place next morning, and the rest flying in consternation from the unarmed Hebrews that had no thoughts of pursuing them.

“ You know likewise that our people were seventy years captive in Babylon, without making any attempt towards the recovery of their liberty, till God put it in the heart of Cyrus to discharge them, and dismiss them to their own country, where they began to offer sacrifices again to God, as their only deliverer and preserver. To be brief, what great thing did our forefathers ever bring to pass, either with arms or without, but by God’s particular direction and assistance in the execution of his orders ? If they stayed at home, they were victorious without fighting ; it being God’s pleasure that it should be so : and when they fought in confidence of their own strength, they never succeeded. For instance, when the king of Babylon laid siege to this city, our king Zedekiah gave him battle, contrary to the advice of the prophet Jeremiah ; what was the event, but the routing of his army, the taking of Zedekiah prisoner, and the destruction both of city and temple before his face ? Do but observe the difference now betwixt the moderation of that prince and people, and yours. The prophet told them plainly, that they were fallen under God’s displeasure for their wickedness ; and that, if they did not deliver up the city, it should be forced from them by assault ; yet for all this foreboding, neither prince, or people, offered him any violence. To say nothing of what passes within your walls, (an iniquity, in truth, not to be expressed,) I shall only take notice how barbarously I myself have been treated by you both in words and actions ; and what is my crime, I beseech you, but the honest liberty of telling you your faults, and advising you for the best ?

“ It was much the same case too, when Antiochus, called Epiphanes, laid siege to this city. Our forefathers, having by many ways incurred God’s high displeasure, pressed the enemy to a battle, without waiting for his Divine direction and assistance : the Jews were totally defeated, the town taken and pillaged, and the sanctuary, for three years and six months, wholly abandoned. In few words, what was it but the contumacy of our own people that first irritated the Romans against the Jews ? Whence are we to date our slavery but from our own seditious countrymen ; when the two factions of Aristobulus and Hyrcanus, in an ambitious heat of competition, brought Pompey into the city, and made the Jews,

No, 37.

“ that were unworthy of liberty, slaves to the Romans ? When they had held it out three months, they surrendered the place, though in a much better condition to defend it than you are, and infinitely short of what you are to account for to the laws and religion of our country. We all know what was the end of Antigonius, the son of Aristobulus ; in whose reign the Jews were punished with another judicial captivity for the sins of the people. Did not Herod likewise besiege Jerusalem with the assistance of Sosius, a Roman general, and at the head of a Roman army ? After six months the town was reduced, and rifled by the enemy, as a just judgment upon the party for their iniquities.

“ Enough has been said to shew that this way of arms and sieges hath ever been fatal to our brethren ; and that the end of such a war would be certain ruin. Therefore it seems reasonable to me, that those, who are in possession of this holy place, should entirely submit themselves to the conduct of God’s providence ; who will never be wanting to them that serve him, and keep his commandments. But you lead lives in direct opposition to his holy will, leaving undone what you are commanded to do, and doing what you are forbidden. How much have you more to answer for, than those that you have seen taken off by a vindictive justice in the career of their wickedness ? As for the secret sins of theft, fraud, treachery, and adultery, you look upon them as trifles. But you value yourselves upon oppression, murder, and other sins of the first magnitude, that were hardly ever heard of. Nay, you have made the holy temple itself the scene of your wickedness ; a place so sacred, that the Romans themselves have a veneration for it, notwithstanding the inconsistencies of their religion : yet this place, that the very Romans have so great a reverence for, is polluted and blasphemed by those who have been trained up to the temple worship. With what face now can you pretend to expect assistance from a power that you have so daringly provoked ? But taking it for granted that you are just, humble, and righteous, and your hands as clean as our king’s were when he stretched them out to implore succour from heaven against the Assyrian, and when the return of his prayer was, the next night, the utter ruin of the enemies army, if you will have it that the Romans behave themselves as the Assyrians did, you may expect that God will deal with them after the like manner. But this is quite the reverse ; for the Assyrian compounded for a sum of money to save the city, and then broke his oath, and set fire to the temple : whereas the Romans only demand a yearly tribute ; and no more either than what had been paid them formerly time out of mind. Let this be made good to them, and the temple and city have nothing to fear : you shall enjoy your families, your liberties, and your estates, with the free exercise of your religion, and under the regulation of your own laws. You must be frantic to imagine that God will treat tyrants and murderers, and men of moderation and justice, alike, especially when punishment and vengeance are but the work of a moment to the Almighty.

“ The Assyrians, you see, were destroyed the first night they came before the town ; and if it had been the will of God to let the one free, and to chastise the other, he would have poured down his wrath upon the Romans as he did upon the Assyrians ; either when Pompey first forced Jerusalem, or Sosius after him ; or when Vespasian harassed Galilee ; or now, at last, upon the attack of Titus. But neither Pompey or Sosius met with any signal opposition from heaven ; and they both succeeded in their enterprizes upon the place. As for Vespasian, he advanced himself to the empire upon the credit of the war he made upon us. And what do you think of (almost) a miracle, wrought in favour of Titus ? Siloam, you know, and other fountains without the city,

“ were

“ were drawn so low before Titus came hither, that “ water was hardly to be got for money; but since “ his arrival here, the springs are grown so quick “ again, that there is sufficient for the Romans for “ all manner of purposes; and not only for them“ selves and their cattle, but for the gardens too.
 “ The same thing happened at the time when the “ king of Babylon, before-mentioned, marched up “ to Jerusalem with his army, took the town and “ city, and laid them both in ashes. This prodigy “ was the forerunner of that ruin and conflagration.
 “ Not that I take the wickedness of those days to “ have been comparable to that of the present age;
 “ but it looks as if God had abandoned his own “ house and people in favour of the enemy. Make “ it the case now of the master of the house, with a “ vicious and debauched family. If he be a virtu“ ous man he will shift his quarter, and never en“ dure to be under the roof with that sort of people.
 “ How can you imagine then that God will coun“ tenance your abominations? An all-seeing God, “ that searches your inmost souls, and reads your “ thoughts in their very conception? But, alas! you “ have no reserves, but make your very enemies “ confidants of all you do. You live in a kind of “ competition who shall be most abominable, and “ value yourselves upon an ostentation of wicked-“ nefs.”

“ God is not inexorable to those that confess their “ misdoings, and truly repent; which is the course “ that you must take, if ever you hope for mercy.
 “ Wherefore cast away your arms; let your hearts “ bleed for the judgments you have brought upon “ your country. Do but look well about you, and “ consider the beauty of the place, the glory of the “ city, and the majesty of the temple, that you are “ now about to betray, with the inestimable mass
 “ of treasure that is there deposited, in donations
 “ and oblations from all quarters. Can any man “ have the heart to think of exposing those magni“ ficent curiosities to fire and pillage? or of seeing “ those excellencies destroyed, which, of all things “ under the sun, are best worth preserving? If “ you were not harder, and more insensible, than “ stones, this reflection would move you: or, if “ nothing else will work upon you, bethink your“ selves of your parents, your wives, your chil“ dren, and your families, that are at this instant “ upon the brink of perishing, either by famine or “ the sword. It will be said perhaps, because I “ have a wife of my own, a mother and a family,
 “ (of some credit formerly) concerned in the com“ mon hazard, that it is for their sakes, and my own “ interest, that I give this counsel; but if either the “ sacrificing of their lives, or mine, or both, may “ conduce to your safety, I am ready to deliver up “ all, upon condition that you will be wiser and “ honest after my death.”

The people are for going over to the Romans

This recapitulation of historical events was heard by the factions with the same unfeeling disregard as the preceding exhortation; but the multitude were disposed to desert to the Romans. Accordingly, some of them sold what they had, and even their most valuable effects, which they had treasured up, for a trifling consideration, and swallowed down pieces of gold, for fear of being robbed in their way, by which they supplied themselves with necessaries when they got over to the Romans. Titus gave many of them free liberty to go whithersoever they would, which was a great inducement to them to desert, as they were thereby not only freed from the miseries they endured in the city, but also from slavery to the Romans. John and Simon, with their factions, however, as carefully watched their exit as they did the entrance of the Romans, and death was the immediate consequence of the least shadow of a suspicion.

The miseries of the Jews daily increase.

The rage of faction, and the pinch of famine, increased daily. No man appeared publicly: the plunderers searched private houses, and, if they found any corn, abused the tenants for denying them what they had: if they found none, they abused them the more, from a supposition that they had concealed it. The indication, whether they had any or not, was taken from the bodily state of these miserable wretches. If they were in good case, they supposed they were in no want of food; if wasted, they went off without further search. Nor did they think it necessary to put such to death, as they would soon die of themselves with famine. Many, indeed, sold what they had for one measure, that is, of wheat, if the richer sort; but of barley, if the poorer. When they had so done, they shut themselves up in the most retired part of their houses, and eat what they purchased; some without grinding, through extremity of want; and others making bread of it, as necessity or fear dictated to them. A table was no where spread for a regular meal; but they snatched the bread out of the fire half baked, and devoured it most greedily.

A more shocking spectacle never presented itself to human view, where the stronger had more than sufficient, and the weaker were bemoaning absolute want: starving being certainly of all deaths the most deplorable, as it takes away all sense of shame, tenderness, and respect. Wives tore the meat from the mouths of their husbands; children did the like by their parents; and, what was yet more barbarous, mothers by their infants, taking from them, as they lay languishing in their arms, the very last support of life. Nor could this be done so privately but some one was still at hand to take away that from them which they had taken from others. Wherever they saw a house shut up, they concluded there was food within, and therefore broke open the door, ran in, and took the meat from them by force, as they were rapaciously devouring it. They had mercy for neither age or sex; but beat the old men who offered to defend what provision they had got; and dragged the women by the hair for endeavouring to conceal the least trifle. Nor did sucking infants escape their fury, but were torn from the breast, and dashed against the ground; so that children and grey hairs had the same quarter. But, if possible, they were more barbarously cruel to those that prevented their coming in, and had actually swallowed down what they were going to seize upon, as if they had been unjustly defrauded of their right. They also invented dreadful torments to discover where any food was; and a man was forced to bear what is too horrid to relate, in order to make him confess that he had but one loaf of bread, or that he might discover an handful of barley that was concealed. All these cruelties were perpetrated, not from the compulsion of hunger, which had been some degree of palliation, but merely to keep their savage practices in exercise, as rapine and murder were the very soul of their existence.

This was the treatment the common people suffered from these tyrannical guards; but persons of dignity and opulence were carried before the usurpers themselves. Some of them were put to death for treason, and a design of betraying the city to the Romans, upon the testimony of false witnesses; and this was sure to be one of the articles, that they had an intention of going over to the enemy. Those whom Simon had pillaged were carried to John, as John's prisoners were to Simon, as if they had been carousing together, and sharing the prey between them. The contention was who should be uppermost, though they were perfectly well agreed in the methods of their tyranny and usurpation. They divided the spoil they took; and it was deemed an unpardonable crime in every one to deprive his companion of his moiety, as it was his just claim according to contract.

It would be needless to recount the iniquities of these miscreants, or the miseries of our nation at this time: to be brief, therefore, I am persuaded there never was so wretched a city and people upon the face of the earth. In order to palliate their inhumanity to strangers, they reviled the very name of the Hebrews, and confessed themselves, as in truth they were, slaves and vagabonds. At length they laid the city in ashes; nay, the very burning was, in effect

effect, their own act, as they forced Titus, against his inclination, upon these extremities. As the upper town was in flames, the Romans indicated a generous compassion; but not a sigh was heard, or a tear seen, amongst the hardened Jews.

C H A P. XII.

The Jews are crucified before the walls of the city. Instances of their malice and resolution. The Romans raise four mighty works in seventeen days. The Jews set fire to the bulwark. The Romans are driven from their works, and their batteries destroyed. A sharp encounter upon mounting the engines. Titus begins to despair of carrying his point.

THE banks were now far advanced, notwithstanding the Roman soldiers had been much annoyed from the walls. Titus then sent out a party of horse, and ordered them to lay in ambush for those Jews who went abroad for provisions. The greater part of these were poor people, who were deterred from deserting by the concern they were in for their relations; nor durst they take their families with them for fear of a discovery. Hunger had rendered them desperate, so that they went out, and fell into the ambush of the enemy. When they found themselves hampered, they were compelled by necessity to fight, through fear of some punishment worse than death itself: besides, it was now too late to think of suing for mercy. In fine, they were overpowered; and, after being exposed to all manner of torture, they were crucified in sight of the besieged. Titus was not gratified by these rigorous proceedings; but he did not think it safe either to discharge so many obstinate prisoners, whom he had now at mercy, or spare men enough to look after them from the service of the army. He likewise entertained hopes that the terror of such examples might move them to bethink themselves, lest it should come to be their own case. They were all crucified, but in several ways and postures: some to express rage, others hatred, and others contempt and mockery. The number of unhappy persons thus put to death was so great that room was wanting for the crosses.

So far was the horror of this dreadful scene from softening the faction, that it produced a contrary effect. The friends and relations of the fugitives, and those who had but the least inclination to peace, were dragged out to the walls, in order to shew them what they had to trust to that went over to the Romans, while they endeavoured to persuade them that the men they saw in chains were not prisoners of war, but deserters that sued for mercy. This device kept many from going off till the truth came to be known; though some immediately escaped to the enemy to avoid starving, which, on a comparative view, appeared much the more miserable death of the two.

Titus, upon this, caused several of his prisoners hands to be cut off, and sent away to John and Simon in such a plight, advising them, at the same time, to put an end to the war, without forcing him upon the destruction of the city; as it was not yet too late, upon a seasonable submission, to preserve their lives, their country, and the temple. Titus, however, at the same time advanced his works, quickening and encouraging them, being resolved very suddenly to follow those works with effect, and gain his point by force, if he could not compass it by reason and persuasion.

The factious Jews, notwithstanding their desperate situation, cast out curses from the walls against both Vespasian and Titus; declared, one and all, their contempt of death; and how much dearer their liberties were to them than their lives. They had the hardiness to add, that, provided they could plague the Romans, they cared not what became either of themselves or their country, which Titus assured them were in danger of perishing. As to their temple, they looked upon the world to be a much more magnificent structure; but made no doubt of its being preserved by him that inhabited therein, in despite of all the threatenings of the enemy.

Antiochus Epiphanes, in the mean time, came up with a train of armed troops; one company of which was composed of men in the prime of life, accoutred and disciplined after the Macedonian manner, from whence they took the name of Macedonians.

Arrival of Antiochus Epiphanes from Comagena.

Of all the princes that were ever subject to the Roman empire, the king of Comagena was undoubtedly the most prosperous and successful for the former part of his life; but, in his latter days, his fortune forsook him, and verified the old adage, "That no man can be pronounced happy before death." He had a son of a martial enterprising spirit; robust, firm, and daring to the utmost degree of rashness. This son observed, upon a certain occasion, that he wondered the Romans stood trilling before the walls, and did not push the attack with vigour. Titus replied, that the way was open; and had no sooner uttered these words, than Antiochus led up his Macedonians to the assault, and gave proof both of his valour and conduct in the action. But his select company were almost all killed or wounded. Having boasted before of the feats they would perform, they could not in honour recede. From this it was evident that Macedonian courage would never conquer without Alexander's fortune: so that they were forced to give up the attempt, and bring off the remainder of the men as they could.

The Romans began to raise their banks on the twelfth day of the month Artemesius, and finished them on the twenty-ninth, after they had laboured hard for seventeen days; for there were now raised four great banks. There was one at the fortress of Antonia, raised by the fifth legion, over against the middle of the Struthian pool. There was another, cast up by the twelfth legion, within twenty cubits of the former. The tenth legion, which was more considerable than the other two, threw up another work to the north, opposite the pool called Amygdalon; and at thirty cubits from the last was another, raised by the fifteenth legion, not far from the monument of John, the high-priest.

The Romans finish their banks in 17 days.

These works were no sooner finished than John caused a mine to be wrought under that which looked towards Antonia, and several wooden props to be set up along the trench to keep the weight of the earth above from falling, plastering the wood-work with a bituminous matter that would take flames immediately. John had now no more to do than to set fire to the pillars, which, when the props were gone, brought down the whole bulwark with a most hideous noise. There was no fire to be seen at first, but only a smothering dust and smoke, till the flame burst through all opposition, and shewed itself. This was such a surprize to the Romans, that they were much embarrassed as to their future proceedings, especially as it would answer no purpose to quench the fire when the ramparts were gone.

John contrives a method of destroying the bulwarks.

Two days after this, Simon and his party, made an attempt to destroy the other banks, where the Romans had planted their engines, and began to play. There was one Jephthæus, of Galilee, Megastarus, a domestic of queen Mariamne, and one of Adiabena, the son of Nabataeus, who, from an accident, was called Agiras, which signifies, lame. These three, with torches in their hands, flew directly to the machines, and breaking through the enemies troops with no more concern than if they had been among their friends, set fire to them, and, in despite of all opposition with darts and arrows; pursued their design till the engines were all in a flame. These were reputed three of the bravest men that appeared in that war.

The Jews attempt to destroy the Roman engines.

Upon the mounting of the fire, the Romans dispatched a detachment from the camp to the relief of their companions; but the Jews, in the mean time, poured their shot upon them from the walls, and, without any regard to their own lives or persons, fought it out hand to hand with those that were endeavouring deavouring to put a stop to the fire. The Romans did all they could to save their engines, the covers of them being consumed already. The Jews ventured into the very flames to hinder them, and would not let go their hold, though the iron-work was burning hot. The fire passed from thence to the ramparts, nor could it be prevented. The Romans at length, finding themselves encompassed with flames, and no hopes left of saving the works, withdrew into their camp. The Jews had so many reinforcements out of the city, that the increase of their numbers rendered them more and more pressing and inconsiderate; insomuch, that, in the heat of their success, they advanced to the very camp itself, and attacked the guards.

The Romans are drawn from their works, and their batteries destroyed.

The office of these guards, according to the rule of the Roman discipline, was to do duty by turns, and relieve one another; and not a man, upon pain of death, without mercy, to quit his post under any pretence whatsoever. These people, having this charge before-hand, either to fall like men of honour, or suffer an infamous death as deserters, made a gallant resistance, and brought several of those back again, who, betwixt shame and necessity, had abandoned their stations, and, with their engines, put a stop to the excursions of the Jews from the city. They made their sallies without any guard of defence for their own security, encountering all they met at a venture, and casting themselves as frantic upon the enemies pikes. It must be confessed that the Jews gained more upon the Romans by a rashness and fool-hardiness than by real courage; and that the Romans, on the other hand, gave way rather to the outrageous boldness of the Jews, than any apprehension of mischief they could do them.

Titus, at his return from Antonia, where he had been to find out a commodious spot for advancing his attacks, severely reprimanded the soldiers for suffering themselves, after gaining the enemies works, to be distressed in their own, and, in a manner, besieged by those that were no better than prisoners themselves. Upon this, with some of his choice troops, he surrounded the Jews, and charged them in the flank, while they, on the other side, maintained their ground with amazing intrepidity. This encounter raised such a dust and clamour, that there was nothing to be seen or heard distinctly, nor friend or foe to be known asunder. Neither were the Jews thus obstinate out of any confidence in their own strength, but out of despair of safety; while the Romans were so enraged on the other side, betwixt the punctilio of military honour, and the regard they had for the person of their general, which was then in danger, that, if the Jews had not retired into the town just as they did, they had undoubtedly been all cut to pieces. But the Romans were greatly chagrined at the loss of their bulwarks, and to find it the work of but one hour to destroy what had cost so much labour and time in raising. This disappointment, together with the dismounting of their engines, caused them to despair of gaining the place.

C H A P. XIII.

Titus calls a council of war. The result of their deliberations. A wall is built round Jerusalem in three days by the Roman army.

Titus deliberates on his future operations.

Various opinions of the council.

IN this situation of affairs Titus called a council of his great officers, to give their opinion and advice respecting future operations. The most resolute and active were for a general assault, and falling on with the whole army; observing, that hitherto nothing had been done but in skirmishes and parties, and that if once it came to a main action, the Jews would never be able to stand the shock of the very darts and arrows. The cooler, and more considerate, part were for renewing and repairing the ramparts. Others were for having no works at all, and recommended a strict guard to prevent the Jews from bringing provisions into the city, as famine would do the business of the sword without striking a blow.

Titus, indeed, did not think it honourable to continue inactive at the head of a formidable army; nor was he for fighting with a people so bent upon their own destruction. He pointed out to the council the impracticability of casting up any more banks for want of materials, and the difficulty of encompassing the whole city with his army, on account of its magnitude, situation, and the sallies they had reason to expect from the enemy. For though they might guard the known passages out of the place, yet the Jews, when they found them under the greatest embarrassment, would find out private conveyances, as being well acquainted with all the different avenues; so that carrying provisions by stealth, the siege would be considerably protracted. He confessed his fear, that delay would diminish the honour of the conquest; and therefore gave it as his opinion, that if they aimed at expedition, joined with security, they must run up a wall round the whole city, by which means all excursions would be prevented, and the Jews compelled either to deliver up the place in the extremity of their despair, or, weakened by pinching want, into an incapacity of defending themselves. He added, that this should not hinder him from giving orders for repairing the works, more especially when the situation of things should render it necessary; but that, at the same time, the difficulty of the project respecting the wall should not deter them from undertaking it, as great things were to be brought about by exertion, and the assistance of an Almighty Power.

These arguments prevailing with the council, Titus gave orders to his officers to attend immediately to the erecting this wall, and to enter upon it with a regular distribution of the whole army into their proper stations. The word was no sooner given, than the soldiery seemed transported into a generous emulation of out-doing one another; for, after measuring the ground, and dividing the legions, the same spirit of competition ran through the whole body, insomuch that each soldier was ambitious to please his decurion, each decurion his centurion, each tribune his superior officer, and all this in subordination to their noble general, who was so intent on the design, that he surveyed the whole works, by taking his rounds several times every day.

The wall was begun at a place called the camp of the Assyrians, where Titus took up his quarters, and carried forward to the lower Cenopolis, and so by the way of Cedron to the mount of Olives, which was enclosed, on the south, as far as the rock Peristreon, together with a neighbouring hill that overlooks the vale of Siloah. From thence it turned a little to the westward, and so on to the valley of the fountain. It then went on to the sepulchre of Ananus, the high-priest, and so enclosing the mountain where Pompey had formerly encamped, turned again to the northward, and went to a village called Erebinthonicus, took in Herod's monument towards the east, and there joined one end to the other where it was begun.

The compass of this wall was nine and thirty furlongs. Thirteen forts were built on the outside of it, the circumference of each amounting to ten furlongs. That which might have required some months, was completed in three days; so that it might be deemed a work of incredible dispatch. When Titus had encompassed the city with this wall, he posted guards upon it every night under arms. He went the first round himself, Tiberius Alexander went the second, and the commanders of the legions the third. The soldiers and the watch slept by turns, so some or other were still upon the guard in the forts all night.

C H A P. XIV.

A famine amongst the Jews, attended with a great mortality. The Romans make exhibition of their plenty, to reproach the Jews in their extreme necessity. Four ramparts raised at the tower of Antonia larger than the former.

THE Jews, by the raising of this wall, were not only cut off from all hopes of escape, but driven to the utmost degree of despair by a most outrageous famine, that swept away whole families. The houses were strewn with carcases of women and children, and the narrow lanes with the bodies of old men that lay dead there; while the younger part of the inhabitants wandered about like shadows, being wholly emaciated through hunger. There was no burying the dead. Some wanted strength to perform the office, others wanted will, as being discouraged partly by the great number of them, and partly by an apprehension that their own turn might be next. Some expired in the very act of burying others; and some hastened away to the grave before their time, to ensure a resting place while they were yet living. Yet, in the extremity of all this misery, there was not heard so much as a groan or an outcry, as all other passions were stifled in the pain of a tormenting hunger. Those that were ready to expire stood gazing, with dry eyes and ghastly looks, upon such as were gone to rest before them. The city was wrapt in profound silence, and enveloped in a kind of deadly gloom. But the most deplorable part of the calamity was the insolence and brutality of robbers, who broke into houses, put to death all they met with, stripped them, and made wanton sport with their naked bodies. If any one called for an hand or a sword to dispatch him, the kind office was refused, and the sufferer left to perish by famine. As they came to the point of death, they directed their eyes towards the temple, grieving to the heart that they should leave these miserables among the living, who had so abominably profaned that sacred place.

When the seditious were no longer able to endure the stench of the carcases, they gave orders for their interment at the public charge; but, for want of room to dispose of them, these monsters in inhumanity caused them to be cast down headlong from the walls into the valley, which was so horrid a spectacle, that Titus, upon taking the round of the place, finding the ditches so infected with pestilential vapours, stretched out his hand in an appeal to heaven, that it was against his will to have it so. Such was the miserable state of the city at that time.

While the faction was thus pent up within the walls, and laboured under the complicated calamities of famine and despair, the Romans passed their days in ease and jollity, and were abundantly supplied with provisions from Syria and the neighbouring provinces. Some of them, from an invidious ostentation of their stores, came up to the very walls, to augment the wants on the one side, by exposing the plenty on the other. But all this had no effect upon the insensible hearts of the seditious, insomuch that Titus, in pure compassion to the remainder of a miserable people, resolved to expedite the casting up new works as much as possible. The only difficulty was the providing materials, for the wood near the city was cut down already, so that they were now forced to fetch timber, for a second supply, at ninety furlongs distance from the place; and there were four ramparts erected at the fortrefs of Antonia, larger than the former. Titus lost no time, and rendered his dispatch apparent to the faction; but they went on without remorse, as regardless of themselves as others, and delighting in whatever was derogatory and shocking to human nature.

of his three sons. Ananias is put to death, and the father of Josephus made a prisoner. Judas lays a plot to destroy Simon. Simon surprizes the town. Josephus wounded, and reported to be slain. Is rescued by Titus, and recovers. The Jews swallow their gold. Two thousand ripped up in one night. Titus is alarmed at so horrid an outrage. Force of the love of money.

THE tyrant Simon, having first put Matthias to the torture, afterwards put him to death, notwithstanding he got possession of the city through his means. This Matthias was the son of Boethus, a priest in high esteem, and universally beloved by the people. The multitude were distressed by the zealots; and, upon John's joining them, Matthias moved the calling in Simon to their assistance, but without the necessary caution of previous conditions. Simon was no sooner in possession of the town, than he treated Matthias as one of his greatest enemies, and imputed the advice he gave to gross simplicity and oversight. Upon this pretence Matthias was arraigned, and accused of holding correspondence with the Romans; and sentence of death was passed upon the father and his three sons, (the fourth having escaped to the Romans,) without so much as hearing what he had to offer in his own vindication.

Matthias, and his three sons, condemned to die.

The only favour this venerable old man had to desire of Simon, in return for the obligation of letting him into the town, was, that he might die first himself; but the inhuman monster refused that grace, and commanded the father to be executed last, to keep him so much the longer in pain. Matthias, in the conclusion, was put to death upon the bodies of his three sons, and in the sight of the Romans, according to Simon's order to Ananus, the son of Barmadas, the most barbarous of all his party. Nor did he content himself barely with the execution of this detestable sentence, but, in a frolic of insolence and derision, when he was just upon the point of striking the stroke, reviled the old man, by telling him he might now see whether the Romans, to whom he intended to go over, would send him any succour to bring him off. In fine, to consummate the inhumanity, the bodies were all refused burial, by the special command of Simon himself.

The father murdered upon the bodies of his three sons.

Ananias, a priest, the son of Masbalus, nobly descended, and Aristeus, a native of Emmaus, and secretary to the sanhedrim, with fifteen men of rank, were all put to death. The father of Josephus was made prisoner, and proclamation issued that no man should presume to associate with him upon pain of death.

Various slaughters and punishments.

It fell out after this, that Judas, the son of Judas, an officer of Simon, and commander of one of the turrets, feeling for the oppression of a miserable people, and anxious at the same time for his own security, took occasion to address a select party of his most trusty friends upon that subject, to the following purport: "How long shall we crouch under the burthen of this tyranny? or what hope of safety can we have in the service of so merciless a monster? We have sword and famine to encounter; and the Romans, in a manner, in possession of the city. Simon, of all men living, is the vilest and most ungrateful: the Romans, on the other hand, are men of faith and honour; so that we have only to deliver up the walls, and preserve ourselves and our country. Nor has Simon any cause of complaint, unless it be that he will be brought to justice a little sooner than he expected."

Judas lays a plot to destroy Simon.

The friends of Judas being prevailed on by these arguments, he sent the rest of those that were under him several ways, to prevent the discovery of his design; and, about the third hour of the day, called out to the Romans from the turret, and gave them to understand the resolution they had taken. Some gave no credit to it; others were for delaying the matter, from an assurance they should get possession of the city in a short time without hazard. But as Titus had just drawn some troops up to the wall,
Simon

Simon at that instant surprized the town, and killing the guard in the sight of the Romans, threw the bodies down the wall.

Josephus wounded, and reported to be slain.

Is rescued by Titus, and recovered.

While Josephus was going round the city, and doing the Jews his best offices, by encouragement and advice, it was his fortune to be wounded by a stone from the battlements, upon which the Jews made a desperate rally, and would have carried him off prisoner, if Titus, at that instant, had not sent a party to his rescue. During this skirmish they bore off Josephus before he was well recovered from the shock of the blow, so that the faction exulted in the hope of his being slain. The rumour passed current through the city; and gave the inhabitants infinite concern for the loss of their mediator and patron amongst the Romans. The tidings of the death of Josephus being brought to his mother in prison, she told her guards she had heard the same, and should never see him more. Upon this occasion the women condoled with her; and she deplored her own misfortune, that, in bearing a son, whom she hoped would have buried the mother, she was now deprived of the power of performing the funeral rites for her son. The report, however, did not long give his mother pain, nor his foes pleasure; for the danger of the wound was quickly over; and, upon returning to his post, he gave the seditious to understand, that they should pay dearly for what they had done, while he exhorted the people to continue their allegiance to the Romans. The sight of Josephus animated his friends as much as it dispirited the faction.

In this extremity several deserters went over to the Romans. Some leapt the wall, and made their escape that way; others got off under colour of pursuing the enemy with stones. But, instead of avoiding one calamity within the town, they fell into a worse without; and the surfeits they contracted by gorging in the Roman camp, were much more mortal than the famine they left at home; for being empty, and puffed up with a dropical distemper, without a prudent restraint on their appetites, they were in danger of bursting. But the most miserable circumstance remains yet to be related.

There was a fugitive surprized, among the Syrians, in the very act of searching for gold that had been swallowed and passed through him. Now the faction put all to the search; and there was such plenty of gold in the city, that as much was now sold (in the Roman camp) for twelve attic drachms, as was sold before for twenty-five. But when this contrivance was discovered, the Arabians and Syrians ript up two thousand of their bellies, in one night, for their treasure, which was one of the greatest barbarities the Jews ever suffered.

2000 Jews ript up to get the gold that was in their bellies

Titus is incensed at this practice.

Titus was so enraged at the brutality of this action, that he had certainly ordered every man that was concerned in it to be put to death, if the number of the guilty had not been so much greater than that of the slain. Hereupon he called his officers together, both Roman and auxiliaries, and entered into an expostulatory reproof with them on the subject. He asked if it were possible that any Roman soldier could be guilty of so unmanly a cruelty for an uncertain advantage, and not blush at the thought of so infamous a purchase? Turning to the auxiliaries, he demanded, if they thought it reasonable, that the murder and inhumanity of the Syrians and Arabians, in a foreign war, should be imputed to the Romans?

But as some of his own soldiers were supposed to have been guilty of this infamous practice, he threatened death, without mercy, to any man that should presume, in future, to commit such outrages; appointing the legions also, at the same time, to make strict search after all suspected persons, and bring them before him to stand their trial. Avarice, however, overcame all fear of punishment, and a vehement desire of gain appeared to be unconquerable.

Other passions have certain bounds, while that alone is unlimited. When a people are given up to a spirit of reprobation, the ordinary means of security turn to their destruction; so that what Titus so severely prohibited in public, was nevertheless executed upon the Jewish deserters in secret. Their custom was, upon any fugitives coming over, first to make sure that none of the Romans should be within sight, and then dissect them for the execrable booty. This horrid practice at length terrified the Jews from deserting, and kept them from going over any longer to the Romans.

C H A P. XVI.

Instances of John's sacrilege. The race of the Jews is extirpated. Six hundred thousand dead bodies carried out of the city.

WHEN John could no longer plunder the people, he had recourse to sacrilege, appropriating to his own use and service several donations and oblations consecrated for the worship of God in his holy temple; such as cups, dishes, tables, together with the vessels which were presented by Augustus and his empress, who held that sacred place in the highest veneration. But this miscreant, on the contrary, prophaned it, and stripped it, of the very bounties of strangers; encouraging his associates to take all manner of liberty with holy things, and alleging, that it was reasonable those who fought for the temple should live by it. He made no scruple of distributing, among the people, the sacred wine and oil that was reserved in the inner part of the temple for sacrifices; and as John made the distribution, the multitude took their parts of it, drinking and anointing without any difficulty. I cannot relate these circumstances without horror: and I am persuaded that if the Romans had delayed calling these abandoned wretches to account any longer, this city would either have been deluged by water, or swallowed up by an earthquake, or destroyed, like Sodom, by thunder and lightning; the Jews, if possible, being more abandoned; inasmuch, that, for their notorious profligacy, the whole race of them was extirpated. It would, indeed, be endless to recite the several instances of their misery.

Manneus, the son of Lazarus, who had the command of one of the city gates, gave them the following account: that, from the time of the Roman army's encampment before the town (that is from the tenth day of the month Xanthicus, to the first of the month Panemus) there passed through that gate 115,080 dead bodies; and this was no more than what fell to his share to notice by virtue of a commission for that purpose; besides those that were buried by their relations, or, in other words, thrown out of the city; for there was no other mode of burial.

After this, upon the computation of divers men of rank who came over to Titus, there were no less than 600,000 poor people carried out of the gates; besides others innumerable, that, for want of friends to remove their carcases out of the city, were piled in heaps, and shut up in large houses. Wheat, at this time, was estimated at a talent, or medimnus, the bushel; and, since walling up the city so close, they were cut off from all provision, and brought to that pinch of extremity, that they were glad to search the common sewers for sustenance, and to feed upon the most nauseous articles. The very relation of these calamities drew pity from the Romans; but the faction in the city, who saw and felt their sufferings, were wholly insensible that their own rebellious obstinacy had been the cause. They persisted under the fatality of a blind infatuation, that led them into the irreparable ruin of themselves, their city, and their country.

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS

ON THE

WARS of the JEWS.

BOOK VII.

CHAP. I.

The Jews proceed to carry on a civil war. Jerusalem and its environs desolated. The Romans are terrified by the Jews, who attempt firing their engines, but fail. The Romans attack the tower of Antonia, which is gallantly defended by the Jews. The Romans fall to mining. Titus harangues his army. Sabinus signalizes himself by his bravery.

THE miseries of Jerusalem daily increased; and the faction became more and more fierce and turbulent, as they became more and more wretched; the famine now preying upon great and small, without distinction. The multitude of carcases, that lay in heaps one upon another, afforded an horrid spectacle, and produced a pestilential stench, which hindered them from making sallies out of the city upon the enemy. But all this excited in them neither terror or pity; so that after destroying one another, they proceeded, in their endeavours, to oppose the Romans, as Providence had deemed them to destruction; for they did not contend so much from any hope they had of victory, as from a degree of rage and despair.

The Romans were greatly distressed for materials to finish their works: however, by means of cutting down all the woods within ninety furlongs of the city, they raised their platforms in the space of one and twenty days. Never was a more dismal reverse of appearance than the present. That spot, which was once deemed a paradise, was now become a desert; and, instead of the most beautiful country upon the face of the earth, for curious gardens and fruitful plantations, not a tree was left standing, or any thing to be seen, but the marks of desolation and ruin; insomuch that strangers could not forbear weeping to see the difference between the former Jerusalem and the present; for war had so defaced its beauty and glory, that it was hardly to be known; and the place that was once so peculiarly distinguished for its grandeur, was now nothing more than a scene of desolation.

Upon finishing the works, the Jews and Romans were equally solicitous for the event. The Jews were either for destroying them by one decisive effort, or losing the city; and one disappointment on the other hand, would put them out of condition to repair them; for no more wood could possibly be procured, and the soldiers were harrassed out with fatigue of the service. The Romans, however, were more afflicted for the calamity of the city than the Jews themselves, who maintained their resolution in spite of every thing. When the Romans found themselves over-reached by stratagem, their inventions eluded, the wall proof against their engines, and themselves foiled at every manœuvre, their courage failed, especially as they found they had an enemy, that, instead of sinking under the pressure of faction, famine, and war, rather gathered spirit from the opposition. They inferred, from their bravery, in defiance of every disadvantage, that they would achieve wonders if they had fortune on their side. From these considerations the Romans doubled their guards.

John and his party, in the castle of Antonia, did all that could be done, before the engines were mounted, to prevent the danger of a breach. But it was only labour lost; for the design they had of setting fire to the engines was frustrated. In fact, they wanted union and vigour, and so were forced to a retreat. As the Jews fell short of themselves on the one hand, so the Romans exceeded themselves on the other, in planting so strict a guard on the bulwarks, that there was no possibility of doing any execution by fire: besides, they were resolved every man to die upon the spot, rather than submit to so irreparable a mischief, as the losing of that post. Nothing, indeed, could put soldiers more on the mettle, than to see brave men deluded, their courage baffled and injured by an audacious temerity, military discipline and experience confounded by popular outrage, and the Romans, in fine, worsted by the Jews.

The Romans are terrified by the Jews.

The Jews fail in their attempts to fire the engines.

The Jews

Jews. While the Jews advanced, the Romans were ready with their darts to encounter them; and the foremost that fell, not only hindered his next man, but the exemplary danger of the one served as a warning for the other. Some of those that pressed upon the enemies weapons, were surprized at the dignity of the Roman order; others at their numbers; and some again marched off with their wounds. At length they reproached one another for their cowardice, and retired without doing any thing.

The Romans attack the tower of Antonia.

The attack was made upon the first day of the month Panemus; and the Jews having now retreated, the Romans advanced with their engines towards Antonia, in defiance of all they were able to do by fire, swords, stones, and all other implements of hostility. Though the Jews depended much upon the strength of their walls against the battery of the engines, they exerted their utmost efforts to keep the Romans at a distance from fixing them. The inference they drew from this exertion of the Jews was, that they were conscious to themselves, Antonia was in danger, and this apprehension was the cause of it. They continued the battery, and the wall stood hitherto firm; but the Romans fortifying themselves, under the defence of their bucklers, against the weapons from above, they applied themselves to digging and mining; and when, with indefatigable labour, they had loosened four stones under the foundation of the work, they betook themselves, when night drew on, to rest. In this interval that part of the wall which John had undermined for the destruction of the former works, fell down on a sudden. This unexpected accident alarmed both parties. The Jews, who had reason to be troubled at it, especially when they might have foreseen and prevented it, were yet in as high spirits as if Antonia had been still standing; and the joy of the Romans, on the other hand, for an accident that appeared so seasonable, was as quickly dashed upon the sight of another wall, that John had carried up within the former; only the latter seemed to be the least defensible of the two, both as the ruin of the one facilitated the passage to the other, and as the work of the new wall could not yet be so firm and settled as that of Antonia. But no one durst scale it, from a conviction that whoever attempted to scale it must certainly be killed.

Titus now considering that the alacrity of soldiers in military exploits was to be excited by hopes and fair words, and that exhortations and promises frequently cause men to forget the hazards they run, and sometimes to despise death itself, summoned the flower of his army, and thus addressed them:

Address of Titus to his soldiers.

"My brave fellow-soldiers, there can be no room for encouragement where there is no danger. Exhortations are more properly for doubtful cases, wherein all brave men will advise themselves. It will be a hard work, I must confess, to master the wall we have here before us; but great souls are given us for great and glorious exploits; and death is desirable, when it is followed with immortal fame for a reward: besides, it shall be my care to reward those that deserve it. In the first place, I would have you think of that for your encouragement, that works a contrary effect upon others. I mean the insuperable patience and constancy of the Jews in the worst of fortunes. What can be more ignominious than for the military Romans, that study war in peace, and are so wont to conquer, that it is almost natural to them to be victorious; for these, I say, to be beaten out of their strength and courage by the Jews; and at the end of the day too, with God's providence most evidently on their side, and the enemy nothing to support them, but the fury of their own extravagant despair? besides, that they suffer daily under the judicial vengeance of God's high displeasure in our favour: witness their factions, famine, siege, and the ruin of their walls, even without battery; which are but so many declarations from heaven against them, to our advantage. It will not become us, therefore, to crouch to our inferiors, and to cast off the Divine protection.

"Shall the Jews, that have been trained up to slavery, and consequently have little or no credit to lose upon that account; shall these people, I say, have the bravery to charge into the middle of the Roman troops, and look death in the face, rather than run a risk of the same condition over again; and all this in a frolic of ostentation and vanity, without the least hope or prospect of success? And shall we, on the other hand, that are effectually the lords and masters of the universe, and in a manner entitled to a right of conquest, shall we, I say, lie still and inactive, without so much as one bold attempt upon our adversaries, waiting only in our arms, till hunger and fortune shall give up the enemy, without any difficulty, into our hands? It is but taking Antonia, and the town is our own. Or, in case we shall meet with any resistance from within, (which I do not expect,) it would not be worth mentioning; for the advantage of the higher ground lays the enemy at our feet, without all hope of recovery. I do not take upon me here to celebrate the history of those heroes, that, having ended their days in the field of battle, yet live in the memory of future ages to perpetuity. As for those worthless wretches that think of going down body and soul into the grave together, I wish them a death suitable to so abject a mind. Since death is inevitable, and that the sword, compared with any dis-ease, is the easier death of the two, how mean and degenerate a cowardice would it be to withdraw the use of a life from the service of the public, which is an indispensable debt to nature, and a man's country?

"This may look, perhaps, as if I took the storming of this wall to be certain death; but resolution is above danger; and he that fears nothing, despairs of nothing. The fall of the first wall has opened a way to the rest; and the second will be easily over-borne, if you do but encourage and support one another: only stand firm, and your very numbers will do the work: and who knows at last, but you may carry your point without blood too? You are to prepare, however, for a vigorous opposition, and to assure yourselves, that upon any advantage, either by stratagem, or by force, they will never be able to withstand us. As for him that first mounts the breach, it shall be my care, whether he lives or dies, to crown him with honours and rewards."

This address of the general cast such a damp upon the soldiers, that only one person was animated by it. His name was Sabinus, a Syrian by birth, one of the guards, and a man eminent both for courage and execution. He had not a military appearance, being short in stature, and of a wan complexion, but possessed a soul capable of valiant enterprises. This man, bowing to Titus, thus addressed him: "I do here tender myself to the general as the first man to give the assault. May the result answer my good will. If I should miscarry in the attempt, I shall have the honour of laying down my life for my master, which renders it indifferent to me whether I live or die."

Upon these words, with his sword drawn in his right hand, and his shield over his head in his left, he advanced towards the wall about the sixth hour of the day, with a train of eleven men, that followed him purely in emulation of his magnanimity. Sabinus, in this action, encountered the enemy's weapons with a resolution more than human; and several of his followers were wounded in the attack: nevertheless, he pressed forward, amidst darts and arrows, till he had well nigh mounted the wall, and forced the Jews to abandon their station for fear of a reinforcement of greater numbers to overpower them. But, alas! an accident frustrated this heroic attempt; for, when this valiant soldier had nearly gained his point, he was unfortunately overborne by the fall of a stone. The noise alarming the Jews, they looked behind, and finding Sabinus lying alone, they all fell upon him with their darts. He defended himself upon his knees, with his buckler over his head, as long as he could, and avenged himself upon his enemies with his sword, killing some, and wounding others, till, in the end, being able to strike no longer, he breathed his last covered with wounds.

The valour of this man deserved a more propitious fate, though he died as great as he lived. Three of his companions were dashed to pieces with stones from the top of the wall; and the remaining eight were carried off wounded to the camp. This action happened upon the third day of the month Panemus.

CHAP. II.

The Romans march up to Antonia, find the guards sleeping, and slay them. An action attended with great slaughter ensues.

SHORTLY after this, twenty of the Roman vanguard upon the works, the ensign of the fifth legion, two horsemen, and a trumpeter, made a silent march over the ruins up to Antonia, in the dead of the night, without any opposition, and finding the enemy's advance guard fast asleep, slew them, got possession of the wall, and ordered the trumpet to sound. Upon this alarm the rest awoke, and fled without waiting to see what numbers had entered the place; but, betwixt fear and fancy, they took it for granted they were very strong.

Titus, upon intelligence of this exploit, put himself at the head of a chosen band, and advanced up to the ruins. The Jews were so startled at this surprise, that some of them made for the inner temple, and others towards the mine that John had wrought to supplant the Roman works: but the two factions of John and Simon giving up all for lost, if the Romans should once get into the temple, there followed a fierce and obstinate contest before the very doors of the place; the one fighting for life, the other for victory. Lances and darts being of no use on either side, the matter in dispute was decided by the sword.

In this confusion they fought at random; the men being intermixed one with another, without order or discipline, by reason of the narrowness of the place; and a medley of outcries prevented their hearing any word of command. The slaughter was great on both sides, and the ground covered with arms and carcases. There was no room either to fly or pursue; but, as they had the better or the worse, they advanced or retired, exulting on the one hand, and lamenting on the other. There was a necessity for the front of both armies either to kill or be killed, for there was no distance left betwixt them for a retreat.

The battle lasted ten hours; that is, from the ninth hour over night to the seventh next morning. The furious obstinacy of the Jews carried it from the resolution and conduct of the Romans; and happily for them it was so, as their last adventure was at stake. But the Romans were content, for the present, with getting possession of the tower of Antonia, with only one part of their army; for the legions upon whom they chiefly depended were not as yet come up.

CHAP. III.

A gallant exploit of one Julian, a centurion. The Romans are shut up in the tower of Antonia. The names of the Jews that signalized themselves in this action.

THERE was in the Roman army one Julian, a native of Bithynia, and a centurion. He was a man as eminent for dauntless resolution and martial skill, as any that had signalized themselves in the course of the war. Standing by Titus at the tower of Antonia, and observing the Romans give way to the Jews, he took an opportunity of leaping on a sudden into the thickest of the enemy, and gave them chase in his single person up to the innermost court of the temple. The multitude fled from him in crowds, being, as it were, thunder-struck at such amazing exertion of strength and resolution, which seemed to them to be more than human.

Julian pursued his course; some he overturned; others he overtook, and put to death: nor, indeed, was there any sight that appeared more wonderful in the eyes of Titus, or more terrible to his enemies. But this gallant man was at length himself pursued by fate, which, as mortal, he could not escape; for having his shoes shod with iron nails, according to the fashion of other soldiers, as he was running on the pavement near the temple, he slipped, and the Romans, upon the clash of his armour, brake into an outcry, fearing he might have done himself a mischief. The Jews fell upon him at the same time with swords and darts, while he fenced himself with his buckler; but, as he attempted to rise, he was borne down by multitudes. Such were his valour and agility, that, even at his length upon the ground, they had some difficulty to dispatch him, till at last, through loss of blood, and none to succour him, he gave up the ghost.

He is slain.

Titus was deeply affected to see so brave a man made so public and deplorable a spectacle, and especially to find himself under an utter impossibility of saving so valuable a life. There were others, indeed, who might have relieved him, if they had had the courage to attempt it. Julian, in fine, after a long struggle with human frailty, and leaving several of his murderers wounded behind him, departed this life to his immortal honour both with friends and foes. The Jews at last carried off the dead body; and, after giving another check to the Romans, shut them up in the tower of Antonia.

The Romans shut up in Antonia.

The Jews that signalized themselves in this action, were Alexas and Gyptheus, of John's party; and of Simon's faction, Malachias and Judas, the son of Merton; James, the son of Sozas, commander of the Idumæans; and of the zealots, two brethren, Simon and Judas, the sons of Jair.

CHAP. IV.

Titus gives orders for the demolition of the tower of Antonia. Provokes John to an engagement. Josephus reasons with the Jews according to commission from Titus. Memorable instance of the piety and prudence of Jeronias. The fate of Jerusalem near at hand. The Jews are punished by the hands of the Romans. The general and whole army of the Romans hold the temple in veneration.

TITUS now resolving to give orders to his soldiers to dig up the foundations of the tower of Antonia, to make a ready passage for his army, called for Josephus, and (being informed that on that day, which was the seventeenth of the month Panemus, the solemnity of their daily sacrifice could not be performed for want of a congregation, and that the people were much troubled at it) sent him a second time upon the same errand. The purport of it was, "that if John was inclined to fight, he might bring what numbers he pleased, and put matters to the decision of a battle, provided only that the city and temple might not be exposed to the common ruin, and that he would cease to prophane the name and worship of the Almighty: or, if he was desirous of reviving the religious services that had been for some time discontinued, he might appoint which of the Jews he pleased to officiate."

Titus clears the way for his army.

Provokes John to an engagement

Josephus, not thinking it sufficient to acquit himself of this commission to John alone, mounted an eminence, and then communicated to the multitude the pleasure of Titus, in the Hebrew language, and in the loudest tone of which he was capable, begging the Jews to have compassion on their country, and prevent the burning of the temple before it was too late, by solemnizing their prayers and sacrifices as formerly. The people kept a melancholy silence upon the occasion; but the tyrant John, after ter reviling Josephus with the bitterest invectives, superadded this irony, "That there was no danger of Jerusalem, if it was the city of God." Josephus interrupting him, thus replied:

Josephus, as the interpreter of Titus, beseeches the people to save the city and temple.

"Doubtless you have made conscience of keeping every thing pure and holy, and of paying your duty to that God from whom you pretend to look for help. What would you think of that man, but as the worst of enemies, that should rob you of your daily bread? Yet, at the same time, you make no difficulty of robbing Almighty God of his daily sacrifices and oblations. What is your quarrel with the Romans, but for standing up in defence of your own laws and worship, which you yourself suppress? Never was there so miserable a change in religion and state! Strangers and enemies to do the office of your best friends! and the Jews themselves more cruel than barbarians one to another! As in the instance of Jechonias, king of the Jews, who, when the Babylonians made war upon Jerusalem, quitted the town upon choice before it was taken, and gave up himself, mother, and relations, for hostages, to save the holy city and temple from being laid in ashes. The name and honour of this prince stands upon record to this day, in an anniversary solemnity to the memory of that illustrious action. I cannot recommend you to a more pertinent or reasonable precedent. Let your distress or offence be what it will, my life for yours the Romans will pardon it. Wherefore consider well with yourselves who it is that advises you, what they are to whom I pass this promise, what moves me to it, and in whose name I undertake it. Heaven forbid that I should ever submit to be so mean a slave as to forget what I owe to the place of my nativity, and to the laws of my country. After all this, what do I get for my good-will, but fresh indignities, railings, and injuries? Yet all this is not so bad as I deserve, for endeavouring to preserve a sort of people that fate and Providence are resolved to destroy. What can be clearer than the frequent predictions we meet with in history, pointing at the destruction of this miserable city? and that the time of it is near at hand, when the Jews are tearing out the hearts one of another? This is so far come to pass, that not only the houses, but the temples, are polluted with the blood of your own tribes. What is all this but the divine judgment of God, punishing the Jews by the hands of the Romans, which will probably end in purging the city by fire?"

Josephus was interrupted by an overflow of tears, which caused the Romans to compassionate his affliction, and admire his humanity: but the more he lamented the deplorable state of his country, the more implacable were John and his confederates against the Romans, as well as desirous of getting Josephus into their power. But his address had great influence with the better sort. Many of the faction also, finding the case desperate, and giving up all for lost, would have gone over to the Romans, but durst not stir through fear of their own guards. Others there were who took opportunity of eluding the vigilance of their companions, amongst whom were the high-priests, Joseph and Jesus, the three sons of Ishmael, who was beheaded at Cyrene, four sons of Matthias, and one son of another Matthias, who made his escape to the Romans, after Simon, the son of Gioras, had put the father and three of his sons to death, as before-mentioned. There were many persons of condition that deserted with the priests, who were graciously received by Titus Caesar, but sent away to Gophne for the present, with a promise of large possessions to be distributed amongst them at the end of the war. Titus gave them this assignment apart, to avoid the unbecoming of mixing with people of different manners, laws, and customs; and they were highly pleased with their allotment.

When they were all withdrawn to their colony, and none of them seen any longer in the city, the faction spread a report, that these deserters were slain by the Romans, to deter the rest from making their escape. This device succeeded once again as before; but Titus, being aware of the design, recalled them from Gophne, and ordered them to take the tour of the walls with Josephus, and shew themselves to the town, which brought over more proselytes to the Romans than ever. As they were assembled upon this occasion, they stood before the Romans; and pressing the faction with importunities and lamentation, intreated them either to receive the Romans into the city, and deliver their country, or otherwise quit the temple, to prevent the firing it, which the Romans would never agree to but upon the last extremity. This rendered the faction more outrageous against the fugitives with their stones, darts, arrows, slings, and engines, which being planted at the very gates, the temple resembled a repository of arms more than a place of religious worship; and the dead bodies lay as thick every where about it as if it had been a common burial ground.

Those sacrilegious wretches rushed into the holy sanctuary with their arms still warm and reeking with the blood of their countrymen: nay, they went to the extremest degree of impiety and prophaneness; while the Romans, to the eternal scandal of the Jews, paid a greater reverence to their rites and ceremonies than they did themselves. There was not a man in the army of Titus who had not a veneration for the temple itself, and the Supreme Being that was there worshipped; and that did not heartily wish for the repentance of the faction, while mercy was yet to be obtained.

Titus was so deeply affected with the state of these wretched people, that he once more endeavoured, by appeal as follows, to bring the faction to reason.

"Tell me, inhuman miscreants! what were all the bars and partitions for about this holy place, with the Latin and Greek inscriptions upon these pillars, forbidding all people, upon a penalty, not to pass this enclosure? Nor have we ourselves been less tender of your privileges, in making it death for any man to pass these bounds, not excepting the Romans themselves. How comes the sanctuary, after this, to be prophaned with assassinations and murders, and the temple defiled with blood, foreign and domestic? I appeal to all the gods of my country, and to the late patron of this holy temple, (who hath now forsaken it,) to my army, to the Jews that have joined with me, and finally to yourselves, that I am innocent of all these abominations: and I do sacredly promise, that if you will but comply in quitting this holy place, no man shall offer it any indignity; for I will preserve and protect your temple."

CHAP. V.

The besieged are still refractory, and Titus proceeds on the war. He forms his party, and posts himself upon Fort Antonia. An attack in the night followed with dismal uproar and confusion. The Romans and Jews contend desperately, till at length it comes to a drawn battle. Several Jewish officers signalize their valour. Four banks raised. A bloody contest. A wonderful exploit of one Pedanius. The Jews fire the temple galleries. A fantastical challenge of one Jonathan, and the result of it.

TITUS, upon this occasion, had Josephus for his interpreter; but the faction erroneously construed his generous application to them into timidity, and thereupon grew more insolent and outrageous. The noble Roman therefore, finding they had no regard either for the preservation of the temple or themselves, took a resolution, though against his inclination, to prosecute the war. As there was not space sufficient to draw up his whole army, he detached thirty out of every company, with a tribune at the head of every thousand, and appointed a chief commander in chief. With this detachment they were to have fallen upon the enemy's guards about the ninth hour of the night, and Titus himself was to have led on the attack. But, upon a council of war, the officers were all of opinion, that it would be more advisable for him to post himself upon Fort Antonia, where he might see and observe how his men acquitted themselves, without running the risk of danger in his own person; beside, that it would inspire his people to display their bravery in the sight of their general.

Titus submitted to the opinion of his officers and friends, and withdrew to a watch-tower on Fort Antonia, where he might see and judge of the whole action; charging his officers, at the same time, to observe minutely who did well or ill, that they might be rewarded or punished accordingly. These matters were no sooner settled, but orders were given, and an hour appointed for the attack. The Romans did not find the guards asleep, as was expected; so that the parties, on the advance of both sides, came presently to action, with a confusion of clamour, which awakening their companions, brought them on in multitudes to second them. The Romans stood the first shock; but the numbers that followed fell indifferently upon their own people, without knowing friend or foe stunder; for, betwixt the noise of the uproar, and the darkness of the night, they knew neither voices or faces apart, but following the impulse of a blind rage, fell foul upon whatever came in their way at a venture.

Some Romans, who kept themselves in order under the cover of their bucklers, and knew one another by the word or signal, made a tolerable shift in the scuffle; whereas the Jews were in perpetual confusion, and, by mistaking foes for friends, and friends for foes, destroyed more of their own men than the Romans did. But at break of day, when light revealed their error, they proceeded more regularly, and plied their darts and arrows on both sides with as much vigour as if they had not been engaged in the night. The Romans, who had Titus for the judge, the witness and spectator of their behaviour, looked upon the valour of that day's action as the foundation of their future fortunes, and fought, one and all, with a noble emulation; while the Jews, at the same time, had their lives and their temple at stake, with the tyrant John at the head of them, exhorting some with fair words, and treating others with menaces or blows. This fight was mostly hand to hand, but with various changes backwards and forwards; for there was scarcely room either on either of pursuit. Antonia was, in effect, a kind of theatre of war, and Titus and his friends the spectators, calling out to the actors to follow their leaders, at other times to stand their ground, as the occasion required; and nothing passed that escaped their observation.

The contest lasted from the ninth hour of the night to the fifth the next day; both sides maintaining the ground till it came, in the conclusion, to a drawn battle. Several noble Romans behaved like heroes, and those who signalized themselves amongst the best were the following; Judas, the son of Mercurius, a Roman soldier; Jacob, the son of Sela; Callidon, the son of Cathlas; who were Idumaeans. On John's party were Caphthens and Alexas; and of the Jews was Simon, the son of Jair.

In the course of seven days the foundations of the temple were thrown up, and a broad way cut for the Romans to march up to the wall, where they immediately fell to work upon four banks. The first was against the corner of the inner temple, that lay to the north and east; the second against the gallery, to the northward, betwixt the two gates; the third towards the west porch of the outward temple; and the fourth towards the north porch. But the bringing of the materials an hundred furlongs from the place was attended with infinite charge and labour; besides the many surprizes they met with in the way, for the Romans were too confident and careless, and the Jews rash enough to attempt any thing.

It was the practice of several of the Romans, when they went out to forage, to turn their horses loose to graze; and it was as common for the Jews to fall out upon to find an opportunity, and carry them off. This happened to often, that Titus imputed it, at last, rather to the negligence of the Romans, than the daring efforts of the Jews. Nor did he judge erroneously; for, upon punishing some of the soldiers for the loss of their horses, it secured all the rest, as they were all more wary in future.

When the Romans had raised their banks, and put themselves in a posture to begin their attacks upon the temple, many of the faction was so pressed by famine, on the failure of their ravages, that they assembled in a body, about the eleventh hour of the day, and made an assault upon the Roman guards towards the mount of Olives, in hopes of either taking them unawares, or finding them withdrawn. But the Romans, apprized of their intention in due time, drew out all the strength they were able to make, and put a stop to a most desperate attempt they had projected upon the wall. It came, in fine, to a bloody contest, and both sides achieved wonders; the Romans valuing themselves upon the reputation of their prowess and military conduct, and the Jews vaunting on a fool-hardy and mistaken valour. The one for shame, the other from necessity: for it appeared disgraceful to the Romans to suffer the Jews to escape, as they were now entrapped; and the Jews had no hopes of saving themselves, but by forcing the Romans.

An instance of the fortitude of one Pedanius, a noble Roman, upon this occasion, is worthy of being related. The Jews being routed, and pursued by the besiegers into the valley, this Pedanius pressing full speed after them, overtook a corpulent man, heavily armed, spurring on for life. Such were his strength, agility, and skill in the equestrian art, that he took the fugitive Jew off his horse by the leg, and carried him as his prisoner to Titus, who admired the fortitude of the young Roman, but ordered the prisoner to be punished with death, for his attempt against the Roman works; after which he prosecuted his design of besieging the temple, and raising the bank.

The Jews finding themselves every day become more weak, as the war grew more hot, and advanced to the very temple itself, followed the example of men in pestilential distempers, by cutting off the infected parts to save the body. According to this allegory, they began with setting fire to that part of the gallery that, reaching from the north to the east, faced Antonia, where they made a gap of near twenty cubits, and thereby made a beginning of destroying the sanctuary with their own hands.

On the twenty-fourth day of the month Panemus, the Romans put the same gallery in a flame; and when the fire gained fourteen cubits, the Jews took down the roof, and so went on, still cutting off all communication with Antonia. They might have stopped the progress of the flames, had they not deemed their breathing to tend to their own advantage. However, there passed all this time daily skirmishes and encounters, every where about the temple.

There was at this time a man amongst the Jews, low of stature, mean in appearance, of neither birth or character to claim respect, whose name was Jonathan. This satirical mortal went out to the monument of John, the high-priest, and there in a vain-glorious tone, chaffed any man of the whole Roman army to raise him sword in hand. No individual appeared to take him up; some despised, and others feared him; at last, they were not disposed to encounter with a man in distress, and desirous of death, who feared neither God nor man, and where consequently no honour could redound from victory, as a man and a brute could not be supposed to be upon equal terms. When this insolent Jew had waited a considerable time for a companion, desisting upon the cowardice of the Jews, mans, one Pudens, of the equestrian order, incensed at his taunts, stood forth, and accepted the challenge. The contempt in which he held the insignificant Jew rendered him rash and careless; so that unfortunately stumbling, Jonathan took the advantage, and slew him when he was down; and then standing on the dead body, brandished his sword, bloody as it was, and shook his shield with his left hand, triumphing over his antagonist at his feet, and deriding the spectators in the Roman army. While the Jew was in the height of his exultation, Priscus, a centurion, shot him through the heart with an arrow, which laid him dead upon the body of his enemy, and was deemed a just judgment upon him for assuming merit from an action not founded on genuine courage, but intemperate zeal.

A stratagem
of the Jews
pernicious to the Romans.

THE faction in the temple now openly endeavoured to beat off the Roman soldiers that were upon the banks; and, on the twenty-seventh of the month aforesaid, the Jews contrived the following stratagem. They filled the roof of the western porch, betwixt the top and the timbers, with a quantity of dry wood, sulphur, and bituminous matter, and then pretending to give way upon an attack, suffered themselves to be beaten out, as if they had not been able to maintain it. Many of the rash and inconsiderate among the Romans followed them close upon the pursuit, and set up ladders to make good what the others had quitted; but the cool and dispassionate among them conceived it to be a stratagem, and remained in their former situation. Upon the Romans crowding into the porch, the Jews set fire to it, and all was immediately in a blaze, to the astonishment of those that were out of the reach of it, and most desperate horror and confusion of the rest. Some plunged themselves into wells and pits, others leaped headlong down the houses; some were smothered in the flames, and others ran upon their swords, to prevent one death by another.

Titus could not but commiserate those who thus miserably perished, though they rashly ventured upon the attack without orders, and thereby subjected themselves to the penalty of death by their own law, if they escaped it by the stratagem of the enemy. They had this comfort in their distress, that, to balance the loss of their lives, they had the love and pity of their prince for whom they died, as they could see him calling and labouring up and down to do all that was possible for their relief; and every instance of his affection was looked upon as a memorial to his immortal honour. Those who survived the fatal catastrophe were beset by the Jews, and, after a stout resistance, every man of them put to the sword.

The fortitude of Longus, a Roman.

Many brave men fell in this desperate adventure; but none more valiant than one Longus, who, in justice and honour, cannot be passed over in silence upon so memorable an occasion. This Longus was a Roman, and in the vigour of his youth. The Jews found him a daring and dangerous man, and had no way of cutting him off, unless they could get him down to them, upon honour that he should return safe again without any violence to his person. His brother Cornelius taking notice of this, called out to him on the other hand, adjuring him not to do any thing that either his country or himself should have reason to be ashamed of. Longus upon this drew his sword, and slew himself in the sight of both parties.

Craft of Artorius.

There was one Artorius that delivered himself from the fire by his subtlety. Being reduced to an extremity, he called out to Lucius, one of his fellow soldiers, solemnly declaring, "that if he would catch him in his arms, and break his fall, he would make him his heir." Artorius accordingly took his leap; and the other disposing himself to receive him, the weight of the one dashed the other with such violence on the stone pavement, that he immediately expired.

This melancholy accident greatly affected the Romans, but it kept them afterwards more upon their guard against the frauds and stratagems of the Jews, by which they had been most essentially injured, in divers instances.

The porch was burnt as far as the tower that John erected in his war with Simon; and the Jews, after burning of the Romans, brake down the rest. The following day the Romans set fire to the north porch, and carried it before them to that on the east, that overlooks the valley of Cedron from a stupendous precipice. Such was the state of the temple at that time.

C H A P. VII.

A dreadful famine in Jerusalem, with the miseries that attended it.

TO add to the distress which befell a devoted nation, a dreadful famine now raged in Jerusalem, and the miseries that attended it were inconceivable. The city was well nigh depopulated. The bare mention of food was sufficient to create family discord, and dissolve friendship cemented by the dearest ties. Those that were evidently expiring with hunger, could scarcely be believed at the last gasp; and they would search the very bosoms of the dead for bread. If they were disappointed in their expectation, despair hurried them up and down, raging like mad dogs, and staggering like drunken men, ransacking the same houses over and over again. Their hunger was so intolerable, that they gathered and eat such things as the most filthy animals would not touch; nor did they abstain from their girdles, shoes, nor the very leather which belonged to their shields. An handful of old hay was sold for four attics. But why should I point out their dreadful judgment by referring to things inanimate, when I have a personal instance to cite, that cannot be equalled in history, either among the Greeks or Barbarians? As the fact cannot be related or heard without horror, I was inclined to suppress it; but, upon reflection that there were so many living witnesses to confirm it, I hold it my duty to hand it down upon record to posterity.

C H A P. VIII.

Mary, a woman of rank and quality, is so tormented with hunger, that she eats the flesh of her own infant. Solemn protestation of Titus upon the occasion.

THERE was a certain woman that dwelt beyond Jordan, whose name was Mary. Her father was Eleazar, of the village of Bethzob, which signifies the house of hyssop. She was opulent, as well as nobly descended, and had fled to Jerusalem with the rest of the multitude, where, at this time, she was with them besieged. The tyrant stripped her of her most precious treasure which she had brought out of Perea; and her house was daily broke open and rifled by the soldiers, for either goods or provisions, which she had concealed. In consequence of such outrages, she reviled the faction in the most opprobrious terms, but could not work them up to such a pitch of indignation as to put her to death. When she found herself brought to the last extremity, totally deprived of the means of supporting existence, the pains of a tormenting famine having already seized her, she seems to have given herself up to all the fury of the direst want, and formed the most horrid and unnatural resolution that can either be conceived or expressed.

She had an infant sucking at her breast, which snatching up, and looking tenderly upon, she burst out into this rhapsody: "What shall I say to thee, my son?"

The DAUGHTER of ELEAZAR during the SIEGE and FAMINE at JERUSALEM, after having killed her sucking infant, and eaten a part of it to prevent herself from perishing. Offering the remains to the persecuting band who had entered her House to demand her provisions. — Published as the Act directs by J. Cooke No. 7 Paternoster Row

"unfortunate child, who art brought into the world under a complication of three such dreadful judgments as war, famine, and rebellion? In which of the three shall I reserve thee? The Romans will give thee thy life, perhaps, but not thy liberty. Famine will also prevent slavery: but thou wilt find our present tyrants incomparably worse than the other two. Be thou then my food; and finally compleat the history of the Jews with the only execrable abomination that is yet wanting to perfect their misery." With these words she slew her child, dressed it, and having eaten one part herself, set by the remainder, and kept it covered. Some of the faction entering her house, and smelling a nauseous scent, threatened her with immediate death if she did not bring out her provisions. Upon this she produced the remainder of the inhuman repast; and the robbers being thrilled with horror at the sight, she thus addressed them. "This is really my child, and this the food I have myself prepared. I have eaten one part; do you eat the other. You will not, I presume, be more scrupulous than a woman, or more tender than a mother. If, however, you loath the offering I present you, as I have eaten one part, let the other also be reserved for me." They then departed, struck with horror and amazement, as the only instance of humanity they had ever shewn.

The report of this horrid deed soon spread throughout the city, and it became the subject of equal terror and detestation, as if each individual had a part in the crime. The miseries of famine excited an aversion to life; and the living envied the dead that were taken away before they were brought to an extremity of woe. The dreadful story soon reached the Romans, some of whom pitied the miserable people, others detested them, and others gave no credit to it.

Titus, to acquit himself of having been accessory to so horrid a deed, solemnly protested, as in the presence of God, that he had proposed to the Jews peace and liberty, as well as an oblivion of all their former insolent practices; but that they, instead of concord, had chosen sedition; instead of peace, war; and instead of plenty and abundance, famine. That they had begun with their own hands to burn that temple which the Romans had hitherto preserved, and that therefore their miseries were what they deserved. That he was determined to bury their iniquities in their ruin, and not leave a city standing upon the face of the earth, where mothers devoured their own children, and the fathers, more impious if possible, persisted in a war, after so many demonstrations of the Divine vengeance." Titus, reflecting on the incorrigible obstinacy of these people, gave them for lost, as, if they had any sensibility, the calamities they had suffered must have reclaimed them.

There were others, at the same time, sapping the foundation on the north-side; and when they found that, with incredible labour, they could only loosen some of the outward stones, without moving any of the rest, (for the porch yet stood firm,) they perceived that nothing effectual could be done by digging and mining, so that the Romans betook themselves to their scaling ladders.

Though the Jews could not hinder them from planting their ladders, they made a brave resistance, where places would admit of it, encountering those that got up hand to hand, before they could put themselves upon their guard, casting others down headlong as they were mounting, cutting off some as they were advancing with relief, and sometimes overturning ladders, men, and all together. The loss of the Romans upon this encounter was very considerable, especially in the disputes they had for defending or recovering their colours: but, in the conclusion, the Jews kept the ensigns they took, and killed the ensign-bearers, which terrified the rest, and forced them to a retreat. To do justice to the assailants, it must be confessed, there fell not a man of them but died like a Roman. Those of the faction who had acquitted themselves bravely in former encounters did so still, as did Eleazar, the nephew of Simon, the tyrant. But Titus, finding, by this time, that, in sparing a foreign temple, he sacrificed his own men, ordered his people forthwith to set fire to the gates.

In the mean time there deserted to him Ananus, of Emmaus, the most bloody and inhuman of all Simon's guards, and Archelaus, the son of Magadathes, hoping forgiveness from the late successes of the Jews. Titus was so well informed of the infamous characters, and barbarous practices, of those pretended converts, that he was once inclined to have both put to death, notwithstanding this pretence, being fully convinced that it was necessity and design, not affection or good-will, that brought them over. Nor did he think those deserving of life, who had first set their country in a flame, and then abandoned it. However, upon second thoughts, he overcame the provocation, and forgave them, tho' with a resolution never to trust them.

The gates of the temple were by this time in a blaze; the silver-work over them melted, and the timbers all in a flame, insomuch that the fire caught hold of the galleries. The Jews were so surprized to find themselves wrapped up in flames, that they stood gaping at each other in astonishment, without so much as attempting any thing toward their relief, or concerning themselves either for what was already consumed, or saving the rest. They had, in short, neither heart nor strength left them; and the fire prevailed all that day and the night following, till, by degrees, it burnt down the galleries.

Titus gave orders next day for the quenching of the fire, and levelling the ways for the march of his army. After this he called a council of his general officers. It consisted of Tiberius Alexander, his lieutenant-general, Sextus Cerealis, commander of the fifth legion, Larcus Lepidus, of the tenth, Titus Trigius, of the fifteenth, Isterius Fronto, Julianus, governor of Judæa, with other officers of the first rank. This respectable council being called to deliberate on what measures were necessary to be taken in the business of the temple, some were for maintaining the rigour of the law of arms, as, so long as that temple stood, and the numerous meetings therein continued, the Jews (they said) would never be quiet: others were for saving the temple upon condition of the Jews quitting it, that there might be no farther quarrel about it; but that, if possession should be obtained by the sword, by all means to burn it; not as a temple, but a castle; for, in that case, the blame would be theirs that forced the burning it, not theirs that did it by necessity.

Titus interposing here, made some remarks on the impropriety of turning a temple into a citadel, tho' the Jews were obstinate, revenging the stubbornness of a rebellious people upon stocks and stones, and laying the most glorious fabric in ashes for their sakes. He added, it would be an affront to the dignity of Rome itself, to think of depriving the empire of so illustrious an ornament.

When Alexander, Cerealis, and Fronto, found how Titus was disposed, they came over to his opinion; and the council was dismissed, with orders to the army to rest and refresh themselves to be the fitter for action; several choice battalions being ordered out, in the mean time, to look after the fire, and cut out ways over the ruins. The Jews, being much fatigued and harrassed, remained inactive this day; but the day following, when they had gathered strength, and recruited their spirits, they made a desperate sally, about the second hour, through the eastern gate, upon the guards of the outward temple. The Romans stood the first shock, under cover of their bucklers, with great resolution; but they could not long have opposed such vast numbers, so resolutely bent, if Titus, who saw the action from Antonia, had not seasonably come up, with a select body of horse, to their relief, before they gave ground. The Jews shrunk upon this charge; and the Romans breaking in upon their front, the rest betook themselves to flight; but when the Romans drew off in their course, the Jews rallied, and came on again. In this manner they took their turns interchangeably, one after another, till about the fifth hour of the day, when the Jews were forced into the temple, and shut up there. Titus retired to the tower of Antonia, with a resolution to storm the temple, with his whole army, early the next morning; as it seems to have been doomed by Providence to fire; and, in course of time, the fatal day was now at hand, according to the revolution of time. It was upon the tenth day of the month, and the very same day whereupon it was formerly burnt by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. But this was a conflagration which the Jews brought upon themselves, for Titus had no sooner left them quiet, than the rebels made a sally upon his guards, as they were at work, by his order, to extinguish the fire. But the Romans put the Jews to flight, and pursued them to the temple itself.

C H A P. X.

A soldier, under pretext of a Divine impulse, sets fire to the temple. Titus gives orders to have the fire quenched. A terrible slaughter of the Jews.

A soldier sets fire to the temple.

AT this time one of the Roman soldiers, without staying for any orders, or without any concern or dread upon him for so impious an act, and being hurried on, as he afterwards pretended, by a certain Divine impulse, mounted the shoulders of one of his comrades, and cast a flaming brand into the golden window, that looks towards the apartments on the north side of the temple. The place took fire immediately, which raised such an hideous outcry among the Jews, that they hastened with all possible expedition to prevent its progress; for this was not a time to consult their personal security, when all that was dear and precious to them was at stake.

The news of this conflagration being brought to Titus, as he was reposing himself in his tent, after the fatigue of the combat, he arose in great haste, and immediately taking his chariot, passed to the temple, in order to have a stop put to the fire. His great officers followed him; and the legions after them, in such confusion as is natural to a vast multitude without discipline. Titus did all that could be done, by words and signs, towards quenching the fire; but it was ineffectual; for the greater noise drowned the less; and they were as blind to the signals he gave with his hand, as they were deaf to the words he uttered from his mouth. Nor were the soldiers to be swayed by menaces or commands, but followed the impulse of rage and passion. Some were trampled to death in crowds, others choaked in the fultry ruins of the galleries over the porches; and it was the same, in effect, whether they overcame, or were overcome. The common soldiers in the temple pretended, in excuse of their disobedience, that they could not hear the word of command from their general; and those who followed, gave the word forward to throw fire.

The faction were in too great distress to afford any assistance, for, wherever they turned themselves, they saw nothing but blood and destruction. The poor, the sickly, and unarmed, were put to death in every quarter: mountains of dead bodies were piled upon the altar, and streams of blood flowed down the steps leading to it, with numbers of miserable wretches weltering in their gore.

When Titus found there was no restraining the enthusiastic fury of his soldiers, and that the fire continued to gain more and more, he took some of his chief officers with him into the inward temple, where, upon strict examination of matters, he found the glory and magnificence of the place even beyond the very fame of it, or at least equal to the report of the Jews themselves. But as the flames had not reached, and there was therefore ground to hope it might yet not be too late to save, the Holy of Holies, Titus, in person, endeavoured to persuade, nay earnestly besought, his soldiers to do their utmost to stop the progress of the fire, giving it in charge to Liberalis, a centurion of his guards, to press his commands, and inflict corporal punishment upon those that disobeyed. But, through ungovernable rage, that approached phrenzy, neither fear nor respect were sufficient to keep them within the bounds of duty. There was others whose hearts were set upon booty, not doubting but, where the doors were plated with gold, they should find the inside filled with hidden treasure.

While Titus was so very intent upon saving the temple, one of the soldiers at the same time set fire to some of the door-posts; whereupon the general, and his officers, were forced to withdraw out of distance of preventing the mischief; so that the temple was destroyed at last, in despite of whatever Titus could do to hinder it.

This desolation was a calamity sufficient to melt the most obdurate heart, if we duly consider the ruins of the most stupendous fabric that ever was seen or heard of, both for structure, bulk, state, magnificence, the honour of religion, and of holy things. But it is to be remembered, to our comfort and instruction, that an uncontrollable fatality attends all terrestrial works, animate and inanimate, and that all things must have their period. It is a most remarkable revolution also, that this second conflagration should so exactly answer the very month and day of the former under Nebuchadnezzar, as already observed. We reckon from the beginning of the first temple by Solomon, to the destruction of this, in the second year of Vespasian, one thousand, one hundred, and thirty years, seven months, and fifteen days; and from the second building of it by Haggai, in the second year of Cyrus, six hundred and thirty-nine years, and forty-five days.

C H A P. XI.

The distresses in which the Jews were plunged upon the conflagration of the temple. Several priests are engaged in the quarrel with the Romans. The destruction that was occasioned by the advice of a false prophet.

WHILE the temple was in flames, the soldiers plundered all that came to hand, and slew all they met, without respect to age or sex, both young and old, sacred and profane, priests and laicks; all went together; and men of all sorts and conditions were involved in the common calamities of the war, and, whether they resisted or submitted, whether they stood it out, or begged for quarter, they all fared alike, falling victims in the common destruction. As the fire advanced, the crackling of the flames was heard in unison with the dying groans of people at their last gasp; and betwixt the depth of the hill, and the extent of the conflagration, the whole city seemed to be but one continued blaze. The tumult and and uproar were so dreadful, that nothing more terrible can possibly be conceived. The raging outcries of the Roman legions, the howling of the rebels under the devallation of fire and sword, and the dismal lamentation of distressed wretches in the temple, betwixt the enemy and fire, could not but pierce the ear and wound the heart of the most obdurately petrified. The adjacent mountains and places beyond Jordan, echoed the same complaints and grievances over and over again, and the calamity exceeded the noise. The flames were so impetuous and violent, that the very mountains, upon which the temple stood, appeared as one body of fire from the bottom; and the blood in proportion was answerable to the flame; for the number of the slain was superior to that of those who did the execution. The ground was covered over with carcases, and the soldiers pursued the living over the bodies of the dead. But, in the end, a band of rustians beat back the Romans, and having forced their way into the outward temple, made their escape into the city, and the rest of the multitude got into the outward porch.

There were several priests engaged in the quarrel with the Romans, that used the temple spikes instead of darts, and discharged them at the enemy; but when they found that this availed nothing, and that the fire burnt out upon them, they covered themselves, for a while, under a thick wall, that was eight cubits in breadth. Two of the principal men of this number, which were Meirus, the son of Belgas, and Joseph, the son of Daleus, that might have saved themselves by going over to the Romans, chose rather to stand or fall with their companions, and so plunging themselves into the flames, shared in the common fate.

When the Romans found the temple itself reduced to ashes, they looked upon the rest of the buildings as trivial, and so fired all at once, except one of the galleries on the east side, and another on the south; but they soon after followed the fortune of the rest. They burnt also the treasury and the wardrobe, with jewels, money, and costly habits, to an immense value. The place, in fine, was the repository of all the Jews had that was precious.

There were now assembled, in one gallery, yet standing, women, children, and a mixed multitude, that fled from the rabble, to the number of near six thousand persons. But before Titus had determined any thing concerning these people, or given the officers any orders relating to them, the soldiers, in a rage of brutal fury, set the place on fire, and plied it so closely, that, betwixt those that were burnt to death, and others that had cast themselves headlong down the ruins to save themselves, there was not one that escaped death.

A false prophet was accessory to all this mischief, by making proclamation in the city, that it was the will of the Almighty they should go immediately up to the temple, with an assurance that there they should have an infallible proof of his Divine favour and protection. It was, indeed, a common practice of the faction, to pretend to revelations, in order to keep the credulous multitude firm against all dangers, and to secure them from deserting. But men in adversity are apt to hope the best, especially where they are promised relief, though it be only upon the credit of a false prophet.

The portentous signs which preceded the destruction of Jerusalem. A comet resembling a sword. An extraordinary light about the altar. An heifer brings forth a lamb. The brazen gate of the temple opens of itself. Various conjectures about its signification. Chariots and armies in the air. A voice crying in the temple "Let us be gone." A strange exclamation of one Jesus, a plebeian and husbandman, with his death.

The prophecy of an emperor to come out of Judaea fulfilled in the person of Vespasian.

THUS were these miserable people deluded by impostors, while they did not attend, nor give credit, to signs that were most evident, and plainly foretold their future desolation. Indeed, like infatuated mortals, with neither eyes capable of seeing, nor minds capable of reflection, they could not perceive the denunciations of the Almighty against them, amongst which were the following. There was a star, resembling a sword, which stood over the city, and a comet that continued a whole year.

Thus also, before the Jews revolted, and before these commotions, which preceded the war, when the people assembled in multitudes to the feast of unleavened bread, on the eighth day of the month Xanthicus, and at the ninth hour of the day, to great a light shone round the altar and the sanctuary, that it appeared to be bright day. This prodigy was looked upon by the ignorant as a good omen; but it was expounded by the more discerning as the forerunner of a war, and the mystery unfolded before it came to pass.

At the same festival also an heifer, as she was led by the high-priest to be sacrificed, brought forth a lamb in the midst of the temple.

Moreover the eastern gate of the inner temple, which was of brals, and very ponderous, and had been, with difficulty, shut by twenty men, rested upon a basis armed with iron, and had bolts fastened very deep into the firm floor, which was there made of one entire stone, was seen to open of itself about the sixth hour of the night. Upon notice given of it to the proper officer, he came immediately to look after it, and with much difficulty fastened it again. This also appeared to the vulgar to be an happy prodigy; but the wiser formed a contrary judgment, and supposed that the opening of the gate was in favour of the enemy, and foretold the desolation of the city.

A few days after the festival was over, on the twenty-first of the month Artemisius, there appeared to extraordinary a vision, that I would not undertake to record it, if I could not produce several witnesses, yet living, to confirm the truth of it, and if the calamities, that were foretold, had not come to pass. There were seen, up and down in the air, before sun-set, chariots and armed men, all over the country, and surrounding several cities.

At the feast of Pentecost, as the priests were going, by night, to officiate in the inner temple, according to custom, they heard, at first, a kind of confused murmur, and, after that, a voice, calling out articulately, "Let us be gone, let us be gone."

But what is still more extraordinary, one Jesus, the son of Ananus, a plebeian and an husbandman, who, four years before the commencement of the war, and at a time when the city enjoyed peace and plenty, came to the feast of tabernacles, brake out into this exclamation: "A voice from the east, a voice from the west, a voice from the four winds, a voice to Jerusalem, and a voice to the temple, a voice to the bridegrooms and the brides, and a voice to the whole nation." This was his cry day and night, from place to place, through every street of the city. Several persons of eminence were so offended at this dire yell, that they caused the man to be apprehended, and severely punished; to which he submitted without a murmur, or alledging a word in his own defence, but still persisted in the exclamation before-mentioned. The magistrates suspecting (as the case proved to be) that he was actuated by an extraordinary impulse, caused him to be brought before Albinus, at that time our procurator, who ordered him to be scourged with the utmost rigour. He submitted in the same manner as before, without either tear or supplication; but cried out at every stroke, in the most melancholy tone, woe, woe to Jerusalem! When Albinus demanded of him what he was, whence he came, and why why he uttered these words? He made no manner of reply, but continued his doleful ditty, till the procurator dismissed him as a lunatic.

From that time, to the beginning of the war, he was never known to hold intercourse with any of the citizens, but every day uttered these lamentable words, "Woe, woe to Jerusalem." He never gave an ill word to those that scourged him, or a good one to those that fed him; but this was his reply to all men, and, indeed, no other than a melancholy preface of what was to come. He was observed to be much more clamorous upon festivals than upon other days; and in this manner he continued to proceed, nor did his voice or strength fail him, till the siege of Jerusalem verified his predictions. After this he took the tour of the wall once again, vehemently exclaiming, "Woe, woe to this city, this temple, and this people!" and adding, by way of conclusion, "Woe, woe to myself!" At this instant he was taken off with a stone from an engine, in the midst of his forebodings.

Reflections
of Josephus.

These circumstances tend to prove that the destruction of mankind is from themselves; and that a benevolent Creator, in his all-wise providence, is wanting in nothing that may conduce to the common good and benefit of universal nature. But when we are cautioned of future events, and will take no warning, our ruin lies at our own door. Why did the Jews, after the taking of Antiochia, make the temple square, when they were conscious to themselves of a prediction, that both temple and city should be taken, when it should be reduced to that form? But they were chiefly stimulated to this unfortunate war by the misconstruction of a preface, importing that, in those days, there should one come out of Judæa that should have the command of the whole world. This they applied to their own nation, and many great men fell into the same error. But this prophecy, in fact, related to Vespasian, who was created emperor in Judæa. But fancy suggests divers interpretations; and thus it was with the Jews, till, in the end, they suffered for their errors, by the irreparable destruction of themselves and their country.

The prophecy of an emperor to come out of Judæa, fulfilled in Vespasian.

C H A P. XIII.

Titus is saluted emperor, according to ancient custom. The force of hunger and drought in extremity. Titus orders certain priests to be put to death. Simon and John, the heads of factions, desire a conference with Titus. The emperor agrees to it, and makes a suitable speech upon the occasion. The Jews reject the terms he offers. Titus resolves on the total demolition of the city, but, on the supplications of some royal intercessors, abates of his rigour, and demonstrates his clemency.

Titus proclaimed emperor by the army.

THE faction having fled into the city on the burning of the temple, and all the buildings about it, the Romans lodged their ensigns against the eastern gate, where they offered sacrifice, and, with great shouts and acclamations, proclaimed Titus emperor. The soldiers acquired such immense booty, that gold in Syria was reduced to one half of its former value.

Necessity suggests invention.

There was a boy among the priests, upon the wall, that begged permission of the Roman guards to descend, and get some water to quench the parching thirst under which he laboured. The guards commiserating his tender years and extreme necessity, gave him their right hands as a security for his life. The boy accordingly descended, drank, filled a vessel he had with him, and returned to his friends with such expedition, that the guards could not overtake him. The Romans, upon this, charged him with perfidy; but he ingeniously pleaded that he covenanted only for liberty to fetch the water, not to continue with them when he had it, and consequently had not violated any agreement. The plea was admitted, and the delusion looked over on account of his tender years.

On the fifth day after this, the priests, urged by outrageous hunger, came down from the walls, and being conducted by the guards to Titus, cast themselves at his feet, and implored his mercy. But he told them the time of pardon was over; for the temple being destroyed, it was but reasonable they should follow, since the priests and their temple should be inseparable; and upon this he ordered them to be put to death.

The heads of the faction, finding themselves so encompassed, that there was no possibility of escaping, desired a conference with Titus, who, with his natural generosity, was inclined to grant it; partly from a desire to save the town, and partly at the instance of his friends, in hopes that the rebels might be brought to better terms for the future.

Titus then made a stand on the west side of the inner temple, near the gates that led to the gallery, where there was a bridge of communication betwixt the temple and the upper town, which, at this time, parted the Romans and the Jews. The multitude on both sides gathered about their generals; the Jews about Simon and John, to learn what hopes there were of pardon; and the Romans about Titus, desirous of seeing the manner in which he would receive the supplicants. Having commanded silence, and an intermission of all hostilities, he delivered his mind to them, by an interpreter, to the following effect:

"Is not your country wretched enough? Will you never be brought to a sense either of your own weakness, or of the Roman power, but, like to many madmen, ruin your people, city, and temple, at once, and yourselves too most deservedly in the conclusion? When were you ever out of broils and tumults, since Pompey laid your city in ashes? Nothing will serve you now but open war against the Romans. Is it your numbers you depend upon? You have seen the time that one half of our army have been able to cope with you. Do you value yourselves upon the faith of your auxiliaries and allies? Where is that people under the sun, that is not more or less in our allegiance? or that would not rather have the Romans as friends than the Jews? If you reckon upon the strength of your bodies, take notice that the Germans are our subjects. And as to the firmness of your walls, are they stronger than the Britons' wall, the ocean? and yet those people, with that fence, have not been able to withstand us. If you rely upon the address and resolution of your leaders, we have been too hard, you know, for the Carthaginians themselves. But it is the humanity of the Romans that hath raised up enemies to themselves; first, in giving you lands in possession, and then setting up kings out of your own tribes to govern them. We have also granted you the freedom and exercise of your country's laws, and permitted you to live, both at home and abroad, according to your own liking. And, what is more than all the rest, we have allowed you the privilege of collecting, receiving, and employing contributions and tributes, for the maintenance of your religion and God's holy worship, with all freedom to yourselves and your friends. What's the use you have made of all these benefits, but to enrich yourselves into a capacity of doing us the more mischief, in the employing of our own money against ourselves? You do, in truth, behave yourselves like the worst of serpents, that practise upon the lives of those that take them into their bosoms.

"It is agreed, that the contempt you had for the spiritless disposition of Nero, made you forget the quiet that at the same time you enjoyed, and put you upon ambition and extravagant designs."

"My father, you must know, did not come into Judæa to call you to an account for your defection from Cestius, but rather to reform you by admonition and good advice. If the depopulating of this nation had been his business, he would have struck at the root, and begun with Jerusalem, rather than Galilee, and those parts, which he did on purpose to give you room and leisure to repent. But his liberality passed for weakness, and our lenity hath given you a boldness that you take for courage.

"After the death of Nero, according to the custom of other wicked men, you took advantage of our divisions; and my father and myself were no sooner gone to Egypt, than you took the opportunity of our being absent, to lay the foundation of a war against us; and, notwithstanding all the proofs we have given you of our tenderness and humanity in the government of those provinces, you had yet the effrontery to enter into practices against us, even when my father was already declared emperor, and myself Cæsar. Nay, it went further yet; for, after the very establishment of us, by common consent, in the quiet and peaceable possession of the empire, and the congratulatory compliments that were paid us by foreign ministers, upon our accession to the government, who but the Jews were still our enemies? as appeared by their dispatches of embassies and deputations beyond Euphrates, for assistance in their revolt. To say nothing of your new fortifications, factions, and competitions, till it came, in the end, to a civil war; an ingratitude that none but the wickedest of men could have been guilty of.

"When my father sent me (though with great difficulty and reluctance) to call this stubborn rebellious city to account, how pleased I was to hear that the people were disposed towards a peace! how did I beg of you to prevent a war before a blow was struck! Can you say that I did not make it as easy to you afterwards as I could? Did I ever refuse any man of you that offered himself? Did I ever break faith with any man that came over to me? How tender was I of your prisoners! or was I ever hard upon any man that did not inflame the quarrel? With what reluctance did I come to the battering of your wall! I avoided all bloody executions as much as possible. When did I ever get the better of you, and not sue for peace, as if you yourselves had been the conquerors? Whenever I came near your temple, I took no advantage of the right I had, by the law of arms, to destroy it; but only made it my request to you, to spare yourselves, and all that was holy that belonged to you. Did I not offer you free leave to depart, and upon terms of security too? Or, if nothing but fighting would serve your turn, I gave you the choice of your own time and place. What is the fruit now of all this tenderness, but the burning of the temple with your own hands, that I would so willingly have preserved? Have you the hardness now at last to invite me to a parley, as if you had any thing left to atone for what you have destroyed? How can you expect a pardon for yourselves, that would not so much as pardon your own temple? You present yourselves in arms too, without so much as pretending to be supplicants. But to come to the ground of this miserable confidence; your people are wholly disheartened, your temple is gone, the city mine, and yourselves all at my mercy: and yet you would be thought to insist upon terms of honour at last. Not to stand expostulating any longer with you on your follies, lay down your arms, and surrender yourselves, and I am yet content to give you your lives. When I have once done necessary justice upon the principal rebels, you shall find me a gentle master to the rest." The faction returned him this answer, "That they could not deliver themselves up upon any promise or assurance he could give them, because they were under an oath

"to the contrary; but that they were ready to be gone, if he pleased, with their wives and children, into the desert, and leave the town to the Romans." Titus was so incensed at prisoners giving law, and imposing conditions upon the conquerors, that he caused proclamation to be made, that no Jew should presume, for the future, to make any further application to Titus, or expect either protection or quarter; but that they might now defend themselves by arms as well as they could; for Cæsar was resolved to govern himself by the rules of war."

Titus then gave orders to the soldiers to plunder and burn the city; so that on the day following, they set fire to the repository of the archives, to the council-chamber, and a place called Ophlas; at which time the fire proceeded as far as the palace of queen Helena, which was in the middle of Acre. The lanes were also consumed, as were the houses that were full of the dead bodies of those who perished by famine.

On the same day the sons and brethren of king Izates, with several other persons of rank, preferred a petition to Titus for their lives, which, according to his wonted benevolence, he granted, though they had justly incurred his indignation. He ordered them, indeed, to be kept in custody; and the sons and relatives of Izates were sent bound as hostages to Rome.

C H A P. XIV.

The faction move to the palace-royal, where they slay about 8400 persons, and seize all their treasure. A nice point of honour amongst the Romans. The affection of Josephus for his country. Dreadful ravages of war and famine. Miserable resources of the faction.

THE faction now rushed into the palace-royal, where many had deposited their effects on account of its strength, drove the Romans out of it, slew about 8400 persons, and plundered them of all their treasure. They took, upon this occasion, two Roman soldiers alive, the one belonging to the infantry, the other to the cavalry. The former they slew, and had him dragged throughout the city, as revenging themselves upon the whole body of the Romans by this one instance. The latter, on pretence of having something to communicate relative to the interest of the faction, was brought before Simon; but the pretence appearing frivolous, he was delivered up to Ardalas, one of Simon's officers, to be punished. He was brought out with his hands bound behind him, and a band over his eyes, in order to be beheaded within sight of the Romans; but as the executioner was preparing for his office, the prisoner started away, and made his escape to the Romans.

The rebels fly to the palace.

Though Titus could not think of putting him to death for thus escaping from the enemy, yet, as he deemed it unworthy of a Roman soldier to be taken alive, he was disarmed cashiered; an indignity to a man of honour more piercing than the loss of life.

A point of honour among the Romans.

The next day the Romans drove the rebels out of the lower city, and set all on fire as far as Siloam. These soldiers, indeed, had the pleasure of seeing the city destroyed; but they missed the plunder, for the Jews had carried off all their effects, and were retired into the upper city. Such was their obstinacy, that, so far from repenting of the mischiefs they had done, they became insolent, and beheld the conflagration of the city with joyful countenances, in expectation of death, as they declared, to end their miseries. The people were now wasted, the temple burnt down, and the city in a blaze; so that there was nothing farther left for the enemy to do.

In this utmost extremity, however, Josephus did all that could be done to save the miserable ruins of a Patriotism of Josephus.

desolated city. He remonstrated with them on their barbarity and impiety, and gave them advice to their future proceedings. But they derided his counsel; as they were bound on oath not to surrender themselves, as well as so accustomed to slaughter, they could not restrain from the commission of it.

Dire effects of famine.

In this distracted state of things they dispersed themselves throughout the city, and laid in ambush amongst its ruins, to surprize those that might attempt to desert to the Romans. Accordingly many of them were taken; for they were too much reduced by famine to escape by flight. Their dead bodies were thrown to the dogs: but of all deaths famine was the most frightful and ghastly, insomuch that many went over to the Romans, despairing of mercy, and merely to exchange one death for another. The streets were strewed with dead bodies from one end of the city to the other, that had been either murdered or starved.

The vanity of the ty-rant's hopes.

The last hopes of the faction were in their recesses in subterraneous caverns, from a vain fancy that there they might lie concealed till the Romans were gone, and that then they might make their escape, not considering that no recess could hide them from the all-seeing eye of Divine justice. They depended, however, on these subterfuges, and did more mischief than the Romans by fire, killing and robbing all they could meet, that came for sanctuary to those caverns. Nay, they now fought one with another about their plunder; and I cannot but think, if their destruction had not prevented it, their barbarity would have induced the living to eat the flesh of the dead.

C H A P. XV.

The Romans begin to raise banks against the upper town. The Idumæans offer their services to Titus, who accepts the same, and grants them pardon. Simon puts the deputies of the Idumæans to death. Men, women, and children, sold like herds of beasts in a market. Titus sets 40,000 of the populace at liberty. Phineas, treasurer of the temple, makes a valuable discovery.

Titus renews the project of raising banks.

TITUS observing that the upper town was seated on such crags and precipices, that it could not possibly be taken without raising banks against it, entered upon that arduous undertaking the twentieth day of the month. The conveyance of the materials was attended with much difficulty, as all the trees within the distance of an hundred furlongs from the town were cut down for the former works. The four legions threw up a bank on the west side of the city, over against the palace royal. The auxiliaries, and the rest, cast up another towards the gallery with the bridge, and a fort that Simon built in his war with John, known by the name of Simon's Tower.

The Idumæans,
by deputies,
offer their services to Titus.

The deputies are put to death by Simon.

At the same time the Idumæan officers concerted a plan of desertion to the Romans, and sent five deputies with a tender of their services to Titus, and a petition for mercy in the name of the rest. Though the application was rather late, Titus, from an opinion that the rebel tyrants, John and Simon, would never stand it out after such a desertion, sent the deputies back with a promise of their lives; for he looked upon the Idumæans as the most considerable part of their army. The plan, it seems, had transpired; for the deputies were apprehended, immediately put to death, and their leaders imprisoned, of whom James, the son of Sofas, was the chief. Though much could not be expected from the common soldiers, now deprived of their officers, they were kept under a stricter guard; but even that precaution could not prevent their deserting. Many were cut off, but more escaped; for Titus had too much generosity to press his former prohibition to the utmost rigour; and the very soldiers themselves, betwixt the hopes of booty, and a glut of blood, became more humane and moderate. The common people were fold; with their wives and children, like beasts in a market, and at easy rates, there being but few purchasers.

Titus reflecting upon this, and upon his own proclamation, forbidding any more Jews to come over to him singly, was now pleased to dispense with his order, and to receive as many of them, one by one, as presented themselves; but with superiors over them, to distinguish the good from the bad, and to deal with them according to their merits. Vast numbers of them were sold; and upwards of forty thousand set at liberty by Titus, to go whithersoever they pleased.

There was, at the same time, one Jesus, a priest, and the son of Thebuth, who compounded with Titus for his life, upon condition of delivering up to him some of the vessels, donations, and other ornaments belonging to the temple. He came out, and delivered to him, from the wall, two candlesticks, some tables, cups, and goblets, all like those in the temple, of gold. He gave him also several veils, sacerdotal habits, and a great number of sacrificing vessels.

Phineas, the treasurer of the temple, produced many priests habits and girdles, purple and scarlet stuffs, that were folded up for use. There was also a proportion of cinnamon, cassia, gums, and perfumes, for daily incense, besides several sorts of holy ornaments, and private goods. This man, in consideration of those services, obtained from Titus the same pardon that he allowed to such as voluntarily deserted.

C H A P. XVI.

The banks are finished, and the Romans advance with their engines against the upper wall. Some of the faction withdraw, while others stand their ground. Simon and John are terrified by false alarms. They become insatuated, and resign the strongest places they had to the Romans, who carry all before them. Titus imputes his success to an over-ruling Providence, and causes a monument to be erected as a testimony of it. Gives orders concerning the disposal of the prisoners.

THE works being finished on the seventh day of the month Gorpheus, the Romans advanced their engines; and that part of the faction that despaired of holding out, quitted the walls, and withdrew to the castle; and others into subterraneous vaults, while the more resolute maintained their ground, and opposed those who had the direction of the battery. The Romans overcame them by their numbers and strength, tho' chiefly by the alacrity with which they executed their orders, while the Jews were dejected, and become weak. As soon as they observed any flaw in the wall, or that any of the turrets gave way to the engines, the defendants shifted away as fast as they could. Simon and John themselves were seized with a panic, and fled, even before the Romans were come within distance of doing them any hurt. These men, whose insolent and arrogant practices had been so notorious, now trembled with the direst apprehensions, and exhibited every proof of dread and pusillanimity. They made an attempt, indeed, upon the wall of circumvallation that the Romans had raised about the city, attacked and made a breach in it, with a resolution of falling upon the guards, and making their escape; but perceiving, when they expected to be seconded, that their friends had all forsaken them, they hurried away in confusion, as their fears and necessities moved them.

In this fantastical variety of frightful imaginations, one brought news that the whole wall to the westward was overthrown; others that the Romans were just at the foot of it, that some were entered, and some of them seen in possession of the tower. Whatever they feared they saw, falling prostrate upon their faces, and bemoaning their follies, as if they had been thunder-struck, and knew not which way to turn themselves.

The

The interposition of Divine Providence was very remarkable upon this occasion; for the tyrants wholly deprived themselves of the security they had in their own power, by quitting those holds of their own accord, that could never have been taken but by famine, and this after they had spent so much time to no purpose, upon other places of much less importance. By this means the Romans became masters of three impregnable forts by fortune, that could never have been taken any other way; for the three famous towers formerly mentioned were proof against all battery.

Upon their quitting these towers, through the impulse of a judicial infatuation, they halted away to the vale of Siloam, and, after some recollection and refreshment, made an assault upon the new wall there; but it was so faint and weak, that the guards beat them off; for, betwixt fatigue, despondency, dread, and misery, their strength failed them, and they again retired into subterraneous caverns.

The Romans being now masters of the walls, planted their ensigns upon the towers, with acclamations of triumph for the victory they had gained, as having found the end of the war much lighter than the beginning; if, at least, the war was now at an end, which they could not well doubt, without distrustfuling their own eyes.

The soldiers were now broke loose all over the town, with their swords drawn, slaying all that fell in their way without distinction, and burning entire houses, and whatever was in them, in one common flame. In many places, which they entered to search for plunder, they found the carcases of such as had perished by famine; so that, struck with horror at so hideous a spectacle, they came out without touching any thing: but this commiseration for the dead did not render them in the least degree more humane to the living, for they stabbed every one they met, in so much that the channels of the city ran down with blood, as if it had been to quench the fire. In the evening they desisted from slaying, and proceeded to burning.

The eighth day of the month Gorpheus put an end to the conflagration of Jerusalem; and if all the blessings it ever enjoyed from its foundation had been in proportion to the calamities it sustained during this siege, it would certainly have been the envy of the world. The source of all its miseries arose from its producing so iniquitous and abandoned a generation, as brought on its total overthrow, and sheathed their swords in the very bowels of their country.

As Titus was taking a survey of the upper town, the works, the fortifications, and particularly the towers, which the tyrants in their infatuation had abandoned, when he contemplated on their altitude, dimensions, and situation, together with the curious design and execution of the whole fabric, he broke forth into this pious rhapsody: "If an Almighty arm had not been stretched forth to our assistance, we could never have ejected the Jews out of these fortifications, as it was certainly an undertaking not to be accomplished by human power alone." Having made this remark to his friends about him, his next care was to set all the prisoners at liberty whom the tyrants had left in the towers, and afterwards, upon demolishing the city, to preserve those turrets as a monument of his success through Divine aid, without which their reduction would have been impracticable.

The Roman soldiers being quite spent with doing execution, and numbers still remaining alive, Titus gave orders that only such should be put to death as were found to make resistance; appointing Fronto, one of his own council, to determine the fate of every one according to his merits. The robbers and seditious impeached one another, and were all put to death. Those of comely and graceful persons, and in the prime of youth, were reserved to adorn his triumph. As for the rest of the multitude, all those above seventeen years old were sent in bonds to the Egyptian mines. Others were distributed up and down the provinces for the use of the theatres, as gladiators; and those under seventeen were sold for slaves.

While the prisoners were under the charge of Fronto, eleven thousand of them were starved to death, through the churlishness of the keepers on the one hand, who neglected to bring them food, and their own disgust on the other, that restrained them from eating. But their numbers in fact were so great, that there was not provision adequate to their sustenance.

CHAP. XVII.

The number of those that perished in the siege, and of those taken captive. John and Simon taken. The one kept for triumph, the other a prisoner for life. The city laid in ashes, and the walls thrown down.

THE number of those taken captive during this whole war, was computed to amount to ninety-seven thousand; and the number of those that perished during the siege, was estimated at eleven hundred thousand: the greatest part of them were Jews by nation, though not citizens of Jerusalem; for it was at a general assembly in that metropolis, from all quarters, to celebrate the feast of the passover, that they were surprized into a war. The multitude was so prodigious, that, for want of decent accommodation, they first brought the plague into the city, which, through want of competent provision, was followed by a famine. That the city was capacious enough to contain so many people is manifest, if credit may be given to the calculation of Cellius.

Nero held the Jews in such contempt, that Cestius made suit to the high-priest, to devise some method of numbering the people; and this he did from a desire of convincing the emperor that the Jewish nation was not so despicable as he imagined. They took their time to enter upon the computation at the celebration of their paschal feast. When offering up sacrifices, according to custom, from the ninth hour of the day to the eleventh, which sacrifices were afterwards to be eaten in their families, by ten at least, and sometimes twenty, to a lamb, the number of sacrifices was 25,650, which, at the rate of no more than ten to a lamb, amounts to two million, five hundred and sixty-five thousand persons, all pure and sound; for such as labour under epidemical or nauseous distempers, are not admitted to any part of this solemnity; nor any strangers, but such as repair thither from religious motives.

This prodigious concourse of people, which might be said to comprize the Jewish nation, was afterwards, by a kind of fatality, shut up in the city as in a prison; for the Roman army encompassed it when crowded with inhabitants. Accordingly, the number of the slain in the siege was the heaviest judgment that ever was inflicted upon mankind. Some were put to death openly, others kept in custody by the Romans, who searched the very sepulchres and vaults for them, and put all they found alive to the sword. There were upwards of two thousand that had either laid violent hands on themselves, or killed one another by consent, besides those that perished by famine. The putrid exhalation of the dead bodies poisoned as many as came within the reach of it. Some went out of the way to avoid it; others had their hearts so set upon booty, that they rifled the very carcases, and trampled upon the dead bodies in a putrified state. They brought out several prisoners the two tyrants had laid in chains there; for they persevered in their cruelty to the last: but Divine vengeance overtook them in the end; for John and his brethren, in the caverns, were driven, by insupportable hunger, to beg that mercy they had so often despised; and Simon, after a long struggle with an insuperable necessity, delivered up himself. The latter was reserved for triumph, and John made a prisoner for life. The Romans now set fire to the extreme parts of the city, and threw down the walls.

Jerusalem taken and destroyed. Brief account of its history.

Jerusalem
taken and laid waste.

THUS was Jerusalem taken, and utterly destroyed, in the second year of the reign of Vespasian, on the eighth day of the month Gorpheus. It had been taken five times before; that is to say, by Azochæus, king of Egypt; Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria; Pompey, Herod, and Sosius, who still preserved it. But Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, laid it waste, one thousand, four hundred, sixty-eight years, and six months after it was first built.

Melchisedeck the founder.

The first founder was a man of power amongst the Canaanites, called Melchisedeck, which, in the Hebrew language, signifies a righteous king; for such he was in an eminent degree. He first dedicated the city to the Almighty; erected a temple in it, and officiated in quality of a priest, giving it the name of Jerusalem, which before was called Solyma.

When David, the king of the Jews, came afterwards to drive out the Canaanites, he planted his own people there; and, in four hundred seventy-seven years, and three months, after this, it was laid waste by the Babylonians. From the reign of David to the destruction of the city under Titus, were one thousand, one hundred, and seventy-nine years: and two thousand, one hundred, and seventy-seven, from the foundation of it. Yet neither its antiquity, nor its vast riches, nor the diffusion of its glory over all the habitable earth, nor the great veneration paid it on a religious account, have been sufficient to preserve it from destruction. This was, in fine, the issue of the siege.

When the soldiers had neither rapine nor bloodshed to gratify their spleen, Titus gave orders for laying the city and temple level with the ground; and leaving nothing standing but the three famous towers, Phasaelus, Hippicos, and Mariamne, and so much of the wall as enclosed the city on the left side, where he designed to keep a garrison. The towers were to remain as so many monuments to posterity of the power and conduct of the Romans in taking them. This order was punctually executed; but all the rest was laid so level, that the place seemed as if it never had been inhabited. This was the miserable end to which Jerusalem was reduced, from the inordinate propensity of the inhabitants to innovations.

C H A P. XIX.

Titus distributes honours and rewards amongst his soldiers, accompanied with an elegant and generous address. Offers a thanksgiving sacrifice for his victory.

TITUS having formed a resolution to leave the tenth legion in garrison in Jerusalem, with some squadrons and battalions of horse and foot, and having discharged every duty incumbent on a vigilant and careful general, was desirous of bestowing proper rewards upon those who had signalized themselves in the service of their country. To this end, he mounted a tribunal, with his principal officers about him, and, from an eminence, where he might best be heard, delivered himself to the army in terms to the following effect:

Address of Titus to his soldiers.

“It is impossible, my brave fellow soldiers, to express the sense I entertain of the respect and obedience you have shewn me during the whole course of this war. Your invincible firmness, upon all occasions, and in the most imminent danger; the reputation you have acquired in advancing the honour, and enlarging the territory, of your country; and, finally, the proof you have given, that neither superiority of numbers, advantages of forts, strength of places, nor the outrageous fury

“of brutal adversaries, can ever discompose the Roman conduct and courage, claim every mark of gratitude and respect. It was but reasonable for you to put an end to a war that had lasted so long, which was your chief desire when you entered upon it. It must afford you singular pleasure and satisfaction, to see your choice of the Roman emperor and generals not only admitted, but universally approved. I cannot but esteem and admire you all for what you have done; but those who have rendered themselves exemplary in their enterprizes, and thereby done honour to their characters and professions, may depend on my care to make an equivalent return. Every emulation to excel shall have a proportionate acknowledgment, as I take more delight in rewarding the meritorious, than in punishing the delinquent.”

Titus hereupon ordered the proper officers to produce the list of those who had signalized themselves by their gallant exploits in the course of the war. They were specified by name, and highly applauded, both by the general, and all the respectable persons present on the occasion. From words he proceeded to substantial instances of liberality and bounty. They were crowned with coronets of gold; had golden ornaments put about their necks; lances, pointed with gold, put into their hands; presented with silver medals; and advanced every man according to his station. He gave them money, in gold and silver, out of the booty, with rich robes, and other things of value.

Having made this distribution according to the merit of each individual, Titus, accompanied by the vows, prayers, and acclamations of the whole army, descended from his tribunal, to offer sacrifices, and give thanks for his victory. A great number of oxen were sacrificed, and distributed among the army. Titus having regaled his officers for three days, the troops were dismissed to their respective quarters, and Jerusalem committed to the guard of the tenth legion, without sending it back to Euphrates, whence it came.

Bearing in memory that the twelfth legion had given way to the Jews under Cestius, their commander, he expelled them out of all Syria, (for they had laid formerly at Raphanea,) and sent them away to a place called Maletine, that lies along the Euphrates, upon the borders of Cappadocia and Armenia, keeping two legions to himself, as a competent guard to convoy him into Egypt. From hence he took his passage to Cesarea upon the coast; but it being winter, he durst not venture into Italy; so that he deposited his treasure for the present, and took every precaution for the security of the prisoners.

C H A P. XX.

While Titus lay before Jerusalem, Vespasian visits several sea-ports. Simon taken prisoner by Terentius Rufus, and put in chains. Promotes farther discoveries. The births of Domitian and Vespasian celebrated with great pomp.

DURING the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, Vespasian embarked on board a trading vessel for Rhodes, where he took a galley, and so passed out of Ionia into Greece, visiting all the towns in his way, where he was most magnificently received. He then proceeded to Corcyra, and so to Japygia, whence he took his journey by land.

Titus was now come back from Cesarea upon the sea-coast, to that called Cesarea Philippi, where he made a considerable stay, entertaining himself with a diversity of spectacles, as combats betwixt men and beasts, man and man, troop and troop, which cost him the lives of many of his captives.

At this juncture Simon, the son of Gioras, happened to be taken in the following manner. Simon, upon the siege of Jerusalem, was forced into the upper town, and the Romans breaking into the city, he was much puzzled to devise means of effecting his his escape, till at length he hit upon this contrivance. He got together a number of miners, stone-cutters, smiths, and men well skilled in iron-works, and having laid in a stock of provisions for several weeks, they let themselves all down into a subterraneous cavern. When they had made their way as far as they could, and found the passage too narrow to proceed, they betook themselves to digging and mining, hoping to work a thoroughfare, and so to make their escape. But, before they could make any considerable advance, their provision fell short, and the plan of course failed, though they managed their stores with the utmost œconomy.

Simon had now recourse to another device, which was to alarm and terrify the Romans. To this end he put on a white garment, over which he threw a purple cloak, and in this garb presented himself out of the ground from under the ruins of the late temple, to the amazement of the soldiers and others, that first saw the supposed apparition. But, on his approach, they took courage, asked him his name, and who he was, and, upon his refusing to satisfy them, and calling to speak with the officer of the guard, Terentius Rufus, who had the command, was immediately sent for, and learning the truth from Simon, caused him to be put in chains, and transmitted an account of the whole affair to Cæsar.

Thus was this inhuman tyrant, who had taken away so many of his countrymen's lives by subornation and false evidence, upon pretence of their going over to the Romans, brought to justice himself, and delivered into the hands of his enemies, without any force upon him, by his own act. But the stroke of Divine vengeance cannot be avoided; nor is the power of innocence and justice to be contended with; while the punishment is frequently aggravated by being deferred, and when notorious offenders hug themselves in security. This was the case of Simon in the hands of the Romans; and his fantastical scheme of rising out of the ground, proved an occasion of discovering divers of his companions in their lurking-places.

Simon being presented to Titus in chains, on his return to Cæsarea by the sea-side, was ordered to be kept for his triumph at Rome. While Titus was at Cæsarea, he set a day apart for the celebration of the nativity of his brother Domitian, and a great number of his condemned prisoners were dedicated to the honour of the solemnity. The number of those that were destroyed by beasts, fire, and in combat one with another, were supposed to amount at least to two thousand five hundred; and all this too little in the opinion of the Romans, who bore them a mortal aversion. Titus went afterwards to Berytus, a city of Phœnicia, and a Roman colony, where he continued for some time, and celebrated his father's birth-day with more splendour and magnificence than the former, both for spectacles, and other sumptuous entertainments.

CHAP. XXI.

The Jews dispersed throughout the habitable earth, especially in Syria and Antioch. Antiochus, the son of a Jew, occasions many disasters, by setting up the Pagan worship, and suppressing the observation of the sabbath. The city takes fire, and Antiochus imputes it falsely to the Jews.

THE Jews in Antioch were now accused for divers misdemeanors against them, of a public rather than a private nature. But it is necessary to enlarge upon this subject, for the better understanding the sequel of this history.

The Jews are a people dispersed over the face of the whole earth, particularly amongst the Syrians, as they are their near neighbours, and more especially in Antioch, where there are great numbers of them, not only on account of its being a large and populous city, but also by reason of the privileges and immunities they have enjoyed through the favour of government ever since the days of Antiochus Epi-phanes, who laid waste the city of Jerusalem, and rifled the temple. The successors of Antiochus caused restitution to be made to the Jews of all the brazen vessels that had been taken away, in order to be dedicated to the service of their synagogue at Antioch, allowing them the same freedom of the city with the Greeks; and they were likewise treated by the succeeding kings after the same manner, their numbers increasing, and their temple rich and flourishing, insomuch, that several Pagan profelytes came over to them, and incorporated with their nation.

They are numerous and wealthy

But, upon the breaking up of the war, and Vespasian's passing by sea into Syria, the Jews rendered themselves extremely odious from one particular instance. There was one Antiochus, son of one of the most eminent Jews in Antioch, both for rank and power. This Antiochus coming into the theatre upon a public assembly, openly charged his father, and certain other foreign Jews by name, with a design to fire the city in the night. This enraged the multitude to such a degree, that they called immediately for fire, and burnt the pretended conspirators in the midst of the theatre. The rabble were for doing the same execution on all the rest, and securing their country before it was too late. Antiochus aggravated their rage as much as possible; and, as an argument of the affection he had for the Pagan worship, and his aversion to that of the Jews, he not only sacrificed after the Pagan manner himself, but forced others to do so, upon pain of death in case of refusal. Some of the inhabitants of Antioch complied with this injunction; but most of the Jews stood out, and were put to death.

Disasters occasioned by Antiochus, the son of a Jew.

He sets up the Pagan worship.

Antiochus being by this time in a better condition to wreak his vengeance upon the Jews, having a command given him by the governor, exercised more rigour towards the citizens, not permitting them to rest on the seventh day, forcing them to work indifferently upon that day as upon others; and carried matters to such extremity, that the observation of the sabbath was not only abolished at Antioch, but in danger of being abrogated every where else.

Suppresses the observation of the sabbath.

The persecution of the Jews at Antioch was followed by another calamity. The square market, with several offices where the public records were deposited, and other stately buildings, happening to take fire, the flame was so fierce, that the whole city was in danger of being burnt to the ground. Antiochus imputed the cause of it to the Jews, and the natives were apt enough to believe it, for the very sake of the late story, even if they had not been prepossessed against them beforehand. Taking the matter, however, for granted, they fell upon the persons accused with so outrageous a fury, that Callegas, the deputy-governor to Cerenius Petus, had the utmost difficulty to keep the people quiet, till the emperor might be duly informed of the affair. Cerenius had his commission as the governor, but was not as yet come to his command. Callegas, upon a strict examination of the matter, evidently discovered that not one of the Jews accused by Antiochus had any hand in it. It appeared, on the contrary, to be the scheme of a few abandoned profligates of desperate fortunes, whose only means of securing themselves from being apprehended by their creditors, was to destroy their evidence. But the Jews were yet under great terror from uncertain expectations of the issue of these false accusations.

CHAP. XXII.

Titus expresses the greatest joy upon his father's arrival in Italy. Vespasian is received at Rome with universal acclamations.

TITUS, on receiving the news of his father's happy arrival in Italy, and of the honourable reception he had met with in the course of his progress, and particularly the singular respect shewn him on his entering the city of Rome, could not but but give every demonstration of pleasure and satisfaction. Vespasian was held in the same veneration at all distances; as if he had been present; and the pleasing expectation the people had of seeing him, in some degree compensated for his absence. The senate, who bore in memory the miserable revolutions they had seen, upon transferring the sovereign rule from one prince to another, esteemed themselves happy in the blessing of an emperor that brought reputation, conduct, and experience with him into the administration. The common people were no less pleased with the change, especially as they were at that time embroiled in civil wars, and entertained a hope of being restored, by his means, to their ancient freedom and plenty. The military part had a peculiar affection for him; for the proofs he had given them, upon divers occasions, of his martial skill and genuine prowess, besides the sense they retained of the shame and scandal they had suffered under other commanders, made them conclude that no man was so fit to let them right as Vespasian.

All people charmed with his affability and address.

This prince, in fine, was so universally beloved, that those who enjoyed any posts of dignity under the government, had not patience to wait his coming at a distance, and therefore went out to meet him a considerable way from the city, with such a train of the populace after them, that more came out than stayed behind. As he advanced near the town, word was brought him how he gained upon the affection of the people by his affability and address; the ways being thronged with women and children, from a longing curiosity to see him, breaking into rapture of admiration at the elegance of his person, and the politeness of his manners; calling him their benefactor, deliverer, and protector, and extolling him as the only prince under the sun that deserved an imperial crown. The whole city was so set out with garlands and perfumes, that it resembled a temple; and the streets so crowded, that there was hardly any passing to the palace. Vespasian at the same time, offered up to his household gods sacrifices of thanksgiving for his safe return, while the multitude gave themselves up to feasting, with their tribes, families and neighbours, wishing a long and happy reign to Vespasian, and a continuance of the imperial sovereignty to his son, and those of the line that should come after him. This was the manner in which the citizens of Rome received Vespasian, and the empire immediately experienced the happiness of his auspicious reign.

The Germans revolt, with the cause of it. Cassius and Civilis the authors of a rebellion. Petilius Cerealis puts some stop to it, and Domitian totally suppresses it. An irruption of the Scythians into the Roman territories. Rubrius Gallus puts them all to the rout.

The Germans rebel.

BEFORE the arrival of Vespasian at Alexandria, and during the time that Titus was before Jerusalem, there happened a revolt among the Germans, to which they were animated and encouraged by their neighbours the Gauls, in hopes of shaking off the Roman yoke. The Germans being naturally ferocious and inconsiderate, readily engaged in any rash undertaking; besides, they were incited to it by a mortal aversion to the Romans, as the only power they feared: to which may be added, a favourable conjuncture of the times, with respect to the present factions and divisions of the empire upon so many changes of government.

Cassius and Civilis the authors of a rebellion.

Cassius and Civilis, two men of rank among the Germans, took advantage of these distractions to promote a sedition, to which they had been disposed long before. Upon sounding the multitude, they found them eager for the attempt; and in all probability they would in general have embarked in it, had they not been prevented by a fortuitous circumstance for the Romans. Petilius Cerealis, formerly governor of Germany, received letters from Vespasian, appointing him consul, and commanding him to repair immediately to Italy, and take upon him the command. Having intelligence, on his way, of this insurrection, he marched against them as they were in a body, charged and put them to the rout with very great slaughter, and brought the rest back again to their duty. Had not Cerealis fallen thus suddenly upon them, it had not been long before they would have been brought to condign punishment. For the news of this rebellion had no sooner reached Rome, than Domitian, the son of Vespasian, who inherited the heroic spirit of his valiant father, put himself at the head of an army against these barbarians, who, upon the very rumour of his approach, surrendered themselves, deeming it a happiness to return to their former allegiance, without suffering any farther punishment. When Domitian had appeased the commotion in Gaul, so as to obviate any suspicion of a relapse, he returned to Rome, amidst the acclamations of the people, as having performed exploits that were above his own age, and worthy the son of so great a father.

The rebellion of the Germans was followed by a furious incursion of the Scythians, or Samarians, who, transporting themselves over the Danube, with a vast body of men, into Mysia, without being perceived, surprized several Roman garrisons, and, with relentless cruelty, put them all to the sword. They also slew Fonteus Agrippa, a man of consular authority, at the head of his troops, and proceeded to lay waste the whole province. When Vespasian received intelligence of the havoc they made in Mysia, he sent Rubrius Gallus to call them to account. This officer did great execution upon them; so that the insurrection was quickly at an end; and the general took care to secure the passages leading to the province from any such incursions in future.

C H A P. XXIV.

Titus marches in triumph with his prisoners. The sabbatical river, and whence it derived that appellation. The people of Antioch rejoice at the arrival of Titus. Present a petition against the Jews, which is rejected. Titus goes for Egypt, and is much affected at the desolate condition of Jerusalem. Vast treasures buried in its ruins. Simon and John, with seven hundred chosen men, are reserved to grace the triumph. The order and magnificence of it. The solemnity concluded in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus. Death of Simon Gioras. Vespasian dedicates a temple to peace.

TITUS, on his return from Berytus, exhibited magnificent spectacles in all the cities through which he passed, carrying his captives with him for the honour of his arms, and the ornament of his triumph. The prince observed on his way, betwixt Arcea and Raphanea, two cities in the kingdom of Agrippa, a certain river of so peculiar a nature as deserves to be recorded in history. While this river flows, it has a full stream of a strong current; after which its springs fail for six days together, and leaves the channel dry to the very bottom. On the seventh day it fills again, as though it had undergone no change, and keeps exactly the same course as before. Hence it is called the sabbatical river, alluding to the seventh day's festival among the Jews.

When the people of Antioch were informed that Titus was approaching, they were so rejoiced at the tidings, that the populace posted away thirty furlongs out of the town, to meet and welcome him on his way. As he drew near, they made a lane to receive him, and with all possible demonstration of affection and respect, conducted him to the city, intermixing with their acclamations earnest importunities to banish all the Jews out of the city. Titus did not yield to their intreaty, but gave them the bare hearing quietly. The Jews, however, were in fearful apprehensions of the result.

Titus made no stay at Antioch, but continued his progress towards Teugma, which lies upon the Euphrates, Euphrates, where he was attended with an embassy from Vologesus, king of Parthia, and the compliment of a golden crown in congratulation of his victory over the Jews. Titus accepted of the present, treated with the ambassadors, and went back again to Antioch, whither he no sooner arrived, than the magistracy invited him, with great earnestness, to the theatre, with which he graciously complied, and there found a mighty concourse of the citizens waiting his entrance. They immediately renewed their intreaties to him for the expulsion of the Jews; to which Titus, with his usual presence of mind, made this reply, "That their own country was destroyed, and no other would receive them." When they failed in this instance, they preferred another request, which was, that the pillars of brass, with the inscriptions upon them, of the Jewish privileges, might either be removed or defaced. Titus would not interest himself in either; but left the Jews at Antioch in the same state as he found them, and so went on his way for Egypt.

As he was on his journey, and saw the miserable desolated condition of Jerusalem, and the country about it, he could not but form a comparison betwixt the former and present state; the one resembling a paradise, the other a desert. This induced him most compassionately to deplore the destruction of so famous a city, and execrate the authors of the sedition that were the cause of it. So far was he from pretending to raise his reputation upon a public calamity, that he detested the instruments that forced him upon this extremity. There was vast treasure buried in the ruins of the city, as gold, silver, and other precious commodities, to an inestimable value, which the proprietors had concealed there through fear of the enemy. Some the Romans found out; but the greatest discovery was made by the prisoners. Titus pursued his intended journey to Egypt, passed over the desert with expedition into Alexandria, and formed a resolution of embarking thence for Italy, having sent back the two legions that accompanied him to their old quarters; the fifth to Mysia, and the tenth into Pannonia. But Simon and John, with seven hundred prisoners, selected from the rest for the comeliness of their persons, were transported to Italy, in order to grace the triumph.

After a prosperous voyage, Titus arrived at Rome, where he was received with the same honour and respect as his father. Vespasian went up with the rest to meet his son; a circumstance which the people looked upon as an earnest of greater blessings, since the father and his two sons were brought together by so auspicious a Providence.

Some few days after this, the senate having resolved upon two several triumphs, one for the father, the other for the son, in honour of their illustrious achievements, Vespasian and Titus, notwithstanding this decree, declared themselves for contracting both triumphs into one. Previous notice having been given of the day appointed for this pompous solemnity, not one of the immense multitude was left in the city, but every one went out to secure a station, inasmuch that, when they were all placed, there was hardly a passage for the procession. The soldiers, with their officers at the head, marched in good order before day, up to the gates near the temple of Isis, where the princes rested the foregoing night, in order to wait their coming up. At break of day, Vespasian and Titus advanced, with crowns of laurel upon their heads, and purple robes, after the manner of their country, as far as the Octavian Walks, where the senate, nobility, and Roman knights, waited for them. A tribunal was erected before the portal, and ivory seats upon it, which they mounted, and sitting down, were saluted with the acclamations of the whole field. As they were going on with their eulogies on the princes, Vespasian made a signal for silence; and when all was hush and quiet, he stood up, and covering part of his head with his garment, offered up certain vows and prayers according to custom; and, after him, Titus did the like. Vespasian then, in a short speech, addressed the spectators in general, and sent away the soldiers to an entertainment prepared for them at the charge of the emperor. He then went to the triumphal gate, so called from the procession in triumph passing that way, where, taking a repast, and putting on their triumphal habits, they offered sacrifices, and so led on the triumph, and marched through the theatres for the better view of the people, and the greater glory of the solemnity.

The magnificence and variety of these spectacles cannot be conceived, much less expressed; whether they are considered in point of exquisite workmanship, immense value, or attracting novelty; for they comprehended an assemblage of curiosities many years selecting, and now combined to compleat the triumph of the auspicious day, to the honour of the transcendent dignity of the Roman empire. There was a vast quantity of gold, silver, and ivory, wrought into a multiplicity of forms, and so disposed as to exhibit a view pleasingly variegated. Some parts were composed of the rarest purple hangings; others accurately represented, to the life, figures embroidered by the art of the Babylonians. There were also jewels and precious stones; some enchased into golden crowns, and some set with other fancies, to add to the variety and splendour of the spectacle. They had the images of their gods, with figures of divers animals, exquisitely finished, and superbly attired. These were borne by a vast number of people, arrayed in purple garments, interwoven with gold; and all those that were set apart for the service of the solemnity, had their distinguishing ornaments of state and splendour. The very captives were not without something graceful in their habits, to disguise the misery of their condition, and the marks of slavery they wore in their faces.

But nothing was more worthy of admiration than the structure of the pageants, which were of such magnitude, that it was almost incredible that the bearers could support them. The cost was equal to the execution; for the furniture was wrought with gold, silver, and ivory. There were also the most lively representations of war, with all the circumstances that attend it. In one place was the delineation of a fruitful country laid waste; in another whole armies cut to pieces; some flying, others pursuing, or taken prisoners; strong walls battered to the ground; forts demolished; breaches made in fortified cities; towns taken by assault; streets flowing with blood, and the vanquished imploring mercy; temples in flames; houses falling upon the heads of their tenants; and rivers, with their streams, warped from refreshing the fields, and taking their course through a general conflagration. This, in a word, portrayed a lively image of the miseries of the Jews; and was so admirably constructed by fancy and art, that it might furnish a picturesque description of the ruin of our once famous city, for the information of those who were not eye-witnesses to it.

Upon each of the pageants were represented the governors of the place that was taken, and the manner of taking it. Next in order came the shipping; and then the spoils, that were dispersed up and down in several places. The most considerable pieces were the golden tables, and the golden candlestick, that were taken out of the temple of Jerusalem; the former weighing several talents, and the other not applied to the use for which it was intended. There was a kind of pillar that came out of the foot of it, and out of that pillar, as from the stem of a tree, seven branches, every branch having at the top the resemblance of a lamp; the number of seven intimating the veneration the Jews have for their seventh day. After this came the Jewish law, which was the last trophy of their conquests that the Romans exposed. Vespasian himself, with Titus, brought up the rear, attended by Domitian on horseback, mounted according to the dignity of his station. They marched together into the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and there finished the triumph.

They

The triumph ends at the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus.

They remained some little time in this place, it being according to ancient custom so to do upon the like occasion, till news was brought them that the general of the enemy was slain. This general was Simon Gioras, one of the captives that was led in triumph through the market-place, with a rope about his neck, and put to death by those that drew him, according to the Roman law and practice in the case of such malefactors. Word being brought that Gioras was dead, the whole field rang with shouts and acclamations, and the people betook themselves to their vows and sacrifices; and when the solemnity was over, the princes returned to the palace, where they gave an elegant entertainment; and nothing prevailed throughout the city but mirth, festivity, and giving thanks for the final victory they had obtained over their enemies, to the glory of their generals, and the moral assurance of public tranquillity.

dedicates a temple to peace.

When these triumphs were over, and the empire settled on the surest foundation, Vespasian erected a temple dedicated to peace. It was finished in so short a time, and so glorious a manner, as exceeded all human expectation. He spared no cost, over and above a collection of the choicest curiosities in painting and sculpture, to adorn it; insomuch, that people flocked from all quarters to see the glory and order of this admirable structure. In this temple he deposited the golden table and the candlestick, as the most valuable trophies of his victory; giving orders that the Jewish laws, and purple veils of the sanctuary, should be lodged with great care and reverence in the place.

WHEN Lucilius Bassus was sent, by Cæsar, as legate into Judæa, he took upon him the command of the army from Cerealis Petilianus, and made himself master of the castle of Herodion, with the garrison that was in it. After this he drew his troops together, that lay scattered up and down, proposing, with the help of the tenth legion, to reduce Machærus; a design of the utmost importance, as the strength of that place would ever be an inducement to a rebellion; and as the situation of it gave confidence to the town, so it struck an awe, on the other hand, upon any that should attempt it.

Situation of Machærus.

The mountain, upon which Machærus stands, is prodigiously high and rocky, to the degree of rendering it almost impregnable. Nature has made it well nigh inaccessible too, by enclosing it with vallies that are neither to be passed, nor to be filled up; and so deep likewise, that the eye cannot reach their bottoms. It reaches to the westward sixty furlongs in length, and borders on the lake Asphaltitis; and the castle hath an unbounded prospect over all that quarter. On the north and south it is encompassed with vallies of the same dimensions, and as secure from any attempt as on the other parts. The depth on the east, is, in length, an hundred cubits, and reaches to the mountains over against Machærus.

Machærus.

Alexander, king of the Jews, was the first that fortified this place, and built a castle upon it, which Gabinius afterwards demolished in his war with Aristobulus. Then Herod the Great, deeming it an object worthy of his regard, as a place of defence against the Arabians, ran a substantial wall about it, with strong turrets at the corners, of sixty cubits in height; and in the middle built a magnificent palace, which was abundantly supplied with water from cisterns, wherever there was occasion for it, as if nature and art had been at strife which should exceed the other, the one by situation, the other by improvement. He likewise furnished this castle with so plentiful a magazine of arms, arrows, engines, and provisions of every kind, both for war and sustenance, that the garrison never need to fear either force or famine.

Within this palace there grew a sort of rue, that excited admiration on account of its size, being as tall and well spread as any fig-tree. According to report, it has been there ever since the days of Herod, and might have continued longer, if the Jews had not rooted it up upon taking the place. In the valley on the north side of Machærus, called Baaras, there grows a plant of the same name. Its colour resembles that of a flame, and towards the evening it sends forth a ray like lightning. It is not easily taken, as it recedes from the touch; nay, it is certain death to touch it, without a piece of the root in the hand. It is also taken without danger in the following manner. They dig a trench quite round it, till the hidden part of the root becomes very small, and then tie a dog to it, and when the dog struggles hard to follow him that tied him, the root is plucked up; but the animal expires immediately, as if it were to redeem the man. After this it may be touched with as much safety as any other plant; but it possesses one quality that compensates for the trouble in obtaining it, being, on the touch, a certain remedy for the expulsion of demons.

In the same place there is a wonderful diversity of springs and fountains, of very different qualities and tastes; some being hot, others sweet, and others bitter. There are also cold springs, intermingled one with another, in the lower ground. But that which is more surprizing, is a shallow cave, with a rocky stone over it, and the figure of two breasts, like two fountains, prominent from it; the one discharging hot water, and the other cold; and they compose a most agreeable bath, which is salutary in many maladies, and especially those of the nerves. There are also mines of sulphur and allum.

When Bassus had taken a full view of this place, he resolved to besiege it, proposing to fill up the valley to the east of the town, and make his approaches that way. He first, with great pains and expedition, raised a bank against the castle, as the most probable means of facilitating the attempt. The Jews resident divided themselves from those who were strangers, and turned them off as an insignificant herd to sustain the first shock; while they seized on the upper citadel, and held it, not only as the most defensible of the two, but as a place where they might make better terms with the Romans in case of the worst. They determined, however, to use every effort to divert the siege; and there passed not a day without resolute sallies and skirmishes, and a considerable loss of men on both sides; one party sometimes having the advantage, and sometimes the other. The Jews, when they fell upon the Romans by surprize, and the Romans, when they were aware of the Jews coming, provided to receive them. But the conclusion of the siege did not depend on these skirmishes, for an incident happened that reduced the Jews to an absolute necessity of giving up the castle.

There was amongst the besieged, one Eleazar, a young man, of a bold and enterprising spirit, who made several vigorous sallies, and did all that was possible, both by counsel and example, to obstruct the progress of the Romans, and put a check to their undertakings, insomuch that he became at once a terror to his enemies, and a support to his friends. He was the first that presented himself in all encounters, and the last in case of a retreat that came off. It happened, on a certain time, when a skirmish was over, and both parties were withdrawn, that Eleazar, in a vain-glorious contempt of the enemy, made a stop without the gate, and began to talk to some of the defendants upon the walls. This being within view of the Roman camp, one Rufus, an Egyptian, availing himself of the opportunity, seized him unawares, and carried him off, armed as he was, into the enemy's quarter. The Roman general ordered him to be stripped and scourged upon the ground in the sight of the city. The Jews were so confounded at the calamitous accident that befel this gallant gallant youth, that he became a subject of universal condolence; which Bassus perceiving, he naturally concluded, that, if he could but excite their compassion, he might gain his point, and bring them to a composition of giving up the place to save Eleazar's life. This fancy succeeded to his wish; for, upon the setting up of a cross, as if Eleazar was to be forthwith crucified, the garrison broke out into an outcry with one voice, "that their affliction was intolerable." Eleazar, upon this, begged of them to consider both his case, who was now to die a wretched death, and their own, nor contend longer with the valour and fortune of the Romans, since the world had already submitted itself to their empire.

This submission and supplication of Eleazar, together with the powerful intercessions of his friends, who were men of rank and influence, softened the defendants into such a tenderness, that they sent deputies immediately to the Romans, with proposals to deliver up the castle, upon condition of discharging Eleazar, and leaving the garrison at liberty to go whither they would. Bassus accepted the terms; while the multitude of strangers that were in the lower town, hearing of the agreement that was made by the Jews for themselves alone, were resolved to fly away privately in the night. Upon opening the gates, Bassus had notice of it from those who had come to terms with him; but the most courageous prevented the enemy from entering the town, and got off; while the rest, to the number of 1700 men, were put to the sword, and the women and children made slaves. But as Bassus deemed it expedient to fulfil his articles, he dismissed the garrison, and set Eleazar at liberty.

C H A P. XXVI.

The forest of Jarden is beset by the Romans. The fortitude of the Jews when besieged. Great slaughter amongst them. A poll-tax imposed by the emperor.

WHEN Bassus had settled these affairs, he marched hastily with his army to the forest of Jarden, upon intelligence that great numbers of Jews, who had escaped from Jerusalem and Machabrus, were there assembled. Finding, upon his arrival, that the information was authentic, he first surrounded the whole place with his horse, where he ordered so strict a guard to be kept, that not a Jew could possibly pass them. He employed his foot, at the same time, to cut down the trees and bushes of the thickets where the Jews had taken sanctuary; so that they had no way of escaping but by rushing thro' the troops of the enemy. This being the last experiment, they drew all into a body, and, with an impetuous clamour, made one desperate push upon those who surrounded them, and were as bravely received. The contest, in fine, through the dauntless temerity on the one side, and firm resolution on the other, was hot and obstinate; but victory, in the end, declared for the Romans, with the loss only of twelve killed, and not many wounded; whereas of the three thousand Jews that were in this action, not so much as one man came off. Among the rest was Judas, the son of Jair, their leader, who had formerly a command at the siege of Jerusalem, and made his escape at last out of a vault.

The emperor, at the same time, wrote to his officer Liberius Maximus, to make sale of all the Jews lands, as he would not trouble himself with rebuilding any other cities, but take them all to his own use, leaving only eight hundred soldiers in Emmaus, about sixty furlongs distant from Jerusalem; and imposing a poll-tax upon every Jew of two drachmæ, or half a shekel a year, to be paid into the capitol, as had been formerly done into the temple. Such was the miserable state of the Jews at that time.

C H A P. XXVII.

The calamities that beset Antiochus, king of Comagena. He is represented as an enemy to Cæsar, by Celsennius, who makes an incursion into his dominions. Antiochus resolves to withdraw, and not return any act of hostility. Epiphanes and Callinicus, his two sons, give battle to the Romans. Antiochus flies into Cilicia. The brothers escape to the king of Parthia, who receives them generously. Vespasian kindly treats Antiochus, his captive. The father and sons are conducted to Rome, and highly entertained. The Scythians break into Media, and carry off immense booty. Narrow escape of Tiridates, king of Armenia.

IN the fourth year of the reign of Vespasian, it happened that Antiochus, king of Comagena, with his whole family, fell into very great calamities; and this was the occasion. Celsennius Petus, who was governor of Syria at this time, wrote Cæsar word that Antiochus, with his son Epiphanes, were resolved to revolt from the Romans, and had treated with the king of Parthia about it, pointing out, at the same time, the necessity of preventing the mischief, by striking the first blow. Whatever might be the motive on the part of Celsennius, Cæsar could not, in prudence, neglect the advice; as the vicinity of the kingdoms rendered the consideration of importance; and as Samosata, the capital of Comagena, bordering upon Euphrates, might afford the Parthians an easy passage, or a secure retreat.

Vespasian, however, was so possessed with the credit of the story, that he left Celsennius at his own discretion, and a commission to act as might seem to himself most expedient. The Roman governor availed himself of his deputation, and fell immediately into Comagena with the sixth legion, and some squadrons of horse and foot. He also called in to his assistance Aristobulus, king of Chalcis, and Sohemus, king of Emesa; Antiochus not in the least suspecting his design. His entrance met with no opposition; for the natives were not in a condition to encounter him; nor had Antiochus, when he heard of the incursion, the least thought of a misunderstanding with the Romans. In this embarrassment he determined to leave his kingdom in its present state, and retire, with his wife and children, to Rome, in order to demonstrate his good faith to the empire. Hereupon he withdrew about an hundred and thirty furlongs from the city, and encamped upon a plain. Celsennius, in the mean time, sent soldiers to take possession of Samosata, and keep garrison there; while he himself, with other troops, marched away after Antiochus. But all this violence and injustice did not provoke the king to any unfriendly act against the Romans. He only bemoaned his hard fate, and endured, with patience, what he was not able to prevent.

But his sons, Epiphanes and Callinicus, who were youthful, brave, and martial, could not, in honour, but betake themselves to arms; so that drawing out what forces they were able to raise, they gave the Romans battle, maintained it the whole day, and, in the end, evinced a conduct equal to their valour; for they came off with very little loss.

The fortune of this day, though favourable to Antiochus, did not stop the retreat upon which he had resolved; for he took his wife and daughters away with him into Cilicia, and by that means greatly discouraged his soldiers, who having nothing to hope when their king despaired, deserted, and went over to the Romans. It therefore became necessary for his sons to provide for their own security before it was too late; so that, with ten horsemen, they passed the Euphrates (where they were now safe) in their way to Volageses, king of Parthia. This generous prince, upon their arrival, did not treat them as fugitives, but with a respect that became their birth and quality.

Antiochus is generously treated by Vespasian.

Antiochus having reached Tarsus, in Cilicia, Cæcennius sent an officer to take him into custody, and carry him bound to Rome. But Vespasian was too generous to treat a crowned head with indignity; and chose rather to shew respect to an ancient friendship, than to revenge himself for a supposed injury. He therefore ordered his chains to be taken off upon the way, and his journey to Rome respited, that he might make some stay at Lacedæmon, where he furnished him with a provision of money suitable to the dignity of his character.

This frank and honourable proceeding towards Antiochus, not only delivered the brothers from the anxiety they were under for their father, but encouraged them to hope for a reconciliation with Cæsar himself, especially at the intercession of Vologeses, that they might be permitted to go to Rome, being ever desirous of living within the pale of the empire. They came on, in fine, to Rome, whither their father was soon after conducted; and they were all three treated with every token of affection and esteem.

The Scythians and confederates break into Media.

The people now known by the name of Alanes, formerly called Scythians, inhabiting the country near the river Tanais, and the lake Mæotis, joined in confederacy with the king of Hyrcania, to break into Media, and commit depredations; for he was master of that passage which Alexander shut up with iron gates. This pass being now laid open, they possessed themselves of the place, without either suspicion or resistance, and carried off a booty, in goods and cattle, to a considerable value. This inroad so alarmed Pacorus, then king of the place, that he left his possessions at mercy, and fled, for his own safety, into obscure recesses, till he found means at length, with some difficulty, to redeem his wife and concubines for an hundred talents. Tiridates, who afterwards became king of that country, met and fought them, but was nearly taken alive in the battle, by the noose of an halter that was thrown over his head; but, in the very moment as they were drawing him off, he cut the rope with his sword, and made his escape. The success of this combat rendered those barbarians more bloody and insolent than before, inasmuch that they ravaged the country, and carried off with them an immense booty.

C H A P. XXVIII.

Massada, a receptacle for those robbers called Sicarii, under the government of Eleazar. The abominable practices that now prevailed. Silva, the Roman general, besieges Massada. Its situation, state and condition, both from art and nature. Silva advances his batteries, and gains the rock Leuce; but, after a failure, sets all in a flame. Discourse of Eleazar on the contempt of death, and immortality of the soul. Reflections on the opinions of the Indian philosophers and Brachmans. The effects of the discourse upon the Jews. The Romans advance the next morning to the assault, and find only a pile of dead bodies to receive them.

Flavius Silva succeeds Bassus in the government of Judæa.

Eleazar is governor of Massada.

ON the demise of Bassus, Flavius Silva was appointed governor of Judæa; and finding the whole country reduced to the obedience of the empire, excepting one rebellious castle, he drew out his utmost strength, with a resolution to attack it. The name of the castle was Massada; and it was under the command of one Eleazar, ringleader of the Sicarii, who had seized upon it. This Eleazar was a descendant from that Judas who persuaded a great number of Jews not to submit to the taxation, when Cyrenius executed the office of censor in Judæa. The faction of the Sicarii, it is to be observed, were professed enemies to all that shewed any manner of respect to the Romans, and treated them in that light, even to the degree of pillaging their goods, driving away their cattle, and burning their houses; alledging, "that those men were no better than strangers who betrayed their country in a dal-tardly manner, and had rather live slaves than free-men, notwithstanding freedom is a blessing that can never be too dearly purchased."

But this specious declaration was only a covert for their inhumanity and avarice, as most evidently appeared in the conclusion; for, when these very men, whom they branded with perfidy and cowardice, came to join the revolt, and in the common cause against the Romans, they were more injuriously treated than before, especially those that laid open the hypocrisy of their pretensions, and the iniquity of their practices.

There never was an age since the creation, in which all manner of impiety prevailed amongst the Jews more than at this juncture. Invention seemed too racked for a new species of wickedness; men seemed to agree in every kind of corruption, and there was an emulation to excel in evil doing. Those in power oppressed the common people, and the common people opposed the authority of those in power; the one contending for dominion, the other for plunder.

The Sicarii were the first that led the way to this licentious course of massacre and rapine, never letting pass any opportunity, either by word or deed, of doing mischief. But the cruelties of John were of all the rest the most extravagant. This inhuman monster not only put particular men to death as common enemies, and especially citizens, for presuming to advise measures profitable for the public, but multiplied all manner of outrages upon his country. What better, indeed, could be expected from a man who seemed to set the majesty of heaven at defiance, as in the particular instances of the use of forbidden meats, renouncing the purity of his profession, and departing from the laws and customs of our forefathers? That man will scarcely prove humane to his fellow-creature, that is impious towards his Creator.

Simon, the son of Gioras, seems to have emulated John of Gischala in his nefarious practices. What barbarities did he not inflict upon the very men that raised him! He enslaved those that were born free, violated the ties of blood and friendship, inflamed his myrmidons to the execution of the most horrid butcheries, who deemed the injuring of strangers a kind of disgraceful exploit, compared with the heroic bravery of trampling upon their own flesh and blood.

The Idumæans bore their part in the infamy of the times. These execrable miscreants, after assassinating the high-priests, and thereby cutting off, as much as in them lay, the whole frame and order of religion at one stroke, endeavoured to destroy the remains of political government, and introduced every species of iniquity that was practicable. This was the province of those that were called zealots, to whom that appellation was justly affixed, as they were the warmest patrons, and most sanguine advocates, for vice and irreligion, under the colour of piety and virtue, seducing those they would impose upon by fallacies, giving evil the semblance of good, and good that of evil. At length, however, Divine vengeance overtook and stopped them in their career; for they suffered all the calamities and torments that is possible for human nature to undergo, and this throughout the whole course of their lives. It might be justly said, that they suffered less than they deserved, because they could not be punished according to their deserts. Indeed, their crimes were of so crimson an hue, as to exclude them almost from pity, divine or human. But to return to our main point.

Silva, the Roman general, was now upon his march to besiege Massada, where there was a garrison of the Sicarii, under the command of Eleazar, who was at the head of that party. He had gained possession of the whole country about it, without much difficulty; settled his garrisons in the most convenient places; and run up a wall about the castle, to prevent excursions or escapes, and to secure his guards. He made choice of a quarter for his camp that he found found most commodious for his purpose: this was upon the joining of the castle rock to the next mountain. Provisions, indeed, were extremely scarce; for they were brought a great length of way, and with much trouble to the Jews, whose business it was to supply them; besides the conveying of water another way, as there was no fountain near the place.

Having taken these previous steps, Silva made the necessary dispositions for the siege, which was like to be a work of time and labour, as will appear from a description of the situation of the castle.

It stands upon a large high rock, with deep and craggy precipices round about it. There is no discerning the bottom, by reason of other rocks, that interpose and cover it. The access is so difficult, that even beasts cannot climb it, except by two passages; one to the eastward from the lake Asphaltitis, which is very dangerous; the other from the west, which is more practicable of the two. One of these passages is called by the name of the Serpent, from the several windings and turnings in the ascent; for the rocks in many places double upon themselves: the passages are likewise so narrow, that there is a necessity for standing upon one foot, while the other is advanced; besides, one false step is certain death, as, on each side, there is a precipice tremendous to behold. This passage is estimated at thirty furlongs from the bottom to the top of the mountain, upon which is a plain, where Jonathan, the high priest, built a fortress, and called it Maffada.

Herod the Great afterwards adorned and fortified it, at immense charge and labour. He built a wall round it seven furlongs in compass, composed of curious white stone, twelve cubits in height, and eight in breadth. He erected also upon that wall twenty-seven turrets, each fifty cubits in height; and these turrets had a communication with all the buildings on the inside of the wall. The plain above was of so fruitful a soil, that Herod ordered it to be set apart for tillage, that those who should take sanctuary in the citadel, might never want provision. He built a magnificent palace for himself within the compass of the castle, the entrance fronting the west, and inclining a little to the north. The walls of it were high and strong, with towers in the four corners, each sixty cubits in height. The apartments, galleries, and baths, for construction and ornament, equalled any of his works, being supported by pillars each of one entire stone, and wrought with exquisite skill. In each quarter of the palace were many large cisterns, hewed out of the rock, for the preserving of water; so that these reservoirs abundantly supplied the want of fountains. There was also a way cut under ground from the palace up to the castle, which was not to be discovered from without; and that on the east side, as before observed, was impassable. On the way to the westward, and in the narrowest place, was built a large tower, a thousand cubits distant from the castle; and thus was their citadel fortified by art and nature, so as to frustrate the attempts of assailants.

Nor was this fortress provided only against force and stratagem, but also against the dint of famine, being stocked with corn, wine, oil, pulse, and dates for many years, all which Eleazar found there, when he, with his Sicarii, took it by surprize. Moreover, the provisions were as fresh and sound as if they had been recently deposited, though they had remained there little less than an hundred years, which probably might be owing to the purity of the air at that height abstracted from grois vapours.

There was also found here a magazine of arms sufficient for ten thousand men, stored there by order of Herod, together with a great quantity of unwrought iron, brass, lead, and tin; from which it may be presumed, he had some important design in contemplation. According to report, Herod prepared this fortress as a refuge against two kinds of danger: the one, lest the people should depose him, and restore the Asmonean family to the throne; the other, and much greater danger, lest Cleopatra should prevail with Anthony to seek his life, in order to raise her to the government of Judaea, as she acknowledged to have tampered with him to accomplish such a purpose. Whatever was the motive, Herod put Maffada in such a condition, that it was long deemed impregnable; and was, indeed, the finishing stroke for the Romans in the Jewish war.

Silva, the Roman general, having, by the wall he built on the outside, precluded the Jews from escape, advanced with his engines, there being but one place that he could fill up to raise a bank; for behind that tower which secured the road that led to the palace, and to the top of the hill from the west, there was a large long rock, called Leuce, but not so high by three hundred cubits as Maffada. The general had no sooner gained this rock, than the soldiers fell to work with such alacrity, that a bank was soon raised two hundred cubits high; but not being strong enough to support the engines, they raised a kind of platform upon it, wrought with large stones, fifty cubits both in breadth and height. But besides these ordinary engines, they had others, of the invention of Vespasian, improved afterwards by Titus. They erected farther upon this platform, a tower of sixty cubits, plated with iron.

The Romans, from this turret, galled the defendants with darts and stones from the engines to such a degree, that they were forced to retire. At the same time Silva ordered the great battering ram to be brought forward, and played against the wall, and, in course of time, it made some impression. The Sicarii, however, quickly supplied the defect, by building another wall within that, which eluded the force of the engines; for the matter being pliant, it deadened the strokes.

When Silva found his engines ineffectual, he resolved to attempt that by fire which he could not compass by battery, and therefore ordered his soldiers to try what might be done by fire-brands towards destroying the defences. The new works, being chiefly composed of timber, took fire immediately, and burst out into a mighty flame, which began with the wind at the north, and beat so terribly upon the Romans, that they almost despaired of saving their engines; but the wind fortunately, though suddenly, veering about to the southward, drove so furiously upon the wall, that it set all in a flame from top to bottom. The Romans were so sensible of this providential appearance in their favour, that they returned cheerfully to their camp, with full resolution to attack the enemy next morning at day-break, and to keep careful watches, in the mean time, that they might not escape in the night.

But Eleazar never entertained a thought of flying himself, or suffering any of his people so to do. The wall, however, being consumed to the ground, and no hope or possibility left of safety or relief, the main point was to consider how they might deliver their wives and children from the ignominious treatment they had reason to expect at the hands of the Romans, whenever they came to be masters of the place. Eleazar, upon weighing the matter, concluding that a glorious death was infinitely preferable to a life of infamy, and that the noblest resolution they could take was not to outlive their liberties, called together the most courageous of his friends, and, in the following address, endeavoured to prevail with them to a compliance with it.

"It is no new thing, my generous friends, for our people to disclaim any other lord and master, than the true and sovereign Lord and Master of the universe, God himself; and this without exception to the Romans, or to any other nation whatsoever. The time is now at hand to make good our words by our deeds; wherefore let us act like ourselves. We have hitherto run all hazards to preserve our freedom; but we are at present threatened with chains, and the worst of torments, if we fall alive into our enemies hands; as the first that fell off from them, and the last that stood out against them. The matter duly considered, we are are to look upon it as a singular grace and favour from above, to be left still at liberty to chuse our death; a blessing denied to many that are gone before us. We are certain of being all slaves to-morrow, if we do not prevent it by setting ourselves free this very night; and it is not in the power of our enemies to hinder it; neither is there any thing they desire more than to take us alive; and it is now too late to think of contending any farther. Something might have been done at first, perhaps, if the assertors of our liberties had but duly considered things. For they would have found, that if God had not cast us off, though formerly his chosen people, he would never have exposed us to what we have suffered, both by our own divisions, and from our enemies, the destruction of so many of our principal men, and the holy city itself laid waste with fire and sword. How comes it, at last, that we alone are the men of the whole nation to stand up for our liberties, as if we ourselves were innocent of those iniquities that we have taught to others? You see, by this time, the vanity of your extravagant hopes, and the misery of your disappointments. What are we the better for an impregnable castle, with ample provisions of arms, and all necessaries for our support, when God hath manifestly doomed us to destruction? What do you think of that judicial wind and fire, that left the Romans to consume us and our new wall? Or, was it not an infliction upon us for the crying sins we had been guilty of one towards another? Since our punishment is just, and there is no avoiding it, will it not be much more reasonable for us to do justice upon ourselves, than to leave it to the victorious Romans, as the executors of Divine vengeance? By this means we secure the honour of our wives, and the freedom of our children. Next to them, let us honourably take our own turns, and die free; leaving that memorial behind us as the best of monuments. But first, let the castle be set on fire, and our own gold and silver melted down; for the Romans will be sick of their purchase, without the possession either of our treasure, or of our persons. Let the provisions for sustenance be left behind as a testimony that we are not starved into this condition; but kept to our first resolution of chusing death rather than bondage."

Eleazar's speech was differently received by the people to whom it was addressed. Those of a tender turn started at the thoughts of laying violent hands on themselves, and their tears betrayed the softness of their hearts. Others were pleased with the proposal, and desirous of putting it into execution. To work the former, however, into compliance, he proceeded in his exhortation, and advanced the doctrine of the immortality of the soul, with divers remarks and inferences, to the following effect:

He proceeds in his exhortation.

"I am wonderfully mistaken, I perceive, in my opinion, that brave men, in a contest for liberty, had rather lose their lives than their cause. For it is otherwise with you I find, that are afraid to die, though to deliver yourselves from calamities worse than death itself; and in a case too, that neither needs counsel, nor will bear delay. We have it from antiquity, the holy scriptures, the laws and customs of our country, the doctrine and practice of our forefathers, that it is not life, but death, that makes a man happy. What is it but death that sets the soul at liberty, and transmits it into those pure and blessed regions where it shall never know corruption? But so long as it communicates with the mortal body, it partakes also with the evils of that body, and it is in a manner dead; for what affinity is there betwixt divine and mortal? Soul and body in conjunction, it is true, may do much; for the body is but the soul's instrument, and their secret offices and operations are unaccountable. But when the soul comes once to be discharged of its clog and weight that keeps it down, and to recover its proper station, it enjoys a vigorous and perfect liberty; not visible to human eyes, but invisible as God himself is; and it is invisible also in our bodies. It comes into us unseen, and so it goes out again, incorruptible in itself, but causing variety of changes in the body: for whatsoever the soul influences, it puts life and vigour into it; and whenever it withdraws itself, the separation is certain death. This does not hinder the soul yet from being immortal. As in sleep, for instance, how quietly does the soul repose itself in that respite from the distractions of the body! which shews the happiness of the soul is wrapt up within itself, and likewise that it holds some sort of communication with the Almighty, in foretelling things to come. But how can any man pretend to fear death that loves rest? or who, but a madman, for the sake of a short life, would grudge himself a life eternal? Besides, we are trained up, by the laws and institutions of our profession, not only to the contempt of death ourselves, but also to recommend and practise it for an example to others.

■ If there needed any recourse to strangers for argument or authority upon this subject, what shall we say to the Indian philosophers and Brachmans? a wise and virtuous sort of people. They look upon life only as a necessary function of nature; an office which they discharge uneasily enough, and not without some impatience to be quit of the trouble. They are not weary of life neither, upon the account of pain or inconvenience; but, for the love of immortality, and a blessed conversation that shall never have an end. Nay, they take solemn leave of their friends too, as if it were but for a journey, and tell them when they are going: neither does any body offer to hinder them; but, on the contrary, wish them happy; and send formal messages by them to their friends, in full and certain confidence that they understand one another. So when they have received all their orders and instructions, they commit their bodies to the fire, as a preparatory purification, and go off with acclamations, and to the satisfaction of all the spectators. Among them, friends follow one another more cheerfully to death, than they would do to a long journey; congratulating those who are now entering into a state of immortality, and only lamenting the rest that stay behind. What a shame will it be for us now to fall short of the Indians, in a matter of this importance, and to bring a scandal upon the excellent laws and religion of our forefathers, by an inglorious pusillanimity! Or, put the case that we had been otherwise instructed, and brought up in the contrary principles from our infancy, as if life were the sovereign good of mankind, and death the most dismal of calamities, the very occasion should make us resolute in our case, since necessity and the will of God will have it so. We are now to be punished with the loss of life, for our former abuses of it; by the ordering of a Divine Providence. Neither are we to ascribe it to our own arms, or to the generosity of the Romans, that we were not every man cut off in this war. Nor was it simply a conquest, but the effect of a more powerful cause, that made it look like one. What had the Romans to do in that bloody massacre of the Jews at Cesarea, by the people of the place, where man, woman, and child, were cut off upon their seventh day's festival, without one word of a conspiracy, or the least resistance? Whereas the Romans never looked upon the Jews as their enemies, but only when they revolted. It will be said, perhaps, that there was an old grudge betwixt the Jews of Cesarea and the citizens, and that the latter took this opportunity for revenge. What shall we say then of the Scythopolitans, that joined with the Greeks against us, and not with our friends against the Romans? What did they get at last for their good-will, but the utter destruction of themselves and their families? This was the reward, in fine, that we had for our assistance; they brought us into the same extremity, out of which we rescued them.

The MEN of MASSADA (previous to destroying themselves) MURDERING their WIVES and CHILDREN, to prevent their falling into the hands of the Romans.

Published as the 1st. direct by G. Cooke N^o. 7 Paternoster Row.

"It would be too tedious to cite particular instances; for you well know that there is not so much as one city in Syria that has treated us better, and that has not been incomparably worse to us than the Romans. What think you of Damascus, that, without any colour, or pretence of disgust, butchered ten thousand Jews, with their wives and children, in that single city? Then they reckon at least sixty thousand killed in Ægypt. That is no wonder, you may say, in a strange land, where they had no seconds to stand by them. But to come to our own case, we, who had the courage to assert our liberties against the Romans in our country, and wanted neither men or arms, fearless spirits, impregnable cities, strong holds, or any other manner of provisions that might encourage or strengthen a revolt, and entitle us to a reasonable hope of a victorious issue. How long did this last, and to what end did this pompous preparation serve, save only to aggravate confusion? For all is lost, and only to the honour of the enemy; without any advantage to ourselves, for, and by, whom these stores were provided.

"How happy are they that fell with their swords in their hands, contending for their liberty, and in the same act preserving it, compared with the surviving remainder of us, that are reserved in chains! Some for torture, some for the fire, others for spectacles, some for combat, and others to be torn with scourges; some half eaten by beasts. Who would not suffer a thousand deaths rather than lead such a life? But the most deplorable of all the rest are those that are yet living, calling upon death, and yet have not the resolution to dispatch themselves.

"Summon up your thoughts, and consider what is become of your glorious metropolis, your mighty walls and fortifications, your impregnable towers and castles, your vast treasuries and magazines, (though too little for your stores,) your prodigious multitudes of men; your holy place too, known by the name of God's house? Is it not all torn up by the roots, and nothing to be seen of it, but the ruins, that serve only for a camp to the conqueror; a few unfortunate old men, mourning over the ashes of the temple; and a number of unhappy women, set apart for the most ignoble purposes?

"Can any thing, that hath the soul of a man, submit to look another sun in the face after this? Though he might live without either fear or danger, can any man be so unnatural to his country, so mean and narrow-spirited, as not to be grieved that he ever lived to see this day? It would have been well if we had been all in our graves before ever we beheld these sacrilegious ruins, and this glorious pile of Jerusalem laid in rubbish. But so long as we had hopes and courage, we flattered ourselves with the possibility of a redemption. That conceit, however, being now over, and nothing left us to trust to but the consideration of an insuperable necessity, we have nothing more to do than to take pity of ourselves, our wives, and our children, and to make all the haste we can, while we have the means in our hands. We are all born to die, the brave and the coward alike, and all subjected to the same fate. As to these points of indignity and slavery, the seeing of our wives dishonoured, and our children led in triumph, these are not evils arising from the necessity of our nature, but the results of cowardice, when a man might have died, and would not. As to us, that had the heart to abandon the Romans, fly in the face of our masters, and afterwards refuse quarter and pardon, when it was offered us, and not so much as accept of an indemnity, though they themselves begged it of us, can it be thought that, if ever they take us alive, this will be forgotten?

"It is shocking to think of the miserable condition both of young and old, betwixt the strength

"of body, on the one hand, to lie languishing under a lingering torment, and the weakness of age, on the other, that is not able to support it. The husband must expect to see his wife dishonoured before his face; and the father to hear his children begging in chains for relief. But while we are free, and matters of our swords, let us make a glorious use of them, and preserve our liberties. Let us die freemen, with the comfort and company of our wives and children about us. It is but what they themselves desire, what our laws require at our hands, and what Providence itself hath made necessary for us. Only the Romans are against it, for fear we should do their work for them. Let us dispatch then; for it will be to our immortal honour to take the prize they long for out of their hands, in leaving them only the poor satisfaction of dead bodies for their triumph."

As Eleazar was proceeding in his exhortation they cut him off short, and expressed the greatest eagerness of accomplishing the design recommended, contending, with a kind of demoniacal fury, who should be foremost, as a mark of superior bravery; so ardent was the passion of these people for the destruction of themselves and families. Nor did their courage fail them when they came to the execution; they retained their natural affection to the last, from a confirmed opinion that they could not do their friends a better office. The husbands tenderly embraced their wives, took their children into their arms, and, with gushing tears, compleated their last resolve. The necessity of the action was at once a source of comfort and a plea of excuse, from a consideration of deliverance from those miseries they had to expect from the hands of their enemies. Not a man at length refused to act his part in the rueful scene, but dealt destruction, with a relentless hand, amongst the nearest and dearest friends and relations. Miserable men, indeed! whose poignant woes compelled them to slay their wives and offspring, as the lightest of evils that were before them.

The whole body concurs in opinion with Eleazar.

When they were no longer able to sustain the grief they were under for what they had done, deeming it an injury to those they had slain to survive them even the shortest space, they piled up all their goods in an heap, and burnt them; then chusing ten men by lot, out of their number, to do execution upon all the rest, they ranged themselves as close as possible to the dead bodies of their friends, gave them a parting embrace, and cheerfully submitted to the decisive stroke. When these ten had discharged their office with unshaken resolution, they cast lots among themselves which of them should dispatch the other nine, on condition that the surviving tenth man should slay himself upon the bodies of the rest. The nine died with the same constancy as the former; and the last man, having surveyed the bodies of those he had slain, to assure himself of their being effectually dispatched, set fire to the palace, cast himself upon his sword, and fell amongst his friends."

Ten executioners chosen by lot.

Thus concluded the fatal tragedy, upon a presumption that not a soul remained to become subject to the Romans. Yet it appeared afterwards, that there was one ancient woman, and a female relative of Eleazar, (a person of admirable qualities,) with five small children, who had concealed themselves in caverns, and escaped the massacre. The number of the slain was nine hundred and sixty, including women and children in the computation. This dreadful calamity happened on the fifteenth day of the month Xanthicus.

Next morning, at break of day, the Romans made every preparation for an assault; but as no enemy appeared, nor any noise was to be heard but the crackling of flames, they stood in amazement and suspense, and at length made a general shout, to try if they could be answered. The clamour alarming the women, they came out of their caverns, and related the melancholy story of what had been done to the Romans, which appeared to them incredible, till, attempting to quench the fire, and following their way up to the palace, a dreadful spectacle of piles of carcases convinced them of the truth of it. They were struck with admiration at the courage and resolution of the Jews, who had thus magnanimously braved death, and maintained their freedom to the last gasp.

C H A P. XXIX.

Many of the Sicarii retire to Alexandria, and raise commotions. The Jews impute to them all their misfortunes. Refuse to acknowledge the supremacy of Cæsar.

MASSADA being thus reduced, the Roman general left a garrison in the fortrefs, and marched with his army to Cæsarea, leaving the country in perfect peace behind him; for the Jews of Judæa were so broken and subdued by the burthen and continuance of the war, that not an enemy was to be heard of in that quarter. Yet disturbances soon after prevailed in Alexandria, where several Jews were put to death.

Many of the faction of the Sicarii had fled thither for sanctuary, and, not content with living in safety and ease, endeavoured to raise fresh commotions, by persuading many of the citizens to assert their liberty, esteem the Romans no better than themselves, and acknowledge no other lord than the Almighty Sovereign of the universe. They proceeded to avow these principles, which, if any of their own countrymen presumed to contradict, they were immediately put to death. Some they terrified, others they seduced from their allegiance to the Romans, till, in fine, their practices became so bold and dangerous, that the leading men took the alarm, and summoned a general meeting of the Jews, to arraign the temerity and folly of the Sicarii, and demonstrate that they had been the authors of all the evils that had fallen upon them. They observed, that as soon as their design should be known to the Romans, they would certainly avenge themselves upon all promiscuously, so that the innocent and guilty would be involved in one common calamity. From these considerations they cautioned the multitude to beware of bringing destruction on themselves through their means, and admonished them to provide for their own safety, by delivering these miscreants up to the Romans.

The multitude, thus apprized of their danger, complied with what had been proposed, fell violently upon the Sicarii, and seized six hundred of them immediately. The rest fled to Egypt, Thebes, and places adjacent, where they were soon taken, and brought back again; but so insuperable was their resolution, that they endured the most exquisite torments, rather than acknowledge Cæsar for their master. And what is more astonishing, the very children sustained the same tortures with the same resolution as the adults: in fine, not one soul of them would acknowledge Cæsar to save life, so far did their contempt of pain prevail over the fear of it.

C H A P. XXX.

Onias moves Ptolemy to grant the Jews permission to build a temple, and enjoy the exercise of their religion. Ptolemy grants the request. The temple is erected, and afterwards rifled and shut up.

LUPUS being at this time governor of Alexandria, gave Cæsar early intelligence of this commotion; and the emperor, well knowing the turbulent and seditious temper of the Jews, thought it advisable to be cautious of their meetings and cabals, to prevent faction and parties being raised, and therefore sent orders to the governor, to demolish their temple in the city of Onias, in Egypt.

This temple was built, and had its appellation from the following occasion.

Onias, the son of Simon, one of the high-priests, being driven out of Jerusalem, in the time of the war between Antiochus, king of Syria, and the Jews, withdrew to Alexandria, where he was kindly received by Ptolemy, king of Egypt; partly as an enemy to Antiochus, and partly upon a condition agreed upon betwixt them. Onias undertook to bring the Jews over to the interest of Ptolemy, if he would grant him one request. The king signifying compliance, Onias preferred his petition for permission to the Jews to erect a temple in some spot in Egypt, where they might meet for Divine service, according to the laws and religion of their country. By these means he intimated Antiochus would be rendered more obnoxious to the Jews, and the Jews more attached to his interest; besides, vast multitudes would (he added) put themselves under his protection for the free exercise of their religion.

Ptolemy acceded to the proposal, and assigned the Jews a spot of ground, distant about one hundred and eighty furlongs from Memphis, in the track of Heliopolis. Onias built a castle there, and after that a temple; not comparable, indeed, to that at Jerusalem; though the tower bore a resemblance, being composed of huge stones, and sixty cubits in height. There was an altar, after the model of that at Jerusalem, and adorned in the same manner, with a diversity of donations, excepting that there was no candlestick, but a golden lamp of great brilliance, which hung upon a golden chain before the altar. This temple was encompassed with a brick wall, and had gates of stone. It was endowed with a considerable revenue, both in land and monies, that there might be nothing wanting to the solemnity and celebration of the service. Onias was not influenced to this undertaking by an unfeigned regard for the cause of religion, but the aversion he had to the Jews at Jerusalem, who forced him away; and he proposed to himself, by the erecting of this temple, to draw a great number of them back again to himself. There had been also an ancient prediction of the prophet Isaiah, about six hundred years before, that a temple should be built in Egypt by one of the Hebrew race.

Lupus, pursuant to the emperor's orders, went to this temple, took out of it several donations presented to it, and then shut it up. But Paulinus, who succeeded to the government on the demise of Lupus, not only rifled the temple of all that it contained, but threatened the priests severely if they concealed the least article. Nor would he permit any one to enter it on the account of religion, but rendered it wholly inaccessible, insomuch that there was not even the semblance of Divine worship there. The duration of time, from the building of this temple to the shutting it up, was three hundred and forty-three years.

C H A P. XXXI.

Jonathan, one of the Sicarii, stirs up a sedition in Cyrene. He is taken, and brought before Catullus, governor of Pentapolis. Proves an adept in the vile arts of subornation and corruption. Josephus, the historian, is falsely accused, but acquitted by Vespasian, who inflicts condign punishment on his calumniator. Catullus expires in great agony of body and mind.

THE baneful influence of the principles of the Sicarii spread like a contagion, and extended as far as Cyrene. One Jonathan, an enthusiastic weaver, having made his escape thither, drew a credulous multitude after him into woods and deserts, under pretext of shewing them signs and apparitions; and this imposture passed current with the lower class of people. But reaching the ears of some of the leading men of Greece, they gave immediate notice of it to Catullus, governor of Lybia Pentapolis, respecting their design, and the way they took. They were immediately pursued by a military band, and being unarmed, easily overcome. Many were slain, and the rest taken and carried prisoners to Catullus.

Jonathan, the ringleader of this miserable clan, at first made his escape, but, after a long and strict search, was taken, and likewise carried to Catullus. But he found means to divert the storm from himself, and to furnish the governor with an acceptable occasion of turning it another way. This he effected, by bringing the wealthiest Jews of the place into the plot as the promoters of the conspiracy. These accusations, false as they might be, were welcome to Catullus, who aggravated matters to such a degree, that a war with the Jews seemed inevitable. He not only lent a ready ear to those calumnies himself, but encouraged the Sicarii to alledge false accusations; and suborned witnesses to impeach one Alexander, a Jew, (to whom he had long professed enmity,) and his wife Berenice, who were condemned upon the same evidence. These were the first that suffered; and after them a train of three thousand more were put to death at once, whose only crime was, that they were men of property and character. This he thought he might do with safety, so long as their estates were confiscated to the empire. Nay, through fear of being detected in his villainy by Jews of credit elsewhere, he prevailed with Jonathan, and certain others, to exhibit matter of accusation against the most eminent, both in Rome and Alexandria, and among the rest Josephus, the historian. Catullus now coming to Rome, and bringing Jonathan and his companions with him in bonds, made no doubt but the story would pass as he had concerted and represented it. But the event of this contrivance did not answer his expectation; for Vespasian, suspecting the matter, determined upon investigation, and finding out the iniquity of it, he pronounced, at the instance of Titus, Josephus, and the rest of the Jews, innocent, who were thereupon discharged; while, at the same time, he sentenced Jonathan to be first scourged, and then burnt alive, which was accordingly executed.

Vespasian pronounces him innocent, and sentences Jonathan to punishment.

As for Catullus, such was the bondage of the two princes, that they proceeded no farther against him at present; but, in a short time, he fell into a complication of diseases, both mental and corporeal; though the former were most poignant and distressing; for he was tormented with all the horrors of conscious guilt, and saw, in imagination, the ghastly apparitions of those whom he had murdered, in so much that he started from his bed, as if he would endeavour to avoid approaching flames. His bodily distemper, in fine, increased upon him, till his intestines were corroded, and came from him; and thus was brought to his end, by the Divine vengeance, a man who acted in defiance of all the laws of humanity and justice.

Thus concludes our history, in which we have strictly adhered to truth and candour, according to promise, for the information of those who may be desirous of becoming acquainted with the particulars of the wars between the Romans and the Jews. The style must be submitted to the judgment of the reader; but as to the facts recorded, I must be bold to aver, that truth has been my invariable aim throughout the whole composition.

ON THE

ANTIQUITIES of the JEWS,

IN ANSWER TO

APION.

BOOK I.

Preface.

IT is presumed, most excellent Epaphroditus, that I have already incontrovertibly proved the antiquity of the Jewish nation, which originated with themselves, and maintains a claim of priority to this very day. The Antiquities contain the history of five thousand years, are founded on the sacred writings, but translated by me into the Greek tongue. Since, however, this arduous, and, I may add, unprejudiced, undertaking, has not been sufficient to exempt the author from illiberal censure, or his productions from fabulous imputation, (and that upon the mere presumption of the Greek historians having neglected to record the antiquity of the Jewish nation,) I am bound, in duty to myself, and my country, first, to refute the invidious assertions of opponents; secondly, to inform the ignorant; and, thirdly, to state plain facts, in terms obvious to the understanding of those who desire to investigate truth.

The author's design in writing.

The authorities I shall cite will be derived from men of undeniable reputation among the Greeks; and I shall set aside the asseverations of those who have malevolently or ignorantly traduced me or my nation, by recurring to their own writings. I shall also assign the causes for which many of the Greek historians have passed over our nation without mention in their records, and then endeavour to obviate vulgar prejudices in general.

Aburd prejudices in favour of the Greeks.

There are many people so superstitiously attached to the Greeks, that they consider them, abstractedly from all others, as the very oracles of history, to the contempt and disparagement of the rest of the rational creation. In point of antiquity I am convinced the reverse will appear, if mankind will not be led by vain opinions, but search for facts upon the basis of substantial evidence. They will then find little or nothing amongst them that is not novel; I mean with respect to the building of their cities, the invention of their arts, and the description of their laws. The writing of history is of very late date among them; whereas, by their own confession, the Egyptians, Chaldeans, and Phœnicians, (to say nothing of ourselves,) have, from time to time, recorded and transmitted to posterity, memorials of past ages in monumental pillars and inscriptions, with the advice and direction of the wisest men, to perpetuate transactions of moment. Besides, these people living in a clear air, the very climate contributed to the preservation of these antiquities from corruption and decay; which was quite otherwise with the Greeks, respecting duration, order, and appointment.

Their bare pretence to the knowledge of letters is of late date, and their skill in that particular is at this very hour defective. The antiquity of which they boast goes no farther back than to the Phœnicians, and they value themselves upon the reputation of having had Cadmus for their first master. But so far are they from being able to produce, either in their temples or public registries, any one authentic memorial of these times, that, when it came to be propounded as a question, whether the use of letters was so much as known at the time of the Trojan war, it was carried in the negative. It is universally acknowledged that there is no Greek manuscript in date antecedent to the poems of Homer; and it is certain that the Trojan war was over before that poem (the Iliad) was written. Nor has it been admitted that Homer ever committed this production to writing. The prevailing opinion runs, that it passed like a kind of ballad, which the people committed to memory, till, in the end, copies were taken from oral dictation, which is assigned as the cause of the many contradictions and mistakes found in the transcripts.

With respect to Cadmus, the Milesian, Acurilaus, and other Greek historians, they lived but a short time before the inroad of the Persians into Greece. Pherecydes, Pythagoras, and Thales, who first introduced philosophy, and the investigation of subjects Divine and celestial, unanimously acknowledge that they derived their information from the Egyptians and Chaldeans. Nay, it remains a doubt to this day, whether these men were the authors of the works attributed to them.

From these premises it appears extremely absurd for the Greeks to claim to themselves not only the sole knowledge of antiquity, but a preference in point of historical accuracy, candour, and credit. Nay, is it not evident, from their own writings, that their histories are the result of fancy and conjecture, rather than records of substantial facts? As their authors clash one with another, and report one and the same thing in a manner totally different.

Contradiction between the Greek authors.

It would be tedious to point out the disagreement between Hellanicus and Acusilaus respecting their genealogies; the differences between Heliod and Acusilaus, the proofs repeatedly brought by Ephorus to demonstrate the representations of Hellanicus; thereof Timeus to the same purport against Ephorus; those of succeeding writers against Timeus; and, in fine, those of all the latter authors against Herodotus. Nor could Timeus agree with Philistrus or Callias, about the Sicilian history. The historians of Athens and Argos differ as essentially. So that doubts must arise in the minds of the readers, when they discover such palpable contradictions amongst writers. Nay, Thucydides himself is called in question upon several occasions, though the most cautious, candid, and impartial historian of his age.

Cause of the division of opinion among the Greeks.

Upon due consideration, many reasons might be assigned for the great differences which prevail amongst Greek authors; but I apprehend the principal parts are these. First, the neglect of the Greeks in not laying a timely foundation for history, in records and memorials, to preserve the remembrance of great achievements; for, without these monumental traditions, posterity are apt to err, having no clue to guide them into the path of truth. This mode of recording antient traditions was not only neglected in other parts of Greece, but even in Athens itself, which has been deemed the very seat of the polite arts. Draco's penal laws, now extant in manuscript, are the most antient of their public records, though bearing date but a short space before the tyrant Pisistratus. As to the Arcadians, who make such pretensions to antiquity, they came later to the use of letters than any of the rest.

Now there being no authorities extant, there must naturally arise great differences amongst the writers; because such vouchers might be introduced to confirm truth, and refute error, and thereby distinguish between the authentic and groundless historian. Another cause of contradiction is the motives which induce writers to take up the pen. Too many will for the applause of their contemporaries; and prefer the reputation of being esteemed florid in style, rather than candid in narrative. Some write to gratify fancy or humour, without any regard to bulk and justice; others deal in panegyric, to court the patronage of the great; and there are some that lavish their time and talents in calumniating the writings and characters of their predecessors, which are all contrary to the duty and office of a genuine historian.

The characteristic of true history is the concordance of several writers, as to subject, time, and place: but the Greeks seem to adduce their diversity as an argument of authenticity. If the matter in dispute betwixt them and us, were nice arrangements of words, and precision of periods, we would yield them the palm; but we cannot but contend for superiority in point of fact and antiquity.

That the Egyptians and Babylonians of old were precise in the date of their annals, which was committed to the care of their priests, who were punctual in the discharge of that office; that the Chaldeans followed the example of the Babylonians, and that the Phœnicians, who were intermixed with the Greeks, instructed them in the use of letters, is universally acknowledged. It therefore only remains for me to shew, that our forefathers provided, at least, as well for the security of this order and regulation, if not better, than any that went before them, in charging the high-priests and prophets with this commission; and these records have been handed down to our times with the utmost accuracy; and I

date pronounce that our future annals will bear the same stamp of authority. Care was taken, from the beginning, to make choice of men of exemplary piety and virtue for this function; and further provision was made for preserving the sacerdotal race pure and untainted, as no man is qualified for the office of a priest, whose mother was not of priestly extraction; and therefore, without any regard to wealth and honour, whoever pretends to the priesthood, must prove his descent in a right line by a multitude of witnesses. This is the practice not only in Judæa, but wherever our people are dispersed over the face of the whole earth; for our priests make it a kind of conscience only to intermarry with their own tribes. In this case, they send from the father to Jerusalem the name of the woman they intend to marry, with her pedigree well and duly attested.

The best of the Jewish priests authors of their annals

But in time of war, as for instance, in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes, Pompey the Great, and Quintilius Varus, and principally within our own memory, the surviving priests compose new tables of genealogy out of all records, and examine the circumstances of the women that remain. The priests marry no captives, through a suspicion they might have had intercourse with foreigners; and, as an incontrovertible proof of their purity, the names of all our priests, in an uninterrupted succession, from father to son, have stood upon record throughout a space of two thousand years. If any of them prevaricate, they are forbidden the altar, and deposed from the exercise of the sacred function. And this is justly, or rather necessarily, done; because every one is not permitted to write, nor is there any disagreement in what is written. The writings of the prophets we hold of Divine original; and as to those who have written the history of their own times, their number is not great, nor are they very repugnant one to another.

Custom respecting marriage and pedigree.

We have not a multitude of books among us, disagreeing and contradicting one another, as the Greeks have, but are confined to twenty-two, that we are bound to believe, and those twenty-two books comprise the history of the world from the beginning to this day. Five of them treat of the creation of the world, and the generation of mankind, and so to the death of Moses, in a series of little less than 3000 years.

The Jews had only 22 books of the highest esteem.

From the death of Moses to the reign of Artaxerxes, the son of Xerxes, and king of Persia, every one of our prophets wrote the history of the times in which he lived, comprehending the whole in thirteen books; the other four books containing Divine poems and moral precepts. There has, indeed, been a continuation of our history from Artaxerxes to this instant; but it is not esteemed, in point of authenticity, comparable to that of our forefathers, as there has not been an exact succession of prophets since that time. The former writings are the objects of our implicit belief; for, during many ages of the world, no attempt has been made, either to add to, or diminish from them, or even so much as to transform or disguise them. As we hold these writings Divine, we call them so; and are trained, from earliest infancy, to meditate upon, observe, and maintain them as such: nay, we are enjoined rather to suffer death than give them up.

How many are there of our captive countrymen at this day, struggling under exquisite torments, because they will not renounce the laws of their country, nor blaspheme the God of their forefathers? When did any of the Greeks undergo such trial? They would not venture such shocks to preserve all they hold most dear. They hold their writings in no other esteem than as words, and have the same opinion of antient as of modern productions. Many have taken upon them to write our subjects, of which they were wholly ignorant, and that without applying for information to those who were acquainted with them. We have an example of this in the histories of our late wars, published by persons who were never on the spot of action, but who, nevertheless, have the confidence to usher into the world a jargon of inconsistencies as genuine histories.

Zeal of the Jews for the preservation of those books.

Authenticity of Josephus in his history of the Jewish war.

But this I can aver, with respect to my history of our wars, that it is genuine and authentic; as I had ocular testimony, certain knowledge, and the means of informing myself particularly of every occurrence. I have been as faithful in my report, as I was minute in my investigation. I had a command in Galilee as long as our nation was able to oppose the Romans; and it was my fortune, in the end, to be made prisoner, and carried to Vespasian and Titus, who, at first, ordered me to be kept bound; but I was afterwards generously released, and sent to accompany Titus, when he came from Alexandria to the siege of Jerusalem. During the whole time there was nothing done that escaped my knowledge. Whatever passed in the Roman camp was open to me; nor was any care wanting, on my part, most faithfully to represent every circumstance. With respect to the state of the city, I had accounts of it from deserters, with an express from the emperor to take minutes of each occurrence.

This history was compiled at Rome.

Being furnished with these materials, and finding leisure at Rome, I applied to some friends to assist me in acquiring a competent knowledge of the Greek tongue, and then proceeded to the compilation of my history, in which I am so conscious of having observed the utmost candour and justice, that I dare appeal to the generals Vespasian and Titus as my vouchers. To these illustrious personages I first presented my work, and next to them to certain noble Romans, who commanded in the same war. Others I disposed of to several of our own nation, who were skilled in the Greek tongue, as Julius, Archelaus, Herod, and the most excellent king Agrippa. These bear honourable testimony, that I acquitted myself as a faithful historian; and surely I could never have obtained such sanction and patronage, if, through ignorance or favour, I had in any instance deviated from facts. I have been exposed to the calumnies of the illiberal, who have censured my productions in a vein of irony and sarcasm: but they would do well to consider, that whoever pretends to authenticity in the relation of transactions, should first render himself minutely acquainted with them, either from his own personal observation, or the information of others: of both these advantages I have fully availed myself.

Josephus retorts on his calumniators.

Reasons the case, and clears himself.

With respect to my Antiquities, I have, in character of a priest, translated them from our sacred writings, and digested them in methodical order. But in the history of the war, I was an actor in some cases, a spectator in others, and, upon the whole, a stranger to nothing that was either done or said. What insolence, therefore, it is in those, who would endeavour to deprive me of my title to authenticity! They pretended to have inspected the journals of the commanders; but can that invalidate my history, in points absolutely unknown to those commanders?

I have been under a necessity of making this digression, in order to expose the vanity of many who pretend to write histories; and, I apprehend, that what I have observed, is sufficient to satisfy any man, that the very barbarians have better preserved this custom of transmitting down the histories of ancient times than the Greeks themselves. I would now offer some matters for the consideration of those who endeavour to prove, that our constitution is but of modern date, because the Greek writers have made no mention of us: I shall then produce testimonies of our antiquity from the writings of foreigners, and demonstrate the injustice of those who cast reproaches on our nation.

We neither inhabit a maritime country, nor do we delight in merchandise; nor in that intercourse with other nations which naturally arises from it. Our cities lie remote from the sea; our soil is fruitful, and cultivated with care. Our grand concern is the education of our children, to train them in pious exercises, and strict obedience to the laws of our country: this, indeed, we esteem the main business of our lives. Besides, we have a peculiar way of living to ourselves, which gives us to understand, that, in times past, we had no communication with the Greeks, as the Egyptians and Phœnicians had, as also other nations, by a common tie of navigation, trade, and commerce, for the advancement of their fortunes. Nor did our predecessors make inroads upon their neighbours, as others have done, for the enlarging their estates; though they wanted neither numbers or courage, to be dangerous and troublesome, had they been so disposed.

Thus it was that the Phœnicians became known to the Greeks, and through them the Egyptians, and other traders into Greece. After these the Medes and Persians, having become lords of Asia, carried the war into Europe. The Thracians were also known by being contiguous; the Scythians by holding a correspondence with those that sailed to Pontus; and so all along the eastern and western sea, there was a sufficiency of subject matter for history.

But those whose habitations were remote from the sea, were for the most part unknown; as was the case in Europe also, where the Roman empire, that long had possessed such mighty power and greatness, performed such gallant exploits in war, are never mentioned by Herodotus, Thucydides, nor any of their contemporaries: and it was very late, and with great difficulty, that the Romans became known to the Greeks. What shall we say of writers in ordinary, when Ephorus himself, the most celebrated of their historians, was so ignorant of the Gauls and Iberians, that he supposes the kingdom of Spain, with the vast continent it stands upon, to be no more than one city, and so ascribes to them things that were never done, said, nor heard there? Whence comes this ignorance of the truth, but from the writer's having no knowledge of the parts alluded to? Nor can it be any wonder that our nation was no more known to many of the Greeks, nor had given them occasion to mention them in their writings, while they were so remote from the sea, and had a conduct of life so peculiar to themselves.

But if I should turn the Greeks' mode of reasoning upon themselves, and alledge, by way of disproving their antiquity, that no mention is made of it in our records, would not such an inference be exploded as ridiculous? Would they not appeal to neighbouring nations to confirm their claim? If in this manner of proceeding may be admitted on the one side, why not on the other? The Egyptians and Phœnicians are the chief witnesses that I shall adduce in this case; nor can there be any ground of exception to the evidence, as the former are known to be our professed enemies, and the latter no better disposed towards us, particularly the people of Tyre. But the Chaldeans have a better opinion of us, as having been formerly under their command; likewise on account of consanguinity and country, as appears from the honourable mention they make of us in their chronicles. When I have cleared our nation from the aspersions of the Greeks, and wiped away the slanders they have cast upon us, I will then advert to their own historians, and so obviate all farther cavil. I shall begin with the writings of the Egyptians, and cite an extract from the works of Manethon, an Egyptian by birth, but well skilled in the Greek language, as appears from an history he took from holy writ about the Jewish religion. He finds much fault with Herodotus, for his ignorance and misrepresentation of the Egyptian manners and customs; and, in the second book of his history, delivers himself in these very words, which I quote without the least deviation, that they may suffice to confirm his testimony.

“We had a king whose name was Timæus; and in his reign we fell, beyond all imagination, under God's heavy displeasure. There came flowing in upon us, a rugged, robust people out of the east, that made an inroad into the province; and there encamping, took it by force, and carried all before them without so much as a stroke, putting our princes in chains, cruelly laying our city in ashes, demolishing our temples, and miserably oppressing our inhabitants; some being cut to pieces, and others, with their wives and children, sent away in bondage. After this, they set up a king from

“from among themselves, whose name was Salatis.

“The new king advanced to Memphis, and having subjected both the upper and the lower provinces, and put garrisons into all tenable places, he fortified to the eastward in a more especial manner, for fear of an invasion from the Assyrians, whom he looked upon as the stronger of the two. He found in the country of Saïtes, a city, formerly called Avaris, which was situated very conveniently for his purpose, to the east of the river Bubastis. This city he improved and repaired, and fortified it with strong works and walls, and a body of two hundred and forty thousand men to cover it. He made choice of harvest time for the execution of his design, with a regard both to the plenty of the season for provisions, to the means of paying his soldiers, and to the securing himself likewise against all assaults, or invasions, by his excellent discipline and conduct.

“Salatis died in the nineteenth year of his reign; and one Bœon succeeded him, who governed forty-four years. After him came Apachnas, and reigned six and thirty years and seven months. Apochis came next, and ruled sixty years and one month: Janias, fifty years and one month: and last of all came Assis, who ruled forty-nine years and two months. These six were the first kings, and perpetually in war, to exterminate the Egyptians. The people we called hycsos; that is to say, king shepherds: for hyc, in the holy tongue, is as much as king; and sos, according to the vulgar, is a shepherd: so that hycsos is taken as a compound. Some will have it that these people were Arabians. According to some other copies, hyc does not signify king-shepherd, but shepherd-captive; for hyc and hac, with an aspiration, sound, in Egyptian, as much as captive; and it seems to me the more reasonable interpretation of the two, as it suits better with the antient history.”

We have it upon credit of the same author, “that when those (by whatever name they may be called) kings, or shepherds, and their train, had kept the government of Egypt in their own hands for the space of 511 years, the king of Thebes, and the remainder of Egypt, that was not as yet subjected, made a violent and obstinate war upon the shepherds, and routed them, under the command of king Alisfragnuthosis: and when the greatest part of them were driven out of Egypt, the rest withdrew into a place called Avaris, of ten thousand acres in extent; and this the shepherds (according to Manethon) enclosed with a strong substantial wall, that secured to them all necessities within themselves.” He says further, “that Themosis, the son of Alisfragnuthosis, laid siege to it with four hundred and eighty thousand men: but when he found the place was not to be carried by assault, they came to conditions, upon articles to depart Egypt, and a safe convoy to go whither they would. Upon these terms they marched out with their goods and families, to the number of two hundred and forty thousand souls, by the way of the wilderness, into Syria; and, for fear of the Assyrians, who were then masters of Asia, retired into a country that is now known by the name of Judæa, where they erected a city large enough to receive this vast multitude, and called it Jerusalem.”

The same Manethon tells us, in another book of his Egyptian History, “that he finds these people in books of great authority, distinguished by the name of Captive Shepherds;” our ancestors having been brought up to grazing, and from that pastoral employment taking the name of shepherds. They imagine that they had some ground for calling them captives: it was by that name that our father Joseph made himself known to the king of Egypt, when he obtained permission to send for his brethren. But of this more particularly elsewhere. So that it will be sufficient, at present, to consult the testimonies of the Egyptians upon this subject, and to hear Manethon, in his own words, about the time when this happened.

“King Themosis reigned five and twenty years and four months, from the departure of the shepherds out of Egypt, to the building of Jerusalem. His son Chebron took the kingdom after him, and governed thirteen years: and after him Amenophis, twenty years and seven months: his sister Amessès, one and twenty years and nine months: her son Mephres twelve years and nine months: his son Mephramuthosis, five and twenty years and ten months: his son Themosis, nine years and eight months: his son Amenophis, thirty years and ten months: his son Orus, thirty-six years and five months: his daughter Acencheres, twelve years and one month: Rathotis, her brother, nine years: his son Acencheres, twelve years and five months: another Acencheres, his son, twelve years and three months: his son Armais, four years and one month: his son Armesis, one year and four months: his son Armesis Miamun, sixty-six years and two months: Amenophis, nineteen years and six months. Sethosis, having raised a great force, both at sea and land, constituted his brother Armais lieutenant-general of Egypt, and vested him with all sovereign powers and privileges, the wearing of the crown excepted; and, with a caution not to oppress the queen or her family, nor to intermeddle with the king’s concubines.

“Sethosis, upon this, marched up to Cyprus and Phœnicia, and so forward to the Medes and Assyrians, conquering still as he went; some by the sword, others by the very terror and reputation of his arms. He was so elevated by his successes, that he stooped at nothing, but laying all waste to the eastward, carried the whole country before him. While this was doing, his brother Armais, without any difficulty or scruple, broke faith with his brother in Egypt, and did just the contrary to what he should have done. He expelled the queen, abused the king’s concubines, and, at the instance and advice of his false friends, assumed the crown, and took up arms against his brother. The Egyptian high-priest gave Sethosis notice of all these indignities from time to time; upon which advice the king came immediately back again by the way of Pelusium, and made good his government. From this prince the country took the name of Egypt; for Sethosis was called Egyptus, and his brother Armais named likewise Danaus.”

This is the account of Manethon; from which it is evident, upon a clear computation, that our predecessors, otherwise known by the name of shepherds, left Egypt three hundred and ninety-three years before Danaus went to Argus; though the Greeks pique themselves mightily upon the antiquity of that prince. Manethon therefore advances two great points for us out of the Egyptian records; the first, that our forefathers came out of another country into Egypt; the second, that their deliverance out of it was of so antient a date, as to precede the siege of Troy almost a thousand years. With respect to some other particulars which Manethon adds, not out of the Egyptian records, but, as he himself confesses, from stories of an uncertain original, I shall demonstrate hereafter, that they are no better than groundless fictions.

I shall now pass from these records to those of the Phœnicians, concerning our nation, and from them produce attestations of what I have advanced. There are among the Tyrians public records of great antiquity, and they are so carefully preserved, as to contain all transactions that are worthy of memorial. Amongst other passages concerning our nation, they make mention of king Solomon’s erecting a temple at Jerusalem, an hundred and forty-three years and eight months before their predecessors built Carthage; describing also, in their annals, the very model of the temple. Hiram, king of Tyre, had so great a friendship for David, and his son Solomon for his sake, that he presented him with an hundred hundred and twenty talents of gold towards the ornament of the fabric, and furnished him with the most excellent timber from mount Libanus for the roof and wainscot. Nor was Solomon wanting, on the other hand, in a magnificent return, as, among other acknowledgments, he made him a present of Zabulon in Naphtali. But the love of wisdom, or a kind of philosophic passion, cemented the friendship betwixt them. They sent problems and intricate cases to be solved by each other; and Solomon evinced a superiority to Hiram. There are extant among the Tyrians, to this day, divers copies of the letters that passed betwixt them; and for confirmation of the same, I shall refer to Dios, an historian among the Phœnicians of unquestionable credit. These are his words.

Testimony of Dios, the historian.

“Hiram, the son of Abibal, succeeded his father in the government. He repaired and improved divers cities in the eastern parts of his dominion, enlarged Tyre, and, by raising a causeway between them, joined it to the temple of Jupiter Olympus, standing in an island, and beautified it with many rich donations. After this he went up to mount Libanus to cut down wood for temples. They say farther, that Solomon, king of Jerusalem, and Hiram, interchanged certain problems to be solved, upon condition that he who failed in the solution, should incur a forfeiture; and that Hiram, finding the question too difficult for him, paid the penalty; and proposed new ones for Solomon to interpret, upon the penalty of paying forfeit to Hiram.” This is what Dios records upon this subject.

I now proceed to Menander, the Ephesian, an author who made an historical collection of the transactions of the Greeks and barbarians under every one of the Tyrian kings, which, for the better authority of the work, he has extracted from their own records. Having passed through the succession of the Tyrian kings as far as Hiram, he thus writes:

“Upon the death of Abibal, his son Hiram came to the crown, and lived to enjoy it thirty-four years. This prince threw up a large bank, that joined Eurychorus to the city of Tyre; and dedicated a golden pillar to Jupiter, which was there deposited in his temple. He went after this into a forest, to a mountain called Libanus, where he cut down all the cedar for roofs for temples; raising the old buildings, and advancing others. One he dedicated to Hercules, another to Astarte: the former in the month Peritius, and the other when he marched against the Tyrians, for not paying their taxes: but, upon their reduction, he presently returned.

“Hiram had, at this time, a young man, a servant in his house, whose office it was to expound Solomon’s riddles; his name was Abdemonus. From this king’s time to the building of Carthage, the computation runs thus:

The pedigree of Hiram.

“Baleazar, the son of Hiram, succeeded his father, and died in the forty-third year of his age, and the seventh of his reign. The next was Abdastartus, the son of Baleazar, who died in the twentieth year of his life, and the ninth of his reign. This prince was murdered by his nurse’s four sons, and the eldest of them governed twelve years in his place: and after him came Astartus, the son of Delæastartus, who lived sixty years, and reigned twelve. After him came his brother Alerymus, who lived fifty-four years, and reigned nine, and was murdered by his brother Phelles, who took the government upon him in the fiftieth year of his age; and, after a reign of eight months, was slain by one Ithobalus, a priest of the goddess Astarte, who lived to the age of sixty-eight years, and ruled thirty-two. His son Badesor succeeded him, who lived forty-five years, and reigned six: and then his son Matgenus lived two and thirty years, and reigned nine. The next was Pygmalion, who lived fifty-six years, and “governed forty. It was in the seventh year of his reign, that his sister Dido built Carthage, in Africa. So that from the time of Hiram to the erecting of Carthage, we account an hundred and fifty-five years and eight months. Taking for granted that the temple of Jerusalem was built in the twelfth year of king Hiram, it makes an hundred and forty-three years and eight months, from the raising of the temple to the building of Carthage.”

Nothing can tend more to confirmation than this testimony of the Phœnicians: for our ancestors certainly came into Judæa long before the building of the temple; nor did they build that temple till they had obtained possession of the country by dint of arms, as I have clearly proved from the sacred writings in my Antiquities.

We will now proceed to shew how far the Chaldean records agree with others concerning our history, and begin with Berosus, by birth a Chaldean, well known by the learned from his publication of the Chaldean treatises on astronomy and philosophy among the Greeks. Berosus following the most ancient records, gives us an history of the deluge, and the destruction of mankind thereby, exactly consonant with the description of Moses; as also of the ark, and the preservation of Noah in it, when it was brought to the highest part of the Armenian mountains. He gives us a catalogue of the posterity of Noah, and adds the years of their chronology, from Noah himself to Nabulassar, king of the Babylonians and Chaldeans, with an account of this king’s exploits. He tells us that he sent his son Nabuchodonosor with a mighty army into Egypt and Judæa, where, upon his being informed of a revolt, he reduced the people to subjection, set fire to our temple at Jerusalem, and carried off our whole nation in captivity to Babylon. After this our city lay desolate during an interval of seventy years, till the days of Cyrus, king of Persia. He then says that this Babylonian king conquered Egypt, Syria, Phœnicia, and Arabia, and exceeded in his exploits all his predecessors. But to quote his own words.

“Nabulassar, the father, understanding that his deputy in Ægypt, Coelo-Syria, and Phœnicia, was up in arms, being old himself, and past the fatigues of war, he sent his son Nabuchodonosor, (in the vigour of his youth,) at the head of a strong army, to bring him to reason. This prince encountered the rebel, defeated him, and recovered all the provinces that were engaged in the revolt.

“It happened, at the same time, that Nabulassar fell sick at Babylon, and died, after a reign of nine and twenty years. It was not long before the son had notice of his father’s death; whereupon he immediately settled his affairs in Egypt, and the rest of the provinces; and committing the captive Jews, Phœnicians, and Syrians, that had been in Egypt, to the care of some particular confidants, to see them brought up to Babylon, together with the army and the baggage, he himself, with a small retinue, took his journey for Babylon by the way of the desert. Upon his arrival, he found all things disposed to his wish; the Chaldeans, and all the great men, declaring themselves in his interest, and for his establishment upon the throne of his father.

“In this interim, while the prisoners were upon the way, he ordered them the most commodious lodgings of the city for their quarters, and all accommodations to be provided for them. The spoils of the war were applied with wonderful munificence, to the enriching and adorning of the temples; as that of Bel, and others. He caused to be erected a new town, as an addition to the old one: and to prevent the turning of the river the city stood upon, from the place, in case of a siege, they ran up a triple wall, part of it brick, and the rest of brick and bitumen, about the whole. After all these fortifications, he made such

“such gates as might have become the dignity of a temple. He built likewise a glorious palace, near that of his father, but incomparably beyond it, both for extent and expence. The description of it would be too tedious; but it must be observed, that this admirable piece was the work of only fifteen days.

“There were in it also several artificial rocks, that had the resemblance of mountains; with nurseries of all sorts of plants, and a kind of hanging garden, suspended in the air by a most admirable contrivance. This was to gratify his wife, who, being brought up in Media, among the hills, and in the fresh air, found relief from such a prospect.”

Thus writes Berofus respecting the king: and there are other circumstances worthy of remark in his Chaldean antiquities, and more particularly where he censures the Greeks for affirming that Babylon was founded by Semiramis, queen of Assyria. Moreover, we meet with a confirmation of what Berofus relates, in the records of the Phœnicians, concerning the king of Babylon, and his conquering all Syria and Phœnicia. Philostratus agrees with him in his history of the siege of Tyre; as does Megasthenes, in the fourth book of his Indian History, wherein he pretends to prove that this king of Babylon was superior to Hercules in strength and prowess, adding, that he had the greatest part of Lybia and Iberia at his devotion. With respect to the temple of Jerusalem, we have the authority of Berofus, that it was laid in ashes by the Babylonians; and that Cyrus, when he had reduced Asia, began to rebuild it. That historian thus writes in his third book.

Berofus concerning the temple of Jerusalem.

Further testimony of Berofus.

“When Nabuchodonosor was just entered upon the third wall, in the forty-third year of his reign, he fell sick and died. Evil-Merodoch, his son, succeeded him; but having rendered himself odious to the highest degree, by his exorbitant oppressions, he was cut off by the treacherous practice of Niriglissor, his sister’s husband, in the second year of his reign. After his death, the traitor advanced himself to the crown, and kept it four years. His son Laborosardochus came very young to the government, and continued in it only nine months, being destroyed by the treachery even of his very friends, who looked upon him as a youth of vicious and dangerous inclinations, and therefore removed him. He was no sooner dispatched than the conspirators met, and consulting together, chose one Nabonidus for their king, being both a Babylonian, and of the same family. The walls about the river of Babylon were finished by this prince.

“In the seventeenth year of this king’s reign Cyrus, with a mighty army out of Persia, overran all Asia, and marched directly for Babylon. Nabonidus fairly met him in the field, fought him, and lost the battle: only himself, and some few of his people, got into the town of Borsippe. Cyrus was now before Babylon, making no doubt but, upon forcing the first wall, he might carry the place. But, upon second thoughts, he quitted the siege, and went back to Borsippe, with a design to attack the place. Nabonidus chose rather to cast himself upon Cyrus’s mercy, than to stand the shock; so that, upon his humiliation, Cyrus banished him out of Babylon, and gave him quiet possession of Caramania, where he ended his life in a private station.”

These accounts of Berofus exactly correspond with our sacred books, in which it is related that Nabuchodonosor, in the eighteenth year of his reign, destroyed our temple, and that it lay desolate for fifty years. But that, in the second year of the reign of Cyrus, its foundation was laid; and it was finished again in the second year of Darius. I shall now add the records of the Phœnicians, as too many proofs cannot be adduced, provided they agree in point of chronology. The computation stands thus:

Nabuchodonosor besieged Tyre for thirteen years, in the reign of king Ithobal. After him reigned Baal ten years. After him judges were appointed, of whom Ecaibalus, the son of Baflec, judged the people two months. Chelbis, the son of Abdæus, ten months. Abbar, the high-priest, three months. Mytgonus and Gerassus Betus, the sons of Abdelimus, six years. After them Balatorus, one year. Upon his death they sent for Merbalus from Babylon, who governed four years, and was succeeded by his brother Hirom, who ruled twenty years, during which Cyrus obtained the empire of Persia. The whole interval amounts to fifty-four years and three months; for, in the seventh year of the reign of Nabuchodonosor, he began to besiege Tyre; and Cyrus entered upon his reign over the kingdom of Persia in the fourteenth year of Hirom. So that the records of the Chaldeans and Tyrians agree with our writings concerning this temple; and the testimonies here produced are an indisputable attestation to the antiquity of our nation.

As do the Phœnician records.

But it is now expedient to satisfy those who disbelieve the records of barbarians, and think those of the Greeks only worthy of credit, by producing many of those very Greeks who were acquainted with our nation, and setting before them such as, upon occasion, have made mention of us in their own writings.

Testimonies of the Grecians.

Pythagoras, of Samos, lived in very ancient times, and was esteemed superior to all philosophers in piety and wisdom. It is evident that this great man was not only versed in our laws, but, in many instances, an admirer and observer of them. This is not inferred from any thing that he ever wrote, but from what others knew and reported concerning him. Hermippus, an historian of credit, in his first book concerning Pythagoras, informs us, “that, upon the death of Calliphon, of Croton, one of his associates, the philosopher affirmed, that the soul of this man conversed with him night and day, and enjoined him not to pass over a place where his ass had stumbled, to drink only of clear fountain water, and to speak ill of no man. This he did in imitation of the Jews and Thracians, with an application to himself.” And it was truly said; for Pythagoras incorporated divers customs of the Jews into his own philosophy.

Of Pythagoras.

Nor was our nation unknown of old to several of the Grecian cities, or, indeed, thought unworthy of imitation by some of them, as appears from Theophrastus, in his book of laws, where he speaks of the Tyrian law against swearing by any strange god, naming the Corban, amongst other oaths, prohibited, that is to say, in Hebrew, the gift of God; and this oath was only to be found amongst the Jews.

Of Theophrastus.

Herodotus, of Halicarnassus, was no stranger to our nation; for he makes some mention of us in his second book, where, speaking of the people of Colchos, he has these words: “With respect to circumcision, I find only the Colchians, the Egyptians, and the Ethiopians, to have used it of old. But the Phœnicians and the Syrians in Palestine, confess that they derived it from the Egyptians. The Syrians that border upon the rivers Thermodon and Parthenius, and their neighbours the Macronians, are reputed to have taken it up of late from the Colchians. There are no others that are circumcised, and they proceed after the manner of the Egyptians. As for the Egyptians and Ethiopians, I cannot determine which of them received it from the other.” This author is positive that the Syrians of Palestine are circumcised, whereas there are no people circumcised in Palestine but the Jews; it must therefore be his knowledge of them that induced him to speak concerning them.

Of Herodotus.

Chærilus also, a more ancient writer and poet, makes mention of our nation, and informs us, that

Of Chærilus.

it came to the assistance of king Xerxes, in his expedition against the Greeks; for, in his enumeration of other nations, he last of all inserts ours, when he says,

"These people, with an admirable grace,
 "Brought up the rear: their language Tyrian was;
 "Themselves unknown; the mountains their abode
 "By Solymus, that near a vast lake stood.
 "Their hair cut round; and their heads cover'd o'er
 "With head-pieces of tann'd horse-hides they wore."

From hence, I think, it is evident, that, speaking of the mountains of Solyma, or Jerusalem, and of a large lake at hand there, it can be understood of no other than of the Jews that dwell amongst those mountains; and of the lake Asphaltitis, which is by much the largest in all Syria.

Testimony of Clearchus, taken from Aristotle.

Nor were the Jews barely known to the common sort of the Greeks, but likewise to their philosophers of the first rank, by whom they were honoured with singular marks of friendship and esteem. Clearchus, who was the disciple of Aristotle, and inferior to none of the Peripatetics, in his first book on the subject of sleep, says, from Aristotle, his master, "It would be tedious to run through the whole history of the people of the Jews, and therefore I shall only give you a specimen of a particular person's admirable wisdom." Hyperechides made answer, that it would be the greatest favour he could do them. Aristotle then proceeded thus: "This was a Jew of the Lower Syria, of the race of a sort of philosophers whom the Indians call Calani, and the Syrians Jews, from the country of Judæa, which they inhabit. Their capital city has a hard name, and they call it Jerusalem. He was a person of great hospitality to strangers, and no less considerable for his learning and morals. It was my fortune to be in Asia with some disciples, and this man paid us several visits there, to the great satisfaction and improvement of those who admired his conversation."

This is the character, according to Clearchus, that Aristotle gave the Jews, to which he added his extraordinary temperance and moderation in the government of his passions.

Of Hecataeus,
 the Abderite.

Hecataeus, the Abderite, a man learned and active, who was trained up with Alexander the Great, and lived afterwards with Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, and king of Egypt, wrote an entire tract upon the subject of the Jews, from which I shall extract some passages that tend to elucidate the matter under present consideration. He relates an account of a battle fought betwixt Ptolemy and Demetrius, near Gaza, eleven years after the death of Alexander, and in the hundred and seventeenth olympiad, according to Callor in his history. "It was in this olympiad (he writes) that Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, defeated Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, otherwise called Poliorcetes, in a battle, not far from Gaza." Now it is agreed, on all hands, that Alexander died in the hundred and fourteenth olympiad; and it is therefore evident that the Jews were a flourishing people in the days of that great prince. Hecataeus says further, that after the battle of Gaza, Ptolemy made himself master of Syria, and the country round, and that the people were so charmed with his humanity and moderation, that many followed him into Egypt, and were willing to assist him in his concerns. Among the rest was one Hezekiah, an high-priest of the Jews, and a person of the first rank. He was a man sixty years of age, possessed of the powers of eloquence, and great knowledge of the world. The same author says likewise, that the number of priests who received tithes lived in common, and amounted to about fifteen hundred. Speaking afterwards of Hezekiah, he thus proceeds.

"We have had several conferences with this great man, and others about him, concerning our different customs, practices, and opinions, inasmuch

"that he carried us to his habitation, and instructed us in the polity of his country, which he had down in writing."

Hecataeus proceeds to shew the zeal and veneration we have for our laws, and that we are ready to submit to the most excruciating torment, rather than be guilty of the least violation of them. He then expatiates on the subject of our patience under calumny and reproach in the following manner.

"What indignities have these people endured from their neighbours? How have they been persecuted by the Persian kings and their officers, and yet stood firm to the last extremity against all trials? For instance; the temple of Belus was fallen down at Babylon, and Alexander, being at that time in the place, had an intention to repair it, and accordingly ordered all the soldiers to assist in carrying timber and materials towards the advancing of the work. The Jews were the only people that refused, and were severely punished for their disobedience: but when the king saw nothing would work upon them, out of generous tenderness for such constancy, he ordered them to be discharged. Upon their return into their own country, they demolished all the temples and altars that they found erected to strange gods; for which some of them were fined and punished, and others pardoned."

The historian enlarges then upon our wonderful steadiness and resolutions, the vast multitudes of our people, the prodigious numbers that were carried away captive, by the Persians, into Babylon, and others again, after the death of Alexander, transported into Egypt and Phœnicia, upon occasion of a sedition in Syria. He speaks likewise of the extent, the beauty, and the fruitfulness of our country, (that is to say, of Judæa,) which he computes at near three millions of acres, and affirms it to be a most excellent soil. Of the city of Jerusalem, its spaciousness, the people, and the temple, he speaks to this effect.

"The Jews have in their possession a great many towns, villages, and strong holds; but one city eminent above all the rest for largeness and strength. It is accounted fifty furlongs in compass, to contain an hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants; and the name of it is Jerusalem. In the middle of this city stands an enclosure of stone, an hundred cubits about, and two mighty gates to it. Within this enclosure is a quadrangular altar, made of unwrought stones, that never tool touched; the superficies of it twenty cubits over, and the depth ten. Near about it there stands a spacious building, with a golden altar, and candlestick in it, of two talents weight, and lamps burning continually night and day. But for images, plants, groves, &c. as in other temples, here they were wholly wanting. But there are priests that pass their time there day and night in great purity; and they drink no wine." The same author again thus relates a story of a Jew, upon an expedition, that served under one of Alexander's successors.

"As I was travelling towards the Red sea, there was one Mosollam in the company, a Jew, and one of our horse-guards, that was looked upon to be very brave, and a famous marksman with bow and arrow. As they were advancing on their way, a soothsayer, that took upon him to foretell the fortune of their voyage, bade them all stand, and they did so. This Jew asked them what they stood for? The cunning man, shewing them a bird, replied, If that bird stands, you are to stand; if it rises, and flies on, you are to go forward too; but if the bird takes its flight the contrary way, you must all go back again. The Jew, without any more words, let fly an arrow, and killed the bird. The diviner, and his companions, fell presently upon the Jew, in most outrageous terms. Why certainly (says Mosollam) you are all mad, to be thus concerned about a foolish bird. How shall that poor wretch pretend to tell "us our fortune, that knew nothing of its own?

 "If this bird could have foreseen good or evil to "come, it would have kept itself out of the way of
 "this arrow." Thus much of Hecataeus.

I shall add one word out of Agatharchides; not as any friend of ours; though I take him, in charity, to be no enemy. "He relates a story, how Stratonice cast off her husband Demetrius, and passed out of Macedonia into Syria, with a design to marry the king Seleucus. But Seleucus not answering her expectation, she stirred up a commotion in Antioch, while he was with his army in Babylon. At his return he took Antioch; and Stratonice making for Seleucia, she was taken, and it cost her her life." Her only course had been to have taken her passage by sea; but she was diverted from it by a dream. Agatharchides, reflecting upon Stratonice's superstition, takes occasion to treat more at large upon the topics, and so enters upon an invective against the Jews.

"The people (says he) they call Jews, are possessed of a city by the name of Jerusalem, a place of impregnable strength. They have a custom there of resting the seventh day, without either bearing of arms, tilling the ground, or attending any common business whatsoever; but they employ it wholly in their temples, and upon their devotions, from the morning to the evening.

"Ptolemæus, the son of Lagus, took advantage of this custom, and entered the city with an army upon that day. What was the consequence? When the Jews should have been defending their lives and liberties, their attention was altogether taken up with the superstitious foolery of not violating their sabbath; and so they delivered themselves up to an insupportable tyranny; which taught them, by experience, the unwarrantable foundation of so pernicious a law. From hence it is, that men fly to dreams and opinions, never considering that things necessary are not to be controuled by human reason." Thus Agatharchides reflects upon our conduct: but whosoever passes a sober judgment upon the whole matter, will find the proceedings grounded upon the most glorious foundation of honour and virtue: for what can be more heroical than to give up life and country to the duty we owe to God's holy laws and religion?

That some writers have omitted to mention our nation, not because they knew nothing of us, but because they envied us, or from some other unjustifiable cause, I think I can demonstrate from particular instances. Jerome, who wrote the history of Alexander's successors, lived at the same time with Hecataeus, who was a friend of king Antigonus, and had the government of Syria. Now Hecataeus wrote a compleat volume of our affairs, while Jerome never mentions us in his history; though, from the vicinity of the place of his nativity, he might be said to have been bred up amongst us. But men act according to their different inclinations. The one thought our actions worthy of being transmitted to posterity, while the other was blindly disposed to suppress the truth.

But surely we have sufficient evidence to demonstrate our claim to antiquity, as the Egyptians, Chaldeans, Phœnicians, together with many of the Greek writers; for, besides those already mentioned, there are Theophilus, Theodotus, Mnaleas, Ari-tophanes, Hermogenes, Euemerus, Canon, Zopirion, and many others, who have made particular mention of us. The greater part of these writers must undoubtedly be in the dark, for want of the holy scriptures for their guide; yet they all afford their testimony to our antiquity, which is sufficient for my present purpose. The errors of Demetrius Phalerus, the elder Philon, and Eupolemus, may be passed over with candour, as they had not the means of better information.

There remains behind one material circumstance, to which I hold myself bound in duty to attend. This is to demonstrate the calumnies and reproaches laid upon our nation, and turn the asseverations of the authors against themselves. To all men, who are conversant in history, the prejudice and partiality of writers must have been obvious. Some exercise their malignity and prejudice upon whole nations; some cast the shaft of detraction at one object, some at another. Thus Theopompus inveighed against the Athenians, Polycrates against the Lacedæmonians, and Tripoliticus (not Theopompus, as some imagine) against the Thebans. Some of the writers are actuated by malevolence and envy, some from the hope of acquiring fame, and others by representing things extravagant and extraordinary. But whatever effect such illiberal efforts may have with the weak and superficial, men of sober judgment will treat them with the contempt they deserve.

The Egyptians being our professed enemies, the most effectual means of gratifying them was to pervert truth, and misrepresent the story of our forefathers coming into Egypt, and their departure thence. Indeed, they envied and hated us for many causes. First, for becoming powerful and considerable while we were amongst them, and afterwards prosperous when we returned to our country. The difference of our religion from theirs was another cause of enmity; a difference wide beyond conception; for they paid adoration to brute animals. This practice they imbibed from earliest infancy; and that prepossession that blinded their minds, and rendered them incapable of sublimer ideas, excited their aversion to those profelytes who came over to us; and some of them have proceeded to that degree of folly and meanness in their conduct, as not to scruple to contradict their own ancient records. This assertion I shall prove by quoting the words of one of their principal writers, who I have already cited in confirmation of our antiquity.

Manethon, having undertaken his Egyptian history, solemnly promised to found it upon some sacred writings, and premises, "that our ancestors carried an army into Egypt, and subdued the country, but that, being expelled soon after, they settled themselves in a province that is now called Judæa, built a city by the name of Jerusalem, and erected a temple." Thus far he followed the ancient records. But he afterwards becomes eccentric, admits vulgar rumours and traditions, and introduces incredible stories, representing us as intermixed with a rabble of Egyptian lepers, and thus driven out of the country. He brings upon the tapis an ideal king, under the fictitious name of Amenophis; but, conscious of the imposture, does not calculate the years of his reign, which he has accurately done in other cases. He then ascribes even fabulous stories to this king, as having, in a manner, forgotten what he had already related, that is, that it was now five hundred and eighteen years since the shepherds went out of Egypt towards Jerusalem; for it was in the reign of Themosis that they departed. Now, from his days, the reign of the intermediate kings, according to Manethon, amounted to three hundred and ninety-three years, till the time the two brothers, Sethon and Hermeus, of whom Sethon was otherwise called Egyptus, and Hermeus Danaus. He also says, that Sethon cast the other out of Egypt, and reigned fifty-nine years; as did his eldest son Rhampses, sixty-six years.

Having acknowledged that our forefathers were gone out of Egypt so many years ago, he introduces his fictitious king Amenophis, as a prince of divine speculations, like Orus, and says, that he was desirous to become a spectator of the gods. He also communicated his desire to one of the same name with his own, who was the son of Papius, and a kind of priest. Manethon adds, that this said priest, Amenophis, told him, that his desire of seeing the gods should be granted, upon condition of his clearing the kingdom of all lepers, and other unclean persons; and that the king, pleased with this injunction, gathered together, out of Egypt, all that had any bodily defects, to the number of fourscore thousand,

Causes of the calumnies raised against the Jews.

The falsity of Manethon's Egyptian history respecting the Jews.

Reasons why some writers omit the mention of the Jews.

The Jews are mentioned in many of the Greek writers.

thousand, whom he sent to work in the quarries to the eastward of the Nile, with a mixture of other Egyptians, to whom that service was allotted. He says further, that there were some of the learned priests polluted with the leprosy.

In prosecution of his purpose, he goes on to observe, that the wise and heavenly priest Amenophis, in a horror of conscience for what he had done, and in dread of a judicial vengeance from heaven upon himself for giving that counsel, and upon the king for taking it, durst not mention it to him, but left a writing behind him, and then put an end to his own existence. The author then goes on in these very words.

“ The king, being plied with petitions on the behalf of these miserable people, and particularly for some place of retreat, where they might live safe and easy, they pitched upon Avaris, formerly known by the name of Typhon, and the seat of the shepherds. The prince granted them this boon; and they were no sooner settled in it, than, finding it a commodious post for a rebellion, they lifted themselves under Osarsiph, a priest of Heliopolis, and took an oath of fidelity to him, to obey whatever he should command them, upon these preliminaries, that they should neither worship any of the Egyptian gods, nor abstain from any of the meats that they account holy, nor intermarry but with people of their own opinion. When they had gone thus far, in opposition to the Egyptians interest and customs, the commander presently ordered the fortifying and walling in of the city, and the levying war against Amenophis, who taking other priests along with him, sent an embassy to the shepherds at Jerusalem, whom king Themosis had forced away out of Egypt, with instructions to the deputies to consult upon the common cause, and invite them into a league against Egypt, with a promise to join in the confederacy, and receive them into Avaris, the seat of their ancestors, where they were sure they could want nothing; but they might fight when they found it convenient, and, with the utmost ease, make themselves masters of the province. They were transported with joy at this proposal, and immediately drew out to the number of two hundred thousand men, and so marched away to Avaris.

■ Amenophis, upon the news of this invasion, was in great confusion of mind, as to the prophetic paper the priest left behind him; immediately called a great council of his princes and people together, and sent away all the beasts that passed for sacred among the Egyptians, with a strict order to the priests to keep all their idols as close as possible. He committed his son Sethon, otherwise called Romasses, after his father's name, Rhampses, a child of five years of age, to the care of a particular friend; and so marched away himself, at the head of three hundred thousand fighting men, to encounter the enemy. But, upon second thought, and a check of conscience, he turned short without fighting, and went his way to Memphis, where he and his people took shipping, and, with Apis, and the rest of their gods, fled into Ethiopia. The king of the country gave him and his people so generous a reception, that they wanted for nothing the place afforded; neither provisions or habitations, for their entertainment and convenience, to serve them the whole course of that fatal thirteen years banishment. Thus it fared with the Egyptians in Ethiopia; beside that they had a guard allowed them upon the frontier, for the safety of their king's person.

“ But, in the mean time, the Jerusalem auxiliaries made infinitely more ravage in Egypt, than they that called them in: for there was nothing they stuck at that was either inhuman or wicked; and the very spectacle of their impiety was a calamity not to be expressed. The razing, burning,

“ and rifling of towns and villages, was nothing to them without sacrilege, and breaking the images of their gods to pieces; most barbarously tearing the consecrated creatures, that the Egyptians adored, limb from limb; forcing the priests and prophets to be the executioners of them themselves, and then turning them off naked.”

The author says yet further, “ That the founder of that polity was one Osarsiph, a priest of Heliopolis, so called from Osiris, a god that was worshipped there:” and he says that this priest, changing his religion, changed his name too, and called himself Moses. This is an Egyptian story of the Jews, but contracted for brevity's sake.

Manethon says yet again, that “ Amenophis and his son Rhampses marched afterwar'd out of Ethiopia with two great armies, encountered the shepherds and the lepers, routed and chased them with great slaughter to the borders of Syria.” This is the account we have from Manethon, which is most ridiculously trivial, as will evidently appear.

Now this fabulist takes it for granted, in the first place, that our forefathers were not originally of Egypt, but came thither from another country, and having subdued it, went again out of it. But that these Egyptians, who were thus diseased, did not afterwards intermix with us, and that Moses, who brought us out of the land of Egypt, was not one of that number, I shall endeavour to demonstrate from Manethon's own account, and prove that it is not only a fiction, but that the foundation of it is as ridiculous as false.

Manethon supposes that “ King Amenophis desired to see the gods.” I ask what gods? If he meant the gods their laws ordained to be worshipped, as the ox, the goat, the crocodile, and the baboon, he had already seen them. But if he meant celestial gods, they are altogether invisible. What could excite this desire? Another king, it seems, had seen them before. He might have been informed what they were, and after what manner they had been seen, without any new artifice for obtaining his desire. However, the prophet, it is said, by whose means the king thought to compass his design, was a good and wise man. If so, he must have known that the king's desire was unattainable. But he failed of his end. To come more closely to the point, what pretence could there be to suppose that the gods would not be seen by reason of any defect in the human body? The gods are not offended at the defects of the body, but at those of the mind. How can it be conceived that so many thousand diseased persons should be gathered together in one day? Why did not the king follow the direction of the prophet, and rather expel them out of Egypt, than condemn them to the quarries, as if he rather wanted labourers than to purge his country? He says further, that the prophet flew himself in dread of a Divine vengeance, and left this prediction for the king in writing. How came the prophet not to foresee his own destruction as well as that of the rest? Why did he not dissuade the king from the indulgence of so fantastical a desire? Why that dread upon him of judgments that were not to happen during his life? Or was the misery he apprehended worse than death itself? but the most ridiculous part of the story remains for comment.

The king, although he had been informed of these things, and was terrified at the apprehension of them, did not eject these diseased people out of his country, but, as Manethon relates, gave them that city to inhabit, which had belonged to their forefathers, and was called Avaris, where they made choice of the high-priest of Heliopolis for their governor. This priest first ordained that they should neither worship the gods, nor abstain from those animals that were adored by the Egyptians, but kill and eat them; that they should associate with none but their confederates; and he bound the multitude by oath to the observance of these laws. In fine, they fortified Avaris, and took up arms against the king, sending to Jerusalem for assistance, with a promise of putting Avaris into their hands; not doubting but from thence, upon a conjunction, they might easily obtain possession of all Egypt.

He further says, that they advanced with two hundred thousand men; but that Amenophis, king of Egypt, because he would not fight against the gods, took his flight into Ethiopia, and took Apis, and other sacred animals, along with him. That the Jews, afterwards breaking into Egypt, laid their towns waste, fired the temples, put their nobility to the sword, and committed outrages without mercy or distinction. That the priest who settled their polity was a native of Heliopolis, by name Osarsiph, so called from their god Osiris; but that he afterwards assumed the name of Moses. That Amenophis fell into Egypt, out of Ethiopia, with a mighty armament, in the thirteenth year after his expulsion, and joining battle with the shepherds, and the polluted people, overcame them, slew many of them, and pursued the rest as far as the bounds of Syria.

Manethon did not here reflect that his stories are totally unconnected and improbable; for though the diseased people, and the multitude that were with them, might deem it, at first, a hard measure, to be treated with such rigour by the king at the instance of the prophet, yet, when they were freed from the slavery of the mines, and allowed a commodious habitation, they must certainly have entertained a more candid opinion of him. Or, admitting their aversion to have been implacable, they would rather have contrived some secret practice upon his person, than involve not only their countrymen, but nearest relations, in the calamities of a war. Their contest was with men, not with the gods; neither would they act contrary to the laws in which they had been trained up. We owe our acknowledgments to Manethon, for declaring that the ring-leaders of this outrage were none of those that came out of Jerusalem, but the very Egyptians themselves, and especially their priest, who had bound them by oath to those practices. How absurd it is to suppose, that, when they found none of the relations or friends of the diseased could be prevailed upon to revolt, nor bear any part in a war, they should send to Jerusalem for succour! Could it be on the score of friendship or interest betwixt them? Certainly not; for, on the contrary, they were professed enemies, from a total repugnance in manners and customs.

Manethon affirms, that they immediately complied, upon the promise of being put in possession of Egypt; as if they could be ignorant of the condition of that country out of which they had been driven by force. Had they been in a necessitous state, they might have undertaken so hazardous an enterprize; but to suppose that people, living at ease, and in a much more fruitful and agreeable country than Egypt, should incur such danger for the sake of enemies, and those so nauseously distempered, argues a degree of folly bordering on phrenzy. They could not foresee the flight of the king at the head of three thousand men; for that was the number, according to the fabulist, he brought to Pelusium to encounter the revolters.

He charges also upon the army from Jerusalem, the seizure of the Egyptians corn and provisions, the embezzlement of their stores, and the commission of the most horrid acts. What less could be expected from an open and declared enemy, especially when the Egyptians had done the same things before, and bound themselves by oath to continue the same practices?

In what light shall we view the story of the rout Amenophis gave his enemies, together with the slaughter and pursuit of them to the borders of Syria? Does Egypt lie so open on all hands? and would not those who had the conduct of the war, when they were informed he was upon the march, have secured the avenues out of Ethiopia, and drawn an army together to oppose him? But, says the fabulist, he followed them over the sandy desert, and pursued the slaughter as far as Syria. A very probable supposition! to pursue an enemy over a desert hardly passable, and that without any interruption. It is evident, even from Manethon's own account, that we neither derived our origin from the Egyptians, or ever intermixed with them. As to the diseased part of them, it is not doubted but that many died in the quarries, more in the war, and great numbers in this last action and flight. But we now proceed to examine into the validity of what Manethon advances concerning Moses.

No. 40.

The Egyptians universally acknowledged Moses to have been a man of singular wisdom and integrity; and for that reason, it seems, they were desirous of having it thought that he was of their country, and therefore represented him as one of the priests of Heliopolis, who was ejected, amongst the rest, as an infected person. It has been demonstrated, from their chronological records, that Moses lived five hundred and eighteen years earlier, and conducted our forefathers out of Egypt into the country which we now inhabit. That he was subject to no bodily distemper is evident from his own words; for he positively prohibited any lepers from being admitted into any towns or villages, enjoined them to live apart, and declared, that whosoever touched them, or lived under the same roof with them, should be reputed unclean. He farther ordained, that whosoever should be cured of that disease, and restored to a former state, should pass certain purifications, wash with fountain water, shave off the hair, and offer particular sacrifices, previous to their reception into the holy city. If Moses had been affected with this distemper himself, he would never have been so rigidly severe upon others.

Nor were these laws ordained for persons afflicted with the leprosy only, but they disqualified any man for the sacerdotal office, who had maim, or corporal defect. Nay, if any priest, already initiated, should have such a calamity in future, he was deprived of his function. Can it then be supposed, that if Moses had been a leper, he would have ordained laws to his own reproach?

Nor is there any probability of his changing his name from Osarsiph to that of Moses, as there appears not the least affinity between the one and the other. Moy, in the Egyptian language, is water; and Moyse signifies a person who is preserved out of the water. Upon the whole, it is presumed, I have rendered it evident, that, while Manethon followed the ancient records, he was not far wide of the truth; but where he is guided by fiction and fable, there is no longer any connection or truth in his history.

I shall now enquire into the merits of Cheremon, another Egyptian historian, who supposes the same names and persons of Amenophis, and his son Ramesses, with Manethon. He relates that the goddess Isis appeared to Amenophis in his sleep, and reprehended him severely for suffering her temple to be demolished in the war. But that Phritiphantes, a sacred scribe, suggested to the king, that if he would clear Egypt of all persons labouring under foul and malignant distempers, he should never more be troubled with those frightful apparitions. That Amenophis accordingly chose out two hundred and fifty thousand of those that were thus diseased, and cast them out of the country, under the command of Moses and Joseph, two of the number, and holy men. That their names were originally Egyptian; Moses being called Tisites, and Joseph, Petesepe. That they found at Pelusium three hundred and eighty thousand, that Amenophis had left there, refusing them a passage into Egypt. That they struck a league, and joined in an expedition against the Egyptians; but that Amenophis, not being able to sustain their attacks, fled into Ethiopia, leaving his wife pregnant behind him. That she lay concealed in a cavern, and there brought forth a male child, whom she called Mesenes, who, when he was grown to man's estate, drove about two hundred dred thousand of the Jews into Syria, and brought back his father Amenophis out of Ethiopia. Thus much for the account of Cheremon.

The writers contradict
each other.

To invalidate the credit of these writers, it will be only necessary to confront them. Truth and error can never be reconciled, nor can truth be divided against itself. When men have recourse to fable and fiction, what they write may be deemed fancy rather than history. Manethon imputes the expulsion of the lepers to the desire of Amenophis to see the gods; Cheremon to the vision of Isis. The former makes the priest Amenophis the adviser of the expulsion of the diseased people out of the king's dominions; the latter affirms, that it was Phritiphantes. They agree equally exact with respect to their numbers as their stories; the former computing them at eighty thousand men, the latter at two hundred and fifty thousand. Manethon again sends the lepers first to the quarries, and after that transports them to Avaris, whence they apply to the Jews for assistance, and make that the rule of the war. Cheremon, on the contrary, affirms, that, being driven out of Egypt, they availed themselves of the three hundred and eighty thousand men that Amenophis had left at Pelusium, invaded Egypt, and caused Amenophis to fly into Ethiopia. But, strange to observe! he gives us no information who these men were, nor whence they came; whether they were Egyptians or foreigners, or why Amenophis would not receive them. After forging the dream as the supposed cause of the expulsion of the lepers, he writes that Moses and Joseph were expelled together; whereas the latter was dead four generations before the time of Moses, which space makes almost one hundred and seventy years. According to Manethon, Ramesses, the son of Amenophis, was a young man, assisted his father in the war, left the country with him, and fled into Ethiopia. By Cheremon's account, he was born in a cave after the death of his father, in process of time overcame the Jews in battle, and drove about two hundred thousand of them into Syria. What incoherence! what inconsistency! What the three hundred and eighty thousand were, we are as yet to learn; as we are the manner in which the other eighty thousand perished, whether they fell in battle, or went over to Ramesses. But what is yet more extraordinary, we cannot gather from Cheremon who they were that he calls Jews, or to which of the two parties he applies that denomination, whether to the two hundred and fifty thousand lepers, or to the three hundred and eighty thousand that were about Pelusium. It would, however, be loss of time to dwell upon the confusion of those writers, who evidently confuse themselves.

To former fables, I shall add those of Lyfimaachus, whose torments and inventive faculties far exceed those before-mentioned, and demonstrate his rancorous hatred of our nation. His words are these:

"In the reign of Bocchoris, king of Egypt, the Jews were leprovous, purulent, and over-run with foul distempers, that they pressed into the temples to beg for charity. There died great numbers of them of contagious measles; upon which there followed a famine in Egypt. Bocchoris, in this distress, sent to consult the oracle of Jupiter Ammon about the dearth. The answer was, that he should purify the temples, by sending away all unclean and impious persons out of them into the desert, and driving out those that were ulcerated and leprovous; for the sun itself had a horror for so abominable a sight: which being done, the earth should bring forth fruit again, and nature return to her course. Bocchoris, upon this, calls his priests and diviners about him; and with their advice, orders the sick people to be gathered together, and delivered up to the soldiers: the lepers to be wrapped up in lead, and cast into the sea; and the others to be carried into the wilderness, and there exposed to destruction.

"The night coming on, these poor people began to think what to do with themselves: they made fires, set watches and guards, and the next night kept a fast, to reconcile themselves to the gods whom they had offended. The day following there was one Moses that advised them to decamp, and march on together till they met with better accommodation; with a charge to do no good offices upon the way, nor so much as to give any man good counsel that should desire it; and likewise to break down all the temples and altars they found in their march. These proposals were no sooner approved, and the resolution taken, than the multitude presently put themselves upon the march over the wilderness; and, after many hardships, came at last into a country that was both cultivated and peopled. They treated the inhabitants cruelly in the highest degree, burnt and pillaged their temples, came in the end to a place that they now call Judaea, and built a city there by the name of Hierosyla, (according to the occasion,) being as much as to say, the spoil of holy things: but coming afterwards into power and reputation, they were ashamed of their own name, changed Hierosyla into Hierosolyma, and called themselves after their city."

It is here observable, that this last fabulist does not discover or mention the same king with the others, but feigns a more modern name, and passing over the dream and the Egyptian prophet, brings him to Jupiter Ammon, to ask counsel concerning the lepers, and other unclean persons. He says, that the Jews gathered together in multitudes about the temples. Now it is uncertain whether he ascribes this appellation to the lepers, or to those that were subject to such diseases among the Jews only; for he seems so to restrict it in calling them the people of the Jews. But why not be explicit, and point out whether he means natives or strangers? If Egyptians, wherefore call them Jews? If strangers, why not inform us whence they came? If, by command of the king, so many were drowned, and the rest cast out to deserts, it is extraordinary that there should be so great a multitude remaining, which should pass the wilderness, possess the country, build a city, and erect a temple celebrated throughout the world.

Again, how comes it to pass that he mentions barely the name of our legislator, without a word concerning his country, his person, or his descent? Or without assigning the reasons for his making such extravagant laws in his passage, to the dishonour both of gods and men? Either these exiles were Egyptians or not: if they were, they would not so suddenly have changed the customs of their country. If they were not, they had certainly manners of their own, which they attained from long habit. It is likewise to be considered, that, if they had bound themselves by oath never to bear good will towards those who ejected them, they had a plausible reason for so doing: but for men, in their wretched plight, to wage an implacable war against all mankind, nothing could argue greater folly, or even phrenzy, but the attempt to impose so monstrous a fiction upon rational and intelligent beings. He has the effrontery to affirm, that a name implying "robbers of the temple" was given to the city, and that this name was afterwards changed. But how was it that the very name, which at that time, according to his report, was so great a scandal to the city, should afterwards be accounted the highest honour to its inhabitants? It seems that this malevolent dealer in fiction imagined, ignorantly imagined, that the word Hierosolyma implied the same thing in Hebrew as it did in Greek. But wherefore multiply words to detect an imposture so glaringly manifest, especially since it is presumed, that the very face of the narrative bears a stamp of the fallacy of its author? I shall proceed therefore, in the following book, to accomplish my design.

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS TO EPAPHRODITUS
ON THE
ANTIQUITIES of the JEWS,
IN ANSWER TO APION.

BOOK II.

HAVING, in the former book, most excellent Epaphroditus, demonstrated the antiquity of our nation, and confirmed the truth of what I advanced, from the writings of the Phœnicians, Chaldeans, and Egyptians, together with those of several Greek authors, in my remarks upon Manethon, Cheremon, and others of our enemies, I shall now direct my attention to personal opponents, and, in the first place, to Apion, the grammarian, if he may be deemed worthy of notice.

His writings contain much the same accusations as those with which we have been charged by others. They are contemptibly dull and scurrilous. Palpable ignorance, and malevolent calumny, pervade the whole; inasmuch that they bespeak, at once, the author's want of judgment, of learning, and of candour.

But, as the frivolous and superficial part of mankind far exceed the considerate and discerning, and the illiberal delight rather in detraction than eulogium of character, I find myself under some kind of necessity to detect and expose the errors of this man, who has the arrogance to make himself judge in the cause; and I am particularly induced to the undertaking, from considering that persons, in general, are gratified in finding reproach and scandal retaliated upon their authors.

His manner of writing is so dark and intricate, that his meaning frequently cannot easily be conceived; and his stories abound with contradictions and inconsistencies. At one time he misrepresents the circumstance of the departure of our forefathers out of Egypt, in the same manner with those whom I have already confuted. At another he inveighs against the Jews of Alexandria; and then breaks forth into most outrageous clamours against the rites and ceremonies of our temple and worship.

Now, although I cannot but think I have already abundantly demonstrated, that our forefathers were not originally from Egypt, nor thence expelled on account of bodily diseases, or any similar calamities, yet I hold it expedient to animadvert particularly to what Apion advances in the third book of his Egyptian history, where he thus writes. "I have heard, from some ancient men of Egypt, that Moses was a native of Heliopolis; that the people formerly had their religious meetings in the open air, till Moses, who was well skilled in the worship of his country, brought their congregation out of the fields into private houses in the city, enjoining the people to address their prayers still towards the sun." He adds, "that, with respect to the situation of the place, there were, instead of obelisks, certain pillars advanced upon the figures of basons, with engravings upon them; and the shadow falling upon the basons, (for all was open above,) still as the sun moved, the shadow moved along with it."

This was the professed opinion of our grammarian; to confute which I shall not cite any authority from myself, but only advert to the writings of Moses. It is manifest, from his works, that, when he first erected a tabernacle for the purpose of divine worship, he neither gave orders himself for any such representation to be made, nor ordained that those who came after him should make such a one. When, in a future age, Solomon built his temple in Jerusalem, he avoided all such fantastical decorations as Apion hath here devised.

With respect to the authority he cites of the old men, who informed him that Moses was a native of Heliopolis, it seems he was too young to know it himself, and therefore consulted some of his contemporaries, who, he says, were well acquainted with him; a suggestion pregnant with absurdity. This grammarian could not find out the country either of Homer or Pythagoras, though the latter was in comparison but of yesterday. Why then so positive in the case of Moses, who lived so many ages before them, and all this upon the credit of his ancient men?

Remarks of Josephus upon the errors of Apion.

Nor

Nor are these historians less divided as to chronological determination of the time when Moses led the lepers, the lame, and the blind, out of Egypt. According to Manethon, it was in the reign of Tethmosis, three hundred and ninety-three years before Danus fled into Argos. According to Lyfimachus, it was in the reign of king Bocchoris, that is one thousand seven hundred years ago. Molon, and some others, determined it as they pleased. But Apion, who claims more authenticity than all the rest, determines it to have been precisely upon the first year of the seventh olympiad; the very year, he says, of the building of Carthage. He makes mention of Carthage as a token that would infallibly confirm the truth of his computation. But he was not aware that, by this means, he furnished arguments and evidence against himself, at least if my credit may be given, in this case, to the Phœnician records. For we find in them, that Hiram lived, at least, an hundred and fifty years before the building of Carthage, and that he had a particular friendship, and, indeed, veneration, for Solomon, the founder of the temple at Jerusalem, and contributed materials in abundance towards the perfecting of that work. But Solomon, in fine, laid the foundations of the temple six hundred and twelve years after the Jews came out of Egypt.

As to the number of Jews that were expelled out of Egypt, Apion agrees with Lyfimachus, that they were an hundred and ten thousand. But the origin he gives of the word Sabbath is frivolous and nugatory beyond expression. He says, that, "when the Jews had travelled a six days journey, they had inflammations about the groin, and that, for this cause, they rested the seventh day. Being safely arrived in the country now called Judæa, they gave that day the name of the Sabbath, from the Egyptian word Sabbarosis, which signifies the disease of the groin." Could any thing more absurd or ridiculous be imposed on the credulity of mankind under the sanction of history? An hundred and ten thousand men all labouring under the same disease! If they were blind likewise, lame, and languishing, as Apion elsewhere reports them, how could such an infirm multitude hold out so much as one day's journey in the desert? Besides, they were to cut their way through all opposition. The improbability of an hundred and ten thousand men falling into the same disease, at the same time, must be universally admitted; and as such an incident could never be according to the ordinary course of nature, it would be the height of folly to impute it to chance. Our author had before told us, that "they came to Judæa in six days;" and again, that "Moses ascended a mountain, betwixt Arabia and Egypt, called Sinai, was concealed there forty days; and that, when he came down, he delivered the law to the Jews." I would ask him if it is possible for such a body of men to march over so vast a desert in six days, and to subsist forty days in a place that afforded neither bread or water.

On the word Sabbarosis, and Sabbath.

His explanation of the origin of the word Sabbath is frivolous to the last degree of ignorance and insolence; for the words Sabbo and Sabbath are widely different from each other. The word Sabbath, in the Hebrew language, denotes rest from all sorts of work; but the word Sabbo, as he affirms, denotes the name of the Egyptian disease. This is the novel account which the Egyptian Apion has given us concerning the Jews departure out of Egypt, and is nothing more than a contrivance of his own. But why should we wonder at his misrepresenting the origin of our fathers, when he affirms them to have been Egyptians, when he errs intentionally concerning his own? He was born at Oasis, in Egypt, but renounces the place of his nativity to be thought an Alexandrian, which shews what an opinion he had of the Egyptians; for that name he gives to all whom he would represent in an odious light; and this is the cause for which he takes such pains to disguise his extraction.

Those that glory in the dignity of their country, deem it a point of honour to make good their title, and maintain the rights and privileges belonging to it. This is the case of the Egyptians with respect to us. Either they claim country and kindred with us to aggrandize themselves, or to involve us in their own infamy. But Apion seems to vent his splenetic passion against us merely to gratify the Alexandrians for the privilege they allowed him of being a fellow citizen with them, apprized of the ill-will the Alexandrians bear those that are in reality their fellow citizens; and yet, tho' he pretended to expose only one sort of Jews, the poison of his detraction extended to the whole race.

Let us now attend to the abominable crimes which Apion charges with so much rancour upon the Alexandrian Jews. "They came (he says) out of Syria, and inhabited the spot along the sea coast at a place within the wash of the tide; but there is no port at hand for a vessel to ride in." Was not Apion highly censurable for reproaching a country he so much gloried in (how vainly and falsely, however) as the place of his nativity? For that quarter is a dependency upon Alexandria, and universally reputed a most commodious habitation. If the Jews took it by force, and so maintained it against all opposition, the more it redounds to their honour.

But, to be candid and ingenuous. It was Alexander the Great that put the Jews in possession of that place, and granted them the same freedoms and immunities with the Macedonians themselves. Nor can I devise what Apion would have said, had their residence been allotted them at Necropolis, instead of that royal city, and their tribes been called Macedonians to this day. If Apion had read the epistles of king Alexander, of Ptolemy, the son of Lagos, and the succeeding kings of Egypt, the inscriptions which the mighty Cæsar caused to be engraven upon the pillar at Alexandria, in memory of the privileges by him granted to the Jews; had he, I say, known these records, he must have been lost to all sense of shame, thus to have perverted truth, and opposed the conviction of his own mind.

When he affects surprize at the Jews being called Alexandrians, it is a proof of the greatest ignorance or prejudice. Is it not notorious that all colonies take their names from the first founders? Need we seek for foreign instances, when we have so many near home? The Jews of Antioch we call Antiochians, because Seleucus, the founder of the city, vested them with the privileges belonging thereunto. In like manner the Jews of Ephesus are called Ephesians; and those of Ionia, Ionians; to which right they stand entitled by the successive privileges of former grants. This is a favour which the Roman state hath vouchsafed not only to particular persons, but to whole provinces and nations; for the ancient Iberians, Tuscanians, and Sabines, are now called Romans. If Apion rejects this way of obtaining the privilege of a citizen of Alexandria, let him renounce the title of an Alexandrian. For what pretence hath any man, according to his maxim, who was born in the inland part of Egypt, to call himself an Alexandrian, and especially an Egyptian, those being the people of the whole world to whom the matters of it, the Romans, refuse this privilege? But an envious historian, being deprived of title to this advantage, vents his spleen at those who are in rightful possession of it.

In the erecting of this city, Alexander made use of the assistance and service of the Jews; not for want of men, but in testimony and approbation of their fidelity, and with a design to shew them honour and respect. For, as Hecateus says, "Alexander honoured the Jews to such a degree, that, for the equity and fidelity, which they gave proof of, he permitted them to hold the country of Samaria free from tribute." Ptolemy, the son of Lagos, acted in the same manner, with respect to those Jews who dwelt at Alexandria; for he entrusted the treasures of Egypt in their hands, in confidence of their valour and allegiance; and for his better security, he planted Cyrene, and other cities of Lybia, with their people.

Ptolemy

By Ptolemy Philadelphus.

Ptolemy Philadelphus succeeded Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, who not only let those of our nation free, but remitted them several duties; and, what is more extraordinary, had so great a desire of being instructed in our laws and customs, and in the sacred scriptures, that he requested interpreters might be sent him for his better information. For the more speedy advancement of the work, the care of it was committed to Demetrius Phalerus, Andreas, and Aristeus. Demetrius was one of the most learned men of the age; the other two were officers of rank, and belonged to his body guards. Can it now be reasonably supposed, that this prince could have had such a veneration for the Jewish laws and customs, and for the piety and wisdom of our forefathers, without a degree of affection and regard for the professors of those laws and customs? Apion must be little versed in that history, if he did not know that most of the kings of these Macedonians, whom he pretends to have been his progenitors, were well affected towards the Jewish nation.

By Ptolemy Philadelphus.

The third Ptolemy, called Energetes, when he got possession of all Syria by force, did not offer thanksgiving for his victory to the gods of the Egyptians, but sacrificed, and returned thanks, to the Almighty God of the universe, in the temple of Jerusalem, after the manner of the Jews.

By Ptolemy Philadelphus.

Ptolemy Philometer, and his queen Cleopatra, committed the charge of the whole government to Onias and Doritheus, who were both Jews. Apion treats them with ridicule; but he ought rather to admire their actions, and own his acknowledgement for the preserving that Alexandria of which he pretended to be a citizen: for when Egypt was up in rebellion, and upon the brink of being irrecoverably lost, these two Jews interposed, and reduced the revolted to former obedience. Apion says, that Onias, soon after this, entered the place with a small army, in the presence of Thermus, the Roman ambassador. In this trite manner he recounts an exploit worthy of being celebrated by a much more candid and able historian.

Ptolemy Philadelphus makes war upon Cleopatra, and Onias.

Upon the death of Ptolemy Philometer, Ptolemy Physcon, his brother, marched out of Cyrene, and would have ejected Cleopatra, and her sons, out of the kingdom, that he might obtain it unjustly for himself. For this cause Onias undertook the defence of Cleopatra; nor would he desert the trust the royal family had reposed in him now they were in distress. Never was there a more remarkable demonstration of the Divine power and justice than upon this occasion. When Ptolemy Physcon had prepared for action with Onias, he caused all the Jews in Alexandria, men, women, and children, to be exposed naked, and in bonds, to the elephants, to be trampled to death; nay, the beasts were made drunk to inflame their fury. But the event proved contrary to his expectation; for the elephants left the Jews, who were exposed to them, turned their rage another way, fell violently on the friends of Physcon, and destroyed a great number of them. At the same time an horrid spectre appeared to Ptolemy, with a menacing precaution to leave off persecuting the Jews. His favourite concubine (by name called Ithaca, by others Hirene) joining her office of mediation, he not only complied with her request, but repented of what he had already done, or intended to do. This is a circumstance so notorious, that the Jews of Alexandria keep, to this day, an anniversary festival, in commemoration of their deliverance. Yet such is the inveteracy of Apion, that common detractor, that he reproaches the Jews for joining in this war against Physcon, whereas he should have extolled it as a most laudable action.

Apion is confuted by Josephus.

But the partial and perverse principles of Apion most flagrantly appear in the instance of Cleopatra, the last queen of Alexandria; for he applauds that most infamous woman for her ingratitude towards the Jews; whereas he ought to have reproached her for every species of injustice and wickedness, with respect to her nearest relations, the tenderest of husbands, the Romans in general, and her Imperial benefactors in particular. Did she not cause her sister Arsinoe to be put to death in the temple without a crime? Her brother to be taken off by treachery? Did she not rife the temples of the gods of her country, and the sepulchres of her progenitors? Did she not receive her kingdom as a bounty from the hand of the first Cæsar, and afterwards rebel against his adopted son and successor? Did not her seducing wiles render Anthony a traitor to his country and his friends?

No. 40.

Besides these instances of her ingratitude, inhumanity, and avarice, I might enlarge on the infamous disposition she evinced at the naval battle of Actium, where she abandoned even her beloved Anthony himself, who had been father of many children by her, and compelled him to resign his army and his honor to follow her into Egypt. In fine, I might add to all this, that, upon Cæsar's taking Alexandria, she was fired to such a degree of rage, that she valued herself upon the score of a merciless barbarity, and declared she would have esteemed it some compensation for the loss of the town, if she could have put all the Jews that were in it to death with her own hand. If Cleopatra, according to Apion's reproof, refused corn to the Jews in a time of famine, why does he charge that upon us as a disgrace, which in effect redounds to our honour? However, she at length met with the punishment she deserved.

But we can appeal for our own justification to Cæsar himself, to the public decrees of the Roman senate, and to the testimonials of Augustus Cæsar in his epistles. These, in general, bear witness of the true allegiance we have ever paid the empire, and particularly in the war against the Egyptians.

Appeal of the Jews in their justification.

Apion, if he would have done us right, should have examined these authorities, and particularly the opinion that Alexander, all the Ptolemies, and the most illustrious of the Roman emperors, entertained of the Jewish nation. If Germanicus could not supply all the inhabitants of Alexandria with corn, this can only prove that there was a dearth, and by no means tends to the accusation of the Jews. The good affection of the emperor towards the Alexandrian Jews was never called in question, nor were they denied wheat any more than their neighbours; but, on the contrary, found credit upon all occasions, as in the command of the river, and other considerable passes: and they were trusted, in fine, in all places and matters of moment, beyond all others.

Apion brings another objection, and demands, if the Jews be citizens of Alexandria, why do they not worship the same gods with the rest of their fellow citizens? I reply by putting another quere. Why do the Egyptians wrangle and maintain an implacable enmity to each other concerning diversity of opinion, or matters of religion? Shall we, on that account, pronounce that you are not Egyptians? Or shall we doubt, on the other hand, whether you are, in truth, men or not? For you take pains to nurture animals, and then render them the objects of your worship. Now if you are thus divided amongst yourselves, why should you wonder that the Jews of Alexandria, who came from another country, and had original laws of their own, should persevere in the observance of them?

Objections of Apion answered.

Moreover Apion charges us with being the authors of sedition. If the imputation holds good against the Alexandrian Jews, why not against the Jews in general? for wherever dispersed, we are known to be of one mind. Whoever looks minutely into the causes of these turbulent revolutions, will find that they were occasioned by men of similar principles with Apion himself; for, as long as the Greeks and Macedonians were in possession of this city, the Jews had the free exercise of their religion, and the people lived in peace and happiness; but as the number of the Egyptians increased, the times, in proportion, grew more and more troublesome. The Jews, however, continued the same throughout all changes; while the others, having neither the constancy of the Macedonians, nor the prudence of the Greeks, stirred up these commotions, persisted in their evil practices, and retained their former aversions to our people. The Egyptians, therefore, gave rise to all the differences that prevailed; though we are charged with those very errors and misdemeanors of which our accusers appear to have been so palpably guilty.

Apion is likewise disposed to vilify us as strangers, though possessed to all purposes of the rights of citizens; yet our adversaries claim that privilege without the least colour or pretence. We do not read, in ancient history, any more than in modern, that any prince, or any emperor, ever granted such privileges to the Egyptians. The first that introduced us to a right to that claim was Alexander the Great, and the grant has been enlarged by other kings; and since that, all the privileges have been continued, and confirmed, to us by the Romans.

Apion further takes occasion to pass a heavy censure upon us for not setting up images and statues in honour of the emperors, as if they could not have judged of this matter, or stood in need of his defence. Instead of arraigning our conduct, he should have celebrated the magnanimity and candour of the Romans, in allowing their subjects the freedom of our religion, without extorting from them such honours as they could not conscientiously pay them, and accepting such tokens of respect as they could with propriety render. It is the goodwill that stamps the obligation, and sets a value upon the benefit, without the intervention either of necessity or violence. It may be urged, perhaps, that, as it is a common practice both with the Greeks and other nations, to hold the images of their relatives, friends, and sometimes their very servants, in high esteem, it argues consummate pride in those who withhold that deference from their lords and masters. To this I reply, with respect to ourselves, that we pay implicit deference to our venerable legislator, who has positively forbidden us the use of all images, and of any creature whatever, whether animate or inanimate. He did not lay this injunction with any view of derogating from the dignity of the Roman empire, but he would by no means suffer any corporeal image, or representation, to be made of an invisible and incomprehensible Deity. We are not, however, forbidden from paying reverence to great and good men in due subordination to the one Supreme Being, as in the case of the emperor and people of Rome, for whose welfare and prosperity we offer daily sacrifices at the public charge, and this we do for no other person whatever. Let this suffice for answer in general to Apion as to what he urges with relation to the Jews of Alexandria.

I cannot but admire the confidence of Pondorius and Apollonius Molon, who furnished Apion with his materials, and charge us with not worshipping the same gods as others worship, nor think themselves guilty of impiety, in spreading scurrilous reports, even to the ridiculing and prophaning our very temple. Falsity is of all vices one of the most unmanly, but more especially so where the scandal falls upon a temple celebrated throughout the world for the exemplary solemnity of its devotion.

Apion affirms that, in this holy place, the Jews had the golden head of an ass, of immense value, and that they worshipped this head as a deity; that the image was deposited in the treasury, there found, and carried away, by Antiochus Epiphanes, upon the rifling of that sacred place. To this I reply, that, supposing the story to have been true, it became not an Egyptian to reproach us with it; for an ass is not a more contemptible animal than a goat, or other beasts which they adore. It is strange that Apion could not perceive this to be a palpable lie, and the very extreme of contradiction and absurdity. Have we not, from time to time, retained the same laws and customs, without variation? Though Jerusalem has shared the fate of other cities, and repeatedly fallen into the hands of enemies, as Theos, Pompey the Great, Licinius Crassus, and at last Titus Cæsar, and our temple has been thus taken, yet nothing bearing such resemblance was ever found, nor any thing contrary to rules of the strictest piety.

Antiochus Epiphanes is chargeable with the highest degree of perfidy and sacrilege in pillaging the temple. He did not obtain possession of it as an avowed enemy, but as a pretended friend, and a traitor to his allies. His principle was avarice, which he gratified as a common plunderer. We have, however, the testimonials of many respectable writers, that there was nothing found, upon the rifling, to render the party, or the cause, ludicrous, as was fallaciously represented. Amongst others I may enumerate Polybius, of Magalopolis; Strabo, of Cappadocia; Nicolaus, of Damascus; Timagenes; Castor, the chronologer; and Apollodorus; who all agree that Antiochus, through necessity, violated his league with the Jews, and spoiled their temple of a vast mass of gold and silver. If Apion was not as obdurate and senseless as the animals which the Egyptians worship, he would have taken those circumstances into consideration, and not contended for such palpable fictions. We have not that veneration for our asses which the Egyptians have for their asps and crocodiles, when they esteem such as are stung by the former, or bitten by the latter, happy persons in being translated to the gods. Asses are to us the same as they are to other considerate men, creatures to bear our burdens; but if they spoil our corn, or become refractory, we chastise them with stripes. But this Apion was so frivolous in his inventions, and so defective in his descriptions, that he could never obtain sufficient credit with the world to do us essential injury.

There is another malicious tale which he borrows from the Greeks in order to reproach us. Of this we need only observe, that they are little acquainted with divine subjects, who are not sensible that it is less impious to pass through temples, than to cast aspersions upon those that minister in sacred things. But it was evidently their design to palliate the sacrilege and perfidy of a prince, by imputing his actions to necessity, rather than do justice to truth, to our nation, and our temple.

Apion writes that "Antiochus found, upon entering the temple, a man lying upon a bed, with a table before him, set out with all the delicacies that either sea or land could afford. This man was so surprized at the encounter, that looking upon Antiochus as his good angel, and one that came to rescue him, he threw himself at his feet, and, in a posture of adoration, implored his assistance. The king bade him speak freely, tell him who he was, what he did there, and finally what was the meaning of the table's being thus set out. The man, upon this, burst into tears, and proceeded to answer: I am a Greek, and, wandering up and down in quest of the means of subsistence, was taken up by some foreigners, brought to this place, and shut up, with positive orders not to suffer mortal to approach me. I was pleased, at first, with entertainment so unexpected; but suspicion arising in process of time, I enquired of my keepers into the cause of this extraordinary treatment. They gave me to understand, that the Jews had a custom among them, once a year, upon a certain day prefixed, to seize upon a Grecian stranger, and when they had kept him fattening one whole year, to take him into a wood, and offer him up for a sacrifice according to their own form, taking a taste of his blood, with an horrid oath to live and die sworn enemies to the Greeks, after which they cast the remainder of the miserable carcase into a ditch. The man added, that his time was nearly expired, and adjured him, by the veneration he had for the Grecian gods, to deliver him from the fate he apprehended at the hands of the Jews."

This tragical invention was carried to the highest pitch of extravagance, but not so far as to exempt Antiochus from the imputation of perfidy and sacrilege, as those who endeavour to vindicate him would insinuate. For it was not on account of the Greek that that he entered the temple, but he found him there without any foreknowledge of the matter, so that the iniquity of his design is manifest, nor can it be justified upon any principle of equity or reason. Now the difference is much greater betwixt our laws and those of the Egyptians, and several other nations, than betwixt us and the Greeks. Where is the country through which, in the course of time, people of all religions do not pass? And how comes it to pass that this fantastical barbarity should be exercised only upon the Greeks? How is it possible that all the Jews should join in these sacrifices, and that the entrails of one man should suffice for so many thousands to taste? How comes it that we have not the name of this persecuted Greek, and that Antiochus did not send him back in state to his own country, which would have given him the reputation of a patriotic prince, and formed a powerful party against the Jews?

But as the vulgar and superficial part of mankind are not to be wrought upon by argument, I shall have recourse to the demonstrative evidence of fact. No man ever saw our temple, but can witness that it was so constructed as to preserve every thing in purity and perfection. It had four partitions, encompassed with cloisters. The first division was open to all, even foreigners, without reserve; Jews and their wives (if clean and purified) were admitted into the second; and male Jews, purified in like manner, into the third. The fourth was only for the priests in their sacerdotal habits; and none but the high-priest, in the robes peculiar to his dignity, was to enter the holy sanctuary. Nay, so strict and punctual are they in their adherence to form and decorum, that the very priests themselves could not have admittance but at certain hours.

Upon opening the temple in the morning, the priests, who were to officiate, attended, and so at noon, upon shutting it up. There were in the temple an altar, a table, a censer, and a candlestick, according to the direction of the law; nor was it legal to carry any other vessel into it. There was no fasting, nor any mysteries carried on, but in the face of the whole congregation; and such method was observed, that, though there were four tribes of priests, and in every tribe upwards of five thousand persons, they took their turns of attendance upon certain set days, and that in due regular succession. Meeting about noon all together in the temple, they delivered up their respective trusts one to another; some discharging themselves of the keys, others of the vessels; without any thing relating to food or drink being carried into that sacred place: for it is not lawful to offer any thing upon our altars, but what is provided for sacrifice. But what avails bare dogmatical assertions, without considering whether it be founded on truths or not? What can reflect greater disgrace upon any man that sets up for an historian or a lover of letters? Besides, it is farther observable, that, while Apion puts forth his invectives against us without any foundation, on the one hand, he suppresses known facts on the other. The fancy of his Greek prisoner, his luxurious entertainment, and the people passing through the temple as a thoroughfare, are evidently the contrivance of malice propense, to seduce those who will not be at the pains of investigating truth.

Apion, led by a vein of fiction, enumerates fable upon fable, to render us, if possible, more and more odious; and his inventive faculty suggested the following story: "While the Jews and Idumæans were engaged in a long and obstinate war, there came a man over to the Jews, out of some city of Idumæa, where they worshipped Apollo. This man, whose name was Zabidus, promised to put Apollo, the god of Dora, into their hands, if they could but get the Jews to gather all together into the temple in a body. Zabidus, upon this, contrived a certain machine of boards, and conveying himself into it, set three rows of lights upon it, which appeared, at a distance, like a comet on the ground. This appearance so surprized the Jews, that they gazed at it afar off, without speaking a word. Zabidus, in the mean time, slipped

"into the temple, and, without any difficulty, seized the al's golden head, and carried it away to Dora." This ridiculous fiction proves the author more stupid than the animal; for he writes of places that exist only in his imagination; nor does he know where Idumæa lies, or that there is any such city in it as Dora. There is, indeed, a place of that name in Phœnicia, not far from mount Carmel, but this is four days journey from Judæa.

He is to be justified in condemning us for not worshipping the gods of other nations, if, as he says, our forefathers were so credulous as to believe that Apollo would come to them in the form of a comet. It was rather extraordinary that the Jews should not know a lamp, or a torch, when they saw it, from a star, when they had so many at their festivals. And it was little less miraculous that Zabidus should get clear off, with the al's head, through so many thousands of people, and that there should be no guards to stop his progress, even in a time of war.

The very circumstances of the tale prove its fallacy. How the temple gates, sixty cubits in height, and twenty in breadth, plated over, and no fewer than two hundred men required to shut them every day, could be managed by one single man, is submitted to the determination of common sense. It remains, upon the whole, a question whether Zabidus brought the head back again, or gave it to Apion to be laid in the temple, that Antiochus, finding it, might give rise to another story.

Apion is equally false respecting the oath, when he declares that the Jews do solemnly swear by the maker of heaven, earth, and the seas, to bear no good-will to any foreigners, and more especially to the Greeks. If this falsifier had said to none of the Egyptians, he would have been more consistent with himself; at least if our predecessors were driven out of Egypt not for their ill-conduct, but the calamities under which they laboured. The Greeks and Jews were so remote in point of situation, that there was not the least colour for envy or jealousy betwixt them. On the contrary, many of them came over to our religion: some persisted in it, others receded from it; but, for this pretended oath, no man ever heard it; nor was it any thing more or less than a project of Apion.

This fabulist adduces, as an argument against the justice of our laws, our manner of worship, and the truth of our holy religion, that we are under the burden of servitude and oppression; and that our city, free and powerful as it might have been, is no better than tributary to the Romans. But where are the people now that are able to contend with them? Who but Apion would reason in this absurd manner? Government and subjection succeed by turns. The Egyptians are the only nation that pretend to an immunity from all services to any of the monarchs of Asia and Europe, which they ground on the strange gods having fled into their country, and secured themselves by being changed into the shapes of wild beasts. Whereas these Egyptians are the very people that appear to have never, in all past ages, enjoyed one day of freedom, either at home or abroad. But I will not reproach them, by relating the manner in which the Persians used them, not once, but many times, when they laid their cities waste, demolished their temples, destroyed their idol deities, and vilified their worship: for it is not seemly to imitate the example of Apion, who turned into censure the misfortunes of the Athenians and the Macedonians; though there never was a braver people than the latter, or a people of more exemplary piety than the former. Yet neither the piety of the one, or the courage of the other, was sufficient to secure them against the chances of war, and the common fate of states and kingdoms.

When we reflect on the miserable disasters that have attended the best of kings, and particularly Croesus, the laying of the tower of Athens, the temples at Ephesus and Delphi, and several other magnificent buildings in ashes, the disgrace in such instances rests not in the sufferers, but the actors of these these tragical devastations. But our accuser Apion has discovered a new mode of crimination, forgetful of the miseries of his own people the Egyptians. He seems to have been blinded by Sesostris, once celebrated king of Egypt.

The Romans are partial to
the Jews.

We will not boast of our kings David and Solomon, though many nations were conquered by their victorious arms, but rather confine ourselves to the case in point. Were not the Egyptians at first slaves to the Persians, with other princes of Asia, and so to the Macedonians, when they were lords of Asia, while we lived in a state of freedom, with the command of all the neighbouring cities, for the space of an hundred and twenty years, that is to say, to the time of Pompey the Great? At length, when the Romans had conquered all the other kings with whom they had to do, our ancestors were the only people they treated as friends and allies, on account of their fidelity and valour. Apion, however, affects ignorance of these facts, though they are obvious to all the world besides.

The calumnies of Apion exposed.

We are further traduced, by this malevolent writer, for an obscure, ignorant people. The Jews, he affirms, have amongst them no eminent men for their knowledge of the arts and sciences, or of politics, or the government of states, such as Socrates, Zeno, Cleanthes, and the like. He does not forget to insert himself in the list of celebrated persons, but pronounces Alexandria happy in the honour of having Apion for a citizen. He was the properest man to be his own eulogist, as other people maintained a despicable opinion of him, from the general depravity of his manners; so that Alexandria is rather to be pitied than envied, for valuing itself upon such a supporter. As to the point in competition between the two nations, which should have the preference for men of learning and abilities, the reader is referred to our antiquities for his satisfaction. As to the other part of the scandal that remains unanswered, we cannot do better than refer him to his own contradictions, wherein he accuses himself and other Egyptians.

He seems to take great offence at our sacrificing ordinary beasts, the scruple we make of eating swine's flesh, and turns the ceremony of circumcision into absolute mockery. As for the slaughter of tame animals for sacrifice, we do it in common with all other men; and as to our sacrifices, he discovers himself, before he is aware, to be an Egyptian in speaking against them; for a Greek, or a Macedonian, that makes profession of offering whole hecatombs to their gods without any difficulty, would never have discovered aversion to this practice. They also make use of these sacrifices for feasting, without any danger of destroying the species of those animals, as Apion seems to apprehend. But if mankind in general followed the Egyptians, the world would want men, and swarm with the wildest of the brute creation, which are the objects of their adoration.

Precepts of the Egyptian priests.

If the question was put to Apion, what class of the Egyptians he esteems as the most wise and pious men, his answer would undoubtedly be the priests; for they have these two precepts transmitted down to them from their first kings, to worship the gods, and to apply themselves to the study of wisdom. This they profess to do; they are all circumcised, abstain from swine's flesh, and join with no other class of Egyptians in their sacrifices. Apion therefore deviates from his purpose, when, instead of gratifying the Egyptians with invectives against us, he advances a direct accusation against those he pretended to favour, in charging them with the same ceremonies for which he blames others; and likewise advising and encouraging circumcision in others, as we have it upon the credit of Herodotus. It seems that Apion was justly punished for casting such reproaches on the laws of his country; for it so fell out, that, through the prevalence of a disease, he was under a necessity of being circumcised. The wound putrifying, a cancer ensued, which carried him off in great torment. This should serve as a warning to those, who, regardless of the duties both of religious and social life, prostitute their time and talents to the base purposes of envy and detraction. This was the case of Apion; he apostatized from the laws of his own country, and misrepresented those of ours: and thus concludes our discourse concerning him.

But since Apollonius Molon, Lyfimachus, and several others, have cast dishonourable reflections on Moses, our excellent legislator, aspersing and vilifying his character as an impostor and magician, and representing his laws as injurious to society, partly through ignorance, but chiefly through enmity to our nation, I shall endeavour, with all possible brevity and precision, to treat on the constitution of our government, and its several particular branches. I apprehend it will thence be rendered evident, that there never was such a code of laws framed, for the common good of mankind, as those of Moses; for the advancement of piety, justice, charity, industry, the regulation of society, patience, and perseverance in well doing to the very contempt of death itself. I have therefore only to request the candour and impartiality of the reader, as I solemnly declare my design is not to write an encomium upon our nation, but to assert the cause of truth and justice, against the efforts of calumny and detraction.

Apollonius does not vent his spleen like Apion, in a continued succession of accusations, but varies as to time and mode of aspersing us. At one time he reproaches us as Atheists and Misanthropes, at another he upbraids us as cowards, at another he charges us with temerity and fool-hardiness, and represents us as ignorant and savage as the wildest barbarians, declaring that the Jews never invented any thing for the benefit or improvement of mankind. To confute these malevolent suggestions, it will be necessary to examine the constitution of our laws, and the conformity of our lives to those precepts. If, in the course of this undertaking, I should be compelled to make mention of the laws and policy of other nations, it is to be imputed to those who have provoked us to an opprobrious comparison, and rendered the reproach we cast upon them necessary to our own defence.

There are in the case under present consideration two essential points: First, the tendency of our laws; and secondly, the degree in which we observe them. To such as deny the former, we are ready to produce an abstract of those laws; those who call in question the latter, will be referred to demonstrative evidence.

It is an incontrovertible maxim, that the first founders of laws for the establishment of discipline and good order in society, are to be preferred to those who live without any form or method at all; for they appeal to antiquity, and deem it a greater honour to teach others what they ought to do, than barely to imitate what they see done before them. This position being admitted, the excellency of a legislator is apparent from his providing such laws as may tend to promote the interest of the community, from a conviction that they are as reasonable as beneficial, so that the people firmly adhere to the observance of them, both in a prosperous and adverse state.

The antiquity of our legislator gives him an undoubted right to precedence; for Lycurgus, Solon, and Faleucus, of Locris, with the rest of the lawgivers held in such esteem amongst the Greeks, seem but of yesterday, when compared with Moses. The very name of law was not yet so much as heard of; and Homer is witness to the truth of this observation, for that term cannot be found throughout his poems. The people in those days were not governed by written precepts, but by the absolute will and pleasure of kings; and so it continued for a long time by authoritative orders and provisions, occasionally made and issued. Our legislator, having this claim of priority admitted by his very enemies, acquitted himself to general admiration, in all the offices of administration and council: first, in composing such a body of laws as might affect all the contingencies of human life, and afterwards in obtaining

gaining ■ most cordial reception of them by the people, and their solemn declaration of obeying and maintaining them. But let his works speak for him.

Moses an excellent general, and a wise counsellor.

When our forefathers, to the number of many thousands, marched out of the land of Egypt, into the country appointed for them by Divine Providence, through a barren sandy desert, without water, and had several encounters with the enemy by the way, in defence of themselves, their wives, and children, they were guided through these almost insuperable difficulties by our vigilant legislator, who maintained the character of a valiant general, a prudent counsellor, and a common protector. He was a man of such exemplary moderation, that, though he held the people in implicit obedience to his injunctions, he never availed himself of his authority to promote his private advantage; but, on the contrary, where other men tyrannized, and indulged a general licentiousness, he observed the rules of piety and virtue, and, by his example, encouraged the multitude to such a conduct as proved their best security against all accidents.

Origin of the Grecian laws.

Moses looked up to the only All-wise Being as oracle and guide; and being persuaded that he could not err, so long as he committed himself to the care of Divine Providence, thought it his duty to imprint that belief on the minds of the multitude; for nothing so effectually checks us in the progress of vice as a due consciousness of the Divine Omnipotence. From this character of our legislator, it is evident that he was not a seducer or a magician, as he is falsely represented; but such a one as Minos, and others after him, were reputed among the Greeks; some ascribing the origin of their laws to Jupiter, others to Apollo, or the oracle at Delphi. But whether these men thought they were thus derived, or were desirous of imposing such a belief in the people, I pretend not to determine. But the origin and excellency of these laws will best appear by placing them in a comparative point of view, which is the next thing to which we shall attend.

Moses describes the Divine Being and his attributes.

Several nations have their several forms of government, and their diversities of laws. Some governments are committed to a single person, others to the people. Our legislator had no regard to any of these forms, but ordained a government, that, by a strained expression, may be termed a Theocracy, or Holy Commonwealth, in ascribing all authority and power to God, and persuading the people to regard him as the author of all the good things that were enjoyed either in common by all mankind, or by each individual in particular. To him he directs us to fly for succour in our distresses, as he hears our prayers, and searches into the very secrets of our hearts. He inculcates the doctrines of one God, the uncreated, immutable, and eternal Being, infinitely glorious, and incomprehensible one, further than what we know of him by his works.

Opinions of the Grecian philosophers.

This is what may be derived, in some measure, from the wisest of the Greek philosophers, who, from the light of nature, unanimously agree on the congruity of these principles to the majesty and excellence of God; as for instance, Pythagoras, Anaxagoras, and Plato; and the stoics, that succeeded them, were of the same sentiments, and had the same notions of the nature of the Divine Being. But the multitude being actuated by a violent and superstitious prejudice against these opinions, the philosopher durst not venture too far in promoting them.

Differences between Moses and the law-givers.

But our legislator was the only man that lived as he taught, both to the satisfaction of the present age, and to the establishing and confirming posterity in the truths which he delivered, governing himself by this constant rule, to make the public good the grand end of all his laws. He pointed out, that the worship of the Divine Being was but the one part of a good man's duty; annexing to it the other parts, such as resignation, temperance, justice, and a constant interchange of good offices towards mankind; inasmuch that all his precepts and ordinances tended to the advancement of piety, and of course to the honour and glory of God; this being the main object he had in view.

There are two ways of attaining to a degree of excellence in religion and morality; the one is by instruction in words, the other by practical exercises. Now law-givers, in general, commonly attended to one part, and neglected the other. As for example, the people of Lacedæmon and Crete taught by practical exercises, without rule and precept; while the Athenians, and most of the Greeks, had prescribed laws for every thing, though they fell short in the practice.

Two methods of instruction.

But our legislator wisely connected these two methods of instruction; for he neither left these practical exercises to go on without verbal instruction, nor did he permit the hearing of the law to proceed without the exercises for practice. He begins with the subject of meats and diet, what we may be allowed to eat, and what not, and with whom, and enjoins all people in general to the observance of that method and order. He takes the same care with respect to regulation in matters of labour and rest, to the end that no man may be ignorant of his duty; for what the law enjoins us is the dictate and command of our master, and it punishes only wilful offenders. To leave us wholly without excuse, in case of transgressing any of these sacred laws, we hear them read over, (once, twice, or oftener, perhaps;) but are positively commanded (all other work or business apart) to meet constantly once a week in full congregation, expressly to attend the reading of the law, and learning it exactly, which was never practised by any other law-giver. Indeed, the greatest part of mankind are so far from living in conformity to their own laws, that they do not so much as understand what they are, but, in committing a fault, they enquire of others what law they have violated. This is the case even amongst men of the first rank, who are not ashamed tacitly to confess their ignorance in taking men learned in the law to their counsel and assistance: but our people are as well acquainted with their laws as their own names, having been trained up in them from earliest infancy, till they are imprinted in their minds: our transgressions therefore are but few, and those who do offend cannot possibly escape punishment.

The Jews frequently had the law read to them.

This is the foundation of that admirable agreement of mind which prevails amongst us. We have all of us the same notions concerning the Divine Being, the same forms of discipline and worship, the same way of life, and the same rule of manners. It is not with us as with others, who entertain various opinions concerning one and the same God; and this is the case not only with the common people, but the very philosophers themselves. Some of them have denied many of his attributes, others his superintending providence, upon an impious suggestion that all men are equal, and that all things are in common. We affirm, on the contrary, that God sees and disposes all things. Nay, our wives, children, and servants, are all instructed, that our actions, in general, should be directed to the honour and service of God.

The unanimity of the Jews.

Piety the end of human life.

This has given rise to a reflection upon our nation, as having produced no men eminent for polite literature, as we continually pursue the same dull, plodding path; whereas men of genius and speculation value themselves upon improvement and innovation. While others think it meritorious to deviate from every thing delivered down by their forefathers, we, on the contrary, deem it the greatest instance of wisdom and virtue, to admit of no actions or principles that are repugnant to our original laws: antiquity, with us, is the infallible mark of a good and well founded statute, which neither time or argument will ever be able to destroy. Besides, as we firmly believe those laws to be of Divine institution, we have only to preserve them sacred and inviolate. Who shall dare to offer at the removal of those foundations which have been laid by the hand of the Almighty? Who can amend so Divine a system, by transferring the most beneficial provisions, from the best of other governments, to the code of

The immutability of the Jewish laws.

of his commonwealth? Can any constitution be more firm or just than that of which the King of kings is king?

Qualifications for the priesthood.

As for the priests, they are qualified, in common, for several special services; and the high-priest is vested with power and superiority above all the rest. They are not promoted, by the legislator, to that dignity for ambition, wealth, or any corrupt influence, but for the signal testimony they have given of their piety, temperance, and wisdom; and to them is committed the care of religion, and the peculiar functions of divine worship. They serve also as judges in controversies betwixt man and man, and have a power to punish those who are guilty of misdemeanors.

What form of government can be more sacred and venerable than this? Or what greater honour can we do the Almighty, than to spend our lives in daily attendance upon his service, and under the inspection of priests who see that all things are performed with due order and reverence? We seem to celebrate a perpetual festival; and whereas foreigners discover a lassitude, in a few days attendance on their mysteries, we are as firm, chearful, and vigorous, in the discharge of our religious duties at this time, as we were many ages since, upon their first institution.

The Jews opinion of God.

Among other known precepts of our religion we are taught, in the first place, that God is all in all, perfect, self-sufficient, and supplying all other beings; the beginning, middle, and end of all things. He is glorious in all his works, and tremendous in his power and greatness; but, at the same time, so incomprehensible, that it is not for the tongue of man to express, nor the heart to conceive, any resemblance of the Divine Majesty. He is, in fine, incomparable in all his excellencies and attributes, infinitely beyond art and imitation; so that it is impossible to see or imagine any thing like him; for, being a Spirit, he is invisible.

But we are allowed to read the great Invisible Being in his works; as in the light, the heavens, the earth, the sun, the moon, the stars, the rivers, the sea, several sorts of animals, and various kinds of plants. These things hath the Creator formed, not with hands, not by labour, nor as wanting the assistance of any to co-operate with him. But as it was his Divine will they should be made, and be made good also, they were made, and became good immediately. This is the Almighty Sovereign whom we are all bound to love and adore in the study and exercise of virtue, which is the only way to please him.

One God, one world, and one temple.

As there is but one God, and one world in common to all mankind, it holds the analogy, that there should be but one temple; for likeness is the constant foundation of agreement. This temple ought to be common to all men, because he is the common God of all men.

Office and authority of priests.

His priests are to be continually about his worship, over whom the senior is to be perpetual ruler. His business is to offer sacrifices to God, assisted by those who are joined with him; to see that the laws are observed; to determine controversies; and to punish those who are convicted of injustice. Such as do not submit to him, shall be subject to the same punishment as if he had been guilty of the greatest impiety.

Abstract of the laws of Moses.

In eating what has been offered in sacrifice, we must avoid extending the liberty to a degree of gluttony and excess; for that Being, who delights in sobriety and temperance, can never be pleased with luxury and profusion.

The priest begins his office with prayers for the general good of mankind, and after that to every man for himself, as a part of the whole; being well assured, that nothing is more acceptable in the sight of God, than mutual charity, tenderness, and forbearance among mankind.

When we offer up our prayers to Almighty God, we are not to petition for wealth, honour, and the good things of this world, for these are blessings which he is pleased to bestow in common upon mankind; but our prayers must be for grace to make a right use of what we have.

The law hath prescribed us certain formal purifications, under kinds of limitations and restrictions, too many and too tedious to be enumerated and specified. This is the doctrine concerning God and his worship, and what the law enjoins for our attention and practice.

In point of marriage, the law approves no other junction of the sexes than that upon such principles which nature hath appointed; not from regard to interest, or the gratification of inordinate passions, but for the procreation of children, and that with the consent of parents. The very attempt of an unnatural crime is punished with death.

The law further ordains, that the woman shall be subject, in all things, to her husband, which must not be taken for a dispensation to abuse her, but a provision for the maintenance of decency and good order; for God hath given the authority to the husband. The woman is to have no carnal knowledge of any other man, upon pain of death without mercy; and he that abuses a betrothed virgin incurs the same penalty. It is the same also in case of corrupting a married woman, or a mother of children. Our law is no less severe upon those women who either conceal their children when they are brought into the world, or otherwise destroy them. Purification is to be used after intercourse of the sexes; for which purpose water is to be provided for the preservation of a becoming decency and cleanliness.

The law does not permit us to make sumptuous festivals at the births of our children, and thereby afford opportunity of drinking to excess, but ordains that the earliest period of our education should be directed to the purposes of sobriety. We are also enjoined to bring up our children to a general knowledge of things, but more especially of law and history; the one to furnish them with a perfect acquaintance with their duty to God and man, and the other with great examples, to incite them to the imitation of noble actions.

Care has also been taken of the decent burial of the dead, but without extravagant pomp in funeral solemnities, or sumptuous monuments. The law ordains that the nearest relatives should perform the obsequies; and that those who pass by when any one is conveying to the place of interment, should attend the funeral, and join the lamentation. It also ordains that the house, and its inhabitants, should be purified after the funeral is over. Every one is directed not to deceive themselves with the imagination of being excused by purification, if he hath been once guilty of murder.

We are enjoined reverence to parents next to God himself; and the law appoints ungrateful and disobedient children to be stoned to death. The younger are commanded to pay respect to their elders, as God was before all things. Secrecy among friends is prohibited, as friendship implies an entire confidence without any reserve. Nay, where friendship is dissolved, we must not be false to a former trust.

The judge who takes a bribe is to be punished with death, for countenancing the guilty, and oppressing the innocent. He that disregards the petition of an indigent person, when he is able to relieve him, is held guilty. No one is to touch the property of another. He that lends money must not demand usury. These, and many others of the like kind, are the rules by which we are united in the bonds of society one with another.

It may be worthy of our pains to enquire into the equity our legislator would have us exercise in our intercourse with strangers; whence it will appear, that he hath not been wanting in any thing that can tend to the public good, either by keeping us firm to our laws, or communicating the benefit of them to others, who may be disposed to cultivate a knowledge of them. He receives, with open arms, all who come over to us, of every nation indifferently, provided they agree in the same common principles of life and manners. Those who come by accident, and without intent to join us, are not suffered to intermix with us in our solemnities. But we are obliged to render them our best offices in many instances: as for example, if they should want water, fire, wood, or the like, we are commanded to supply them; to set any of them right who are out of their way; and to give the dead a decent burial. These are duties of humanity, and abstracted from the peculiar laws of our religion.

He prescribes rules of moderation to be observed towards enemies, to prevent the dreadful extremities of fire and sword. His charity extends to the easing of prisoners, and especially women; nor would he suffer dead bodies, that fell in battle, to be stripped.

Such was his regard for the cultivation of tender principles among men, that he recommended them even to beasts, in allowing us no other power over them than for lawful and necessary uses. Domestic creatures, brought up tame in our houses, are to be spared; nor, in other cases, are the dams and the young to be destroyed together. Beasts of labour and common use, are likewise to be forborne, though in some respects mischievous.

Thus hath our admirable law-giver contrived, by every means, to teach us an equitable conduct, by such statutes as forcibly tend to that excellent purpose; while, at the same time, he hath ordained that transgressors shall be punished with the utmost rigour. In capital offences the punishment is no less than death: for instance, in murder, adultery, rapes, and unnatural practices: nor are any conditions, bond or free, exempt from the penalty.

We have our laws concerning weights and measures, and all sorts of frauds in buying and selling, taking away another man's goods, or appropriating to ourselves what is not our own. Offenders of this kind are punished with much more severity under our laws than those of other nations.

Blasphemy, or any act of indignity towards the Majesty of heaven, together with contumacious behaviour towards parents, incur the penalty of immediate death upon the very spot where committed. But the reward of conforming to these laws is not gold, silver, imperial crowns, or precious stones, but the testimony of a good conscience, with the assurance of future bliss, founded not only on the prediction of the legislator, but the promise of infallible truth. In this confidence, therefore, they look upon death only as the blessed means of transporting them from this life to a better. This is evident from many occurrences in the history of our ancestors, particularly the resolution with which they have undergone the most excruciating tortures, rather than let fall one word to the dishonour of their profession. Supposing now the Jews were a people never heard of upon the face of the earth, and there were no witnesses to the veneration we have constantly paid to our laws, what opinion would the Jews form, if an account was related to them of a people, in some imaginary unknown land, who had stood firm so many ages to the religion, laws, and customs of their predecessors? Would they not deem it matter of admiration, especially those that are so fickle and changeable themselves?

Modern writers, on the subject of political government, are much censured, for having advanced many absurd and improbable stories. Plato himself, the very oracle of the Greeks, and a man in singular esteem for his piety, wisdom, and virtue, as well as the excellency of his philosophy, is exposed to contempt and ridicule by arrogant pretenders, for his wild notions of government, as they term them; while those who peruse his writings with attention and candour, will find them consonant both with reason and nature. Plato himself ingenuously confesses, that "it is not safe for a wise man to publish his notions concerning the Deity amongst the ignorant multitude." Yet some affirm that Plato writes like a man of vanity and licence.

Lycurgus was a man eminent as a finished legislator; and the Spartans were commended for having continued in the firm observance of his laws for a long space of time. From thence it is inferred, that it is confessedly a mark of virtue to submit to laws. But then let those who admire and applaud this constancy in the Spartans remember, that their continuance in point of duration bears no comparison to that of ours. Let them also remember, that, though the Spartans maintained exact obedience to their laws while they enjoyed their liberty, yet, when fortune abandoned them, they fell off, and abandoned their laws.

But it cannot be said of us, that, under all the vicissitudes of fortune which happened to us in Asia, where we were driven to the last extremity, we ever departed from the laws and customs of our forefathers. Nor can it be objected to us, that we ever consulted either our ease or our pleasure when called upon to maintain them. Whoever compares the conditions of both parties, will find the labour and difficulties of the Jews far exceed those of the Spartans; for they were exposed to no servile offices, but lived in their city at ease, in the enjoyment of repose and plenty. Notwithstanding these advantages, they went over to their enemies in frequent desertions, and, contrary to law, duty, and the common obligations of citizens and soldiers, tamely delivered themselves up with their arms. I cannot recollect more than one or two of our people that ever betrayed their cause through fear of death. I mean not the death of a soldier sword in hand, and in the field of battle, but a death of exquisite cruelty and torment, a calamity to which many of our nation have been exposed; not, I apprehend, through hatred, but to try the experiment of so heroic a constancy; and to try if there were such men in the world, as would endure the acutest pains, rather than be guilty of any one word or action derogatory to the dignity of their laws.

Nor in this resolution in the Jews above all other nations matter of surprize; for our ordinary mode of living would be a kind of severity to any other sort of people; I mean with respect to the fatigue of labour, hard fare, days of abstinence, coarse cloathing, hard lodging, and the like. These people, in the successes of a military life, would not brook the forbearance of meats prohibited, and many others of the severest restrictions. Whereas it is our glory to resign ourselves, with unchangeable constancy, to the obedience of the laws of our country. Let the partizans of Lyfimachus and Molon, and other frivolous censurers and perverters of youthful minds, persist in their reproach and detraction, while we are conscious of discharging our duty to God, our country, and ourselves.

It is our custom to keep firm in the observance of our own laws, but not to traduce those of others. Nay our legislator hath expressly forbidden us to offer the least indignity or contempt to the reputed gods of other nations, and this he did from a reverence to the very name of a Deity. But we cannot remain altogether silent, where it is both so easy and necessary to confute the assertions of our opponents, and where, in truth, the work is done by other authorities ready to our hands. The most admired among the Greeks for wisdom, have heartily exclaimed against the most celebrated of their poets, and especially their law-givers, for poisoning the minds of the common people with the impious doctrine of plurality of gods, advancing the account to what number they thought fit, and deriving their origin from what age and country they please. Nay, they allot them their proper stations and places like other creatures; for they have their subterraneous gods, and their maritime gods; and the eldest of the race, or family, they keep up in chains in the infernal regions. With respect to their celestial gods, they give Jupiter the name of Father; but represent him, in action, action, ■ a tyrant; infomuch that his wife, his brother, and the daughter of his own brain, entered into a conspiracy, according to the fiction, to destroy him, as he himself had served his father.

This was the light in which all wise men held those fabulous deities; the idea being so ludicrous, that they could not entertain it without scorn and derision. Some of their gods they represented as itriplings, others in the prime of their youth and strength, and others as seniors, with long beards. They have their gods, or patrons, of mechanical arts or trades, as smiths, weavers, harpers, archers, and so on. They have their feuds and factions among themselves, and take part with mortals against one another. They receive wounds in the contest, grieve and pine away under the anguish of them. Nay, these pretended gods and goddesses go farther still, even to the horrid licence of amours and embraces, indifferently with men and women. What was the case of their Jupiter himself, the father and prince of the whole train of gods? After seducing many goddesses, he suffers them to be kept in prison, or drowned in the sea. He is himself so bound by fate, that he cannot save his own offspring, nor can he bear their deaths without shedding tears.

What a train of lewd practices, and worse consequences, in probability yet remained. Open violation of the laws of decency not only committed but applauded by the gods! If their sovereign, Jupiter himself, could not resist the wiles of an harlot, what are we to expect from the passions and weaknesses of inferior deities? What shall we say, again, of gods assuming the forms of shepherds and masons, and being made close prisoners in the infernal regions? Can any man, endowed with common reason, but reprobate the inventors, the encouragers, and believers of these blasphemous stories? In some cases they make gods of their passions, as fear, madness, and the like, and then worship them in the worst of forms; so that there can be nothing so scandalous amongst men, but it may be introduced in the character of one of their gods; nor is it sufficient to deter the people from sacrificing to the better sort of these monsters. They look upon their gods as the authors of good and evil, and consequently as their friends or their enemies, in proportion to the one or the other. Upon this consideration they deal with their deities as with the wildest of men, they worship and make them presents for fear they should do them injury.

The ground of the errors concerning the gods.

But it deserves our enquiry how mankind came to lay under so many desperate and dangerous mistakes concerning the Deity. I suppose it to have been derived from the imperfect knowledge the heathen legislators had, from the beginning, of the Divine nature; or else from the want of communicating to the world the notions they had of things, ■ matters of little moment, perhaps, in their opinion, and so suffered the poets and orators to introduce their own gods, and by this means confounded their system of politics with idle tales of uncouth deities, and strange worship.

Painters and statuaries form deities.

The statuaries and painters of Greece contributed in ■ great measure to this abuse, by the liberty they took of representing their gods in what shape and figure the artist thought meet. They had their variety in point of matter as well as form; some working in plaister, others in gold and ivory; some in sculpture, and others in colours ■ and the last piece, for the sake of novelty, was reputed the best. As the old gods fell off, and went out of fashion, they were insensibly succeeded by new; and, upon the failure of one religion, another started up. It was so with temples, ■ one was laid in rubbish, another was raised out of the ruins of it, according to the fancy of the age; whereas the true worship of the Almighty ought to be as unchangeable as his own nature.

Apollonius Molon was puerile, weak, and superficial in his understanding; but those among the Greeks, who deserve the name of philosophers, ■

no strangers to the truth of what I have delivered, and entertain the same exalted ideas of the Deity ^{The Greeks} that we do, and with as hearty ■ contempt of the ^{the same} absurd fables of their countrymen. Whence it was ^{the same} that Plato would suffer ■ poets in his common- ^{for a Deity} wealth; nay, he dismissed even Homer himself, tho' ^{with the} with all the honours of a poet laureat, lest fables ^{Jews.} should destroy right notions of the Deity.

This great man of all others comes nearest to the example of Moses, in the model of his common- ^{Plato fol-} wealth, where he charged all his subjects to study ^{lows the} their laws, get them by heart, and not intermix with ^{example of} strangers; but preserve their government in its original purity, and pay strict obedience to their ordinances and decrees. Apollonius Molon did not consider this, when he preferred his accusation against the Jews, for not joining and communicating with men of different persuasions; as if, in that instance, we were singular; whereas all people (generally speaking) do the same thing; the Greeks themselves, and the most discreet men amongst them too.

The Lacedæmonians would admit no strangers ^{The Lacedæmonians} among them; nor so much as suffer their citizens to ^{admit no} travel abroad, lest they should contract such habits ^{strangers.} as might tend to ■ dissolution of their laws. Perhaps there may be cause to censure this rigid severity, in debarring strangers the common privileges of society and commerce. But so far are we from this uncharitable restriction, that, though we do not interfere with the concerns of others, we are ready to entertain proselytes, and receive those who are disposed to join with us, which must be acknowledged ■ certain indication of humanity.

The Athenians, on the other hand, contrary to the custom of the Lacedæmonians, make it their glory to give admittance to all strangers; but of this I suppose, Apollonius was ignorant. They are so zealous for the honour of their gods, that it was made capital to let fall so much as one irreverent word upon the subject. On what account was Socrates put to death? Not for betraying the commonwealth, or burning their temples; not for treason or sacrilege; but for framing new oaths, by the direction, as he suggested, of a certain demon. Whether ^{Plato fol-} he was in jest or earnest is not known to this day; ^{lows the} but for this he was tried, condemned, and put to ^{example of} death by poison. He was also charged with propa- ^{Jews.} gating false doctrines, and endeavouring to supplant the religion and laws of his country. This was the case of Socrates, ■ citizen of Athens.

As another instance of their rigour, Anaxagoras, the Clazomenian, was put to death, for affirming that the sun, which the Athenians thought to be a god, was a ball of fire. A talent reward was offered by proclamation to any man that would bring in the head of Diagoras, of Melos, for ridiculing the mysteries of their religion. They would have proceeded in like manner with Protagoras, if he had not made his escape in due time. His pretended crime was the writing of ■ tract, wherein he delivered himself ambiguously of the gods of the Athenians. But why should we wonder at their treating men with this severity, when the women themselves were not spared? For instance, they put ■ priestess to death, upon an ■ accusation of worshipping strange gods. It was made death also for any man to introduce ■ foreign religion. What therefore can be more evident, than that, so far ■ these laws were in force, the people could have no faith in other gods. Besides, if they had, they would never have deprived themselves of the comfort and benefit of their favour.

The Scythians themselves, though the most barbarous and brutal people upon the face of the earth, ^{The Scythians} were so scrupulous of preserving the mysteries of ^{their own} their profession, that they slew Anacharsis, a man of ^{and the} eminent parts, only for speaking too reverently of the gods of the Greeks. We read likewise, that many amongst the Persians suffered death upon the same account. Apollonius Molon was attached to the laws and customs of the Persians, and one that held held them in admiration, as well as the Greeks, for their firmness and agreement in the matter of worship, as exemplified in the burning of their temples. Molon had not only a good opinion of their customs, but, in some degree, imitated them in the extravagant liberties he took with other men's wives, and the cruelties he exercised towards their children; barbarities that are declared death by our laws, though committed upon any of the brute creation.

Such is the veneration we have for the observance of these laws, that neither power, profit, fear, or any other consideration, can divert, or deter us from the conscientious discharge of our duty. Nor have we exerted ourselves in military exploits from motives of ambition or avarice, but for the support and maintenance of our lawful rights. We have submitted to every kind of outrage with patience and resignation; but we feel most sensibly for every violation of our laws, and are thereby rendered daring and obstinate to the last degree. What reason can we have for desiring to imitate the customs of other nations, which we see abandoned by their very founders? Why do not the Spartans abandon their inhospitality, as well as their contempt of matrimony? And the people of Elis and Thebes their abominable propensities? The most shameful practices generally prevailed among the Greeks through connivance; and they ascribed to their very gods the gratification of the most criminal passions.

What shall be said of those legislators who have been more assiduous in devising means for the escape of malefactors, than for bringing them to condign punishment, compounding for a fine in cases of adultery, and atoning for debauchery by marriage? It would be endless to recount the temptations to swerve from the rules of piety and virtue, that are thrown out to the unwary by these compositions, even to the total subversion of their laws.

But nothing of this kind is permitted amongst us; for, though we be deprived of our wealth, our cities, and every thing we hold most dear, our laws continue inviolate, and immutably the same. Now if this be our disposition towards our laws, and that from their intrinsic value, let our enemies make this confession, that they are most excellent. If they deny us this requisition, we demand of them wherefore they neglect the observance of their own laws, which they esteem so far superior to ours?

Time is the surest touchstone in all human cases; nor is there a more convincing proof of the goodness of a law than the antiquity of it. We therefore cast our cause upon that issue for the honour of our legislator, and of the laws themselves with regard to God's holy worship. It will be granted us that Moses was the first legislator for many ages, and that as our laws had their origin thence, so they were followed and imitated, more or less, by all other nations. That the generality of the ancient Greeks had, in appearance, their own peculiar laws, I admit; but their philosophers held the same notions of the Deity with us, and inculcated the same doctrines of life and manners.

Such is the reputation we have held in the world for our religion and politics, that there is hardly any nation, either Greek or barbarian, that does not act in some conformity to our example, either in the observance of our seventh day's sabbath, the use of lamps, the celebration of fasts, or abstinence from certain meats; as also in matters of humanity, charitable agreement in society, indefatigable labour and industry, and an invincible constancy in suffering for the truth. In some of these particular instances they severally imitate us.

But the matter of greatest admiration is, that our laws have no baits of pleasure to allure men, but prevail through their own force, and seem to pervade the human mind as the Almighty pervades the universe. Those who look into their own country, or their own families, will bear testimony to my assertion. Can there be any propriety then in the idea of changing our old laws for new ones? If not, let the reproach cease. We are not actuated by a malevolent and envious principle, but a veneration we have for the memory of our prophet, and in full persuasion of his divine authority. If we were not fully convinced of the intrinsic excellence of our laws, the great number of their admirers and professors would be sufficient to give us an high esteem for them. I have treated on this subject more copiously in my Antiquities, and therefore only hint now what is necessary for my present purpose, without any design of depreciating the laws of other nations, or making a panegyric upon those of our own, but solely for the vindication of truth against calumny and injustice.

To draw towards a conclusion: I presume I have sufficiently compleated what I proposed in writing these books; for whereas our accusers have pretended that our nation is of late date, I have demonstrated the antiquity of their origin. I have likewise produced several eminent authorities, that make honourable mention of us in their annals. I have incontrovertibly refuted the assertion, that our ancestors came originally out of Egypt; and, with respect to the fable of our being expelled for epidemic maladies, I have rendered it evident, on the contrary, that they cut their way through troops of their enemies into their own country. There are those who asperse the character of Moses, in opposition to the concurrent testimony of several ages to his immortal honour.

In vindication of our laws, more words are superfluous. Those who read and understand them, must be convinced of the piety and wisdom of their institution. They are declared enemies to iniquity, luxury, and faction; promoters of peace, charity, industry, and justice. They allow of no war founded on ambition or avarice; nor do they approve of returning evil for evil. They inspire valour and resolution in the defence of the dearest rights of mankind. They are vigorous in the punishment of malefactors; and point out that actions, not words, are the standard of merit.

From these premises I may justly conclude, that we have the most perfect law extant. For what can be more excellent than unfeigned piety towards God? What more reasonable than submission to laws? What more beneficial than union in prosperity, and a well cemented friendship in adversity? a dauntless resolution in arduous exploits? a sedulous application to arts and husbandry in times of peace? and finally, a perpetual consciousness of an omni-present, omniscient, and superintending Providence?

If these precepts had been written at first, or more exactly retained by any others before us, we should owe them thanks, as disciples owe their tutors. But if it is evident that we derived them from no foreign origin, and that the institution of them is our own, that, from time to time, we have handed them down, as the precise and invariable rules of our profession and practice, let Apion, Molon, and the whole tribe of calumniators and detractors, stand confuted. I have compleated my design, in dedicating to thee, and others, most excellent Epaphroditus, an authentic history of our nation.

MACCABEES.

I. MACCABEES.

CHAP. I.

AS my design, in this discourse, is to shew that reason is the perfection of wisdom, and ruler of the passions, when duly improved by study and religion, I cannot but exhort my readers to apply themselves, with the utmost assiduity, to the attainment of knowledge, the most important of all acquisitions. Reason is a necessary preliminary to knowledge, in which, if we excel, we may be said to excel in the noblest and most comprehensive of all virtues, which is prudence. It is reason alone that can effectually restrain the inordinate affections of the mind, correct the depravity of nature, and those corrupt inclinations which are opposed to the love and practice of virtue. That branch or degree of it which subdues the passions of anger, fear, and grief, and whatever else enervates the mind, may properly be denominated fortitude.

To this it may perhaps be objected, if reason has this dominion over the passions, or perturbations of the mind, why has it not the same controuling power over ignorance and forgetfulness? This is a frivolous objection, and foreign to the case in point; for when we affirm that reason has a controuling power over the passions, we mean those defects of nature only as are opposite to justice, temperance, and fortitude, all which are of a distinct kind, and belong to the sensitive soul; but not such as are defects peculiar to itself, and appertain to the rational system. Again, in this objection the nature of this sovereignty is misrepresented; for we do not mean that reason entirely removes those affections, but does not so far submit as to suffer itself to be vanquished by them.

That it is in the power of reason to command and subdue the passions, I could demonstrate by a variety of arguments, but shall, at present, confine myself to the most approved and undeniable one, matter of fact. I mean the examples of persons who have signalized themselves in resolutely asserting and dying in defence of truth and virtue, among whom I apprehend none are more conspicuous, or more deservedly admired, than those of our country, Eleazar, and the seven brethren martyred with their mother. These, despising the most exquisite tortures, and persevering even unto death, have incontestibly proved the command of reason over the passions: I mean those of the sensitive kind, as before alluded to. I shall endeavour to give just commendations to these brave men, and their incomparable mother, for their immoveable constancy; and to transmit their names with honour to posterity, for their stedfast adherence to virtue and their duty. These men excited the admiration not only of those who were indifferent spectators, or readers, of their sufferings, but even of their very enemies, and most prejudiced tormentors, who stood amazed at the courage and patience which their own implacable malice exercised after so inhuman and barbarous a manner. Thus they became the means of releasing their nation from oppression, conquering the rage of a tyrant by their sufferings, and becoming a sacrifice of expiation for their country.

The method in which I propose to proceed, will be, first, to make some general remarks on the point in debate, and then attend to this particular instance, giving glory to God, the fountain of wisdom, who hath been pleased to leave such undeniable evidence of this truth in the persons whose virtues I am now about to celebrate.

The question to be resolved is plainly this. Whether reason can controul and govern the passions? In order thereto it will be necessary to explain what is to be understood by reason, what by passion, how many species there are of passions, and whether reason bears sway over them all.

By reason then I understand the intellectual faculty improved and rightly guided by reflection, preferring a life conducted by wisdom and truth. By wisdom I understand the knowledge of divine and human affairs, and the true causes and grounds of of each, such as we attain by the discipline and instruction of the laws, which teaches us to embrace those truths which relate to God with reverence, and those respecting men as things directed to, and designed for, the benefit of mankind. Wisdom may be divided into four particular branches; Prudence, Justice, Fortitude, and Temperance. The noblest and most comprehensive of these is prudence, because reason, through its assistance and influence, attains dominion over the passions.

The passions that are most general are two, pleasure and pain, each of which acts upon the body and soul. In these two passions of pleasure and pain are comprehended many others. Thus, in the instance of pleasure, it is preceded by desire, and followed by joy. In that of pain, it is preceded by fear, and followed by sorrow.

Anger is a mixed passion, between pleasure and pain, of which those must be sensible who minutely observe how they are affected by it. In pleasure is comprehended a bate and wicked affection, which of all the passions is the most dissuasive. In the mind are avarice, envy, and contention; in the body greediness and lordliness. Pleasure and pain, like certain branches growing out of the body, have several scions, which reason, like the common husbandman, by lopping, tying up, watering, transplanting, and ordering, corrects in their nature, and tames their wildness. Reason is the guide of the virtues, and governs of the passions. That this is not affirmed without ground, is evident from the mighty effect it has in matters where the virtue of temperance is obstructed. Temperance restrains the desires; some of which belong to the soul, others to the body; both of which are under the government of reason. When our appetites incline to such fish, fowl, or other delicious foods as are forbidden by our laws, and we abstain from them upon that very account, this is a demonstrative proof of the dominion of reason over the passions. For the impulse of the appetite, by the assistance of reason, is restrained, and all the motions of the body are bridled by its coercive power.

CHAP. II.

BUT this is a matter of small weight when compared with the more stimulating desires of the mind, especially those that are excited by beauty. Joseph acquired immortal renown for conquering his passion by the standard of reason and sound reflection, though in the bloom of years, and urged by the united impulse of beauty and importunity. It is not the mere allaying the fury of vehement pursuits after pleasure, and abstaining from the impure act, that reason can or ought to do, since it is plain our very inclinations are under its jurisdiction; otherwise the law would have been most absurd in laying upon us a command so impracticable as that, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife, nor any thing that is thy neighbour's." Now it is evident that when the law forbids us to covet at all, it more strongly implies that reason is able to curb and conquer our desires. And thus it is not only in those things which are opposite to the virtues of temperance, but justice also. Otherwise what remedy could there be for reforming the luxurious, avaricious, or fordid man? When a man, of a covetous disposition, is prevailed upon to conform to the precepts of our law, he restrains his desires, lends to the poor without taking usury, and remits the debt at the year of jubilee; and though he be ever so frugal, yet he is obliged, by this law, neither to gather in the fruits of his field or his vineyard in the sabbatic year.

Many other instances might be produced to shew that reason governs our passions: for the law, in some cases, exercises dominion over natural affections to parents, forbidding us, for their sakes, to betray the cause of truth and virtue: so it does over tenderness to our wives, commanding us to punish them for the transgressions of their duty: so again over love to our children, enjoining us to make them examples when they do amiss: and lastly, over-kindness to our friends, in directing us to reprove their vices. In confirmation of this truth, it is further to be observed, that reason, when influenced by the law, overcomes hatred to enemies; for it prohibits the cutting down their fruit-trees: it orders us to restore to our enemies things which they have lost, and to help their cattle when fallen and in distress.

Deut. xx.

Exod. xxiii.
Ar. 5.

Further, it is evident that reason bears sway over the more violent passions, such as ambition, vain-glory, and envy; for all these unseemly dispositions are removed and subdued by a mind instructed by sound reason; as is anger also, though the most ungovernable of all passions. If this were not the case, how could our wise ancestor Jacob so severely condemn that fact of his sons, Simeon and Levi, when they, contrary to reason, utterly destroyed the whole race of the Shechemites? saying, in abhorrence of their intemperate rage, "Curled be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel." He had certainly no view in speaking thus, unless persuaded that reason was able to conquer wrath.

CHAP. III.

WHEN God created man, and endued him with reason and a freedom of will, he, at the same time, implanted in his nature variety of passions and dispositions, and set his intellectual mind upon the throne, to exercise government over all the sensual appetites within. He then imposed a law as a rule, whereby he might direct himself, and lead a life of temperance justice, and goodness. What ground can there be then for that objection, which makes a doubt whether reason can master the passions, because it does not appear that it attains to absolute dominion over forgetfulness and ignorance? We are not to expect that reason should totally exempt us from all evil dispositions; but it will aid us in our conflicts with such dispositions; it being the proper office of reason not to change, but assist nature; not to be a destroyer, but an auxiliary.

This matter may receive some illustration from the example of David. We read that, after having engaged a whole day with an army of Philistines, and made great slaughter among them, the king retired in the evening into the royal tent, fatigued and spent, where all the forces of our forefathers were encamped around him. The rest of the company refreshed themselves contentedly; but the king, being exceeding thirstily, could not satisfy his appetite with any water drawn out of those springs of which they had plenty. An inconsiderate desire seized him to drink of the water fetched from the enemy's garrison. Hereupon some of his officers, desirous of satisfying him, armed themselves, took a vessel, broke through the enemies trenches, passed their guards, sought out the well of Bethlehem, and thence brought to the king the water he so ardently desired. But David, though parched with thirst, recollecting how inhuman and dangerous a thing it would be to gratify his appetite at the hazard of mens lives, and that drinking the water would be in effect to drink blood, opposed reason to inclination, and made a libation of it to the Deity.

2 Sam. xxi.

Thus a mind, strictly temperate and wise, can overcome the impulse or the passions, extinguish the flames of the most furious desires, contend with the most exquisite bodily pains, and, in fine, quell all the perturbations that discompose the human frame, by a steady principle of virtue. But it now becomes necessary to confirm this argument, by demonstrative proofs of this power of reason exemplified by practice, of which our forefathers have given undeniable instances. When, through strict observance of their laws, they had ingratiated themselves with foreign princes, and prevailed upon Seleucus Nicator, king of Asia, so far, that he set apart a portion of his public revenues to defray the expence of the sacrifices, as highly approving their institutions, it happened, after this profound tranquillity, some of them them were brought under various and severe trials, by the ill offices of wicked men, who disturbed the public peace in the manner hereafter related.

CHAP. IV.

A Certain man, named Simon, creating a quarrel with Onias, who was high-priest for life, and a man of the greatest integrity, after having endeavoured to vilify his character by the foulest aspersions, and finding his attempts vain to lessen him in the esteem of the people, fled to a foreign court, with wicked intent to betray his country. He accordingly applied to Apollonius, who was then governor of Syria and Phœnicia, and told him, that, from his great zeal for the king his master, he was come to make a discovery of a vast sum of money deposited in the treasury at Jerusalem, not appropriated to the temple, or employed to any public use, but wealth hoarded up by private men, and therefore of course the right of Seleucus. Apollonius having received this account, commended Simon's zeal for the king's service, waited upon Seleucus, and imparted to him the secret. Upon this information he soon obtained a commission from the king, and marched into our country, bringing with him the traitor Simon, and a very powerful army.

Upon his arrival, he gave out, that he came, by order of the king, to remove the private money that was in the sacred treasury. The nation taking alarm, and complaining of it as an horrible injustice to deprive those of their money who had deposited it in the sacred treasury, resisted the officer as much as they were able. But Apollonius, with menaces of force, made up to the temple. The priests, upon this, with their wives and children, prostrating themselves before the sacred place, implored the Almighty to defend his own temple from profanation and contempt.

Apollonius still persisting, and entering the place with a body of armed men, as he was about to seize upon the treasury, behold angels from heaven suddenly appeared, mounted on horses, clad in shining armour, and struck Apollonius and his soldiers with fear and trembling. The governor fell to the ground in the court of the Gentiles, stretching out his hands to heaven, and supplicating the Hebrews, with many tears, to offer their prayers for him, that he might not be destroyed by that tremendous host. The high-priest Onias, moved with compassion, and fearing lest Seleucus should impute the death of Apollonius to human treachery, granted his request; so that being miraculously saved, he returned back to the king, and related to him the particulars that had befallen him.

But king Seleucus dying soon after, he was succeeded on the throne by his son Antiochus, a man of an imperious and savage disposition, who deprived Onias of the priesthood, and put into that office his brother Jason, upon a compact of an annual tribute of three thousand six hundred and sixty talents, which he had covenanted to pay him. The king having constituted this Jason superintendant, not only over ecclesiastical matters, as high-priest, but also over civil affairs, he put our nation under severe trials, and, by introducing new customs, contrary to the law, hurried them into all manner of impunity. He not only instituted Grecian games in our metropolis, but abolished the use of the temple, insomuch that the Divine vengeance being provoked, Antiochus was stirred up to make war against the Jews. Being engaged in an expedition against Ptolemy, king of Egypt, and informed, at the same time, that some of the inhabitants of Jerusalem had expressed joy at the report of his being dead, he turned his forces that way, and made great havoc among them, publishing withal an edict, forbidding any of them to observe the customs of their country, upon pain of death. Finding this edict had not its intended effect, but that all his severest threatenings and punishments were so far despised, that even the women (who continued the practice of circumcising their children) were cast down headlong from the walls of the city, (though they knew what they were to suffer,) he was so amazed at the little regard shewn to his authority, that he came in person, and by torments compelled those that were brought before him, to eat of meats unclean and forbidden by the law, and thus abjure the religion of their country.

CHAP. V.

WHEN Antiochus, that cursed tyrant, had seated himself upon a tribunal, surrounded by his counsellors, and a strong body of armed men, he commanded many of the Hebrews to be brought by force before him, and compelled them to eat of swine's flesh, and meats offered to idols, upon pain of the torture in case of refusal. After many had been thus barbarously treated, a certain man, named Eleazar, of the family of the priests, by profession a lawyer, far advanced in years, and known to several who stood round the tyrant, was brought before him. Antiochus observing the venerable sage, thus addressed him:

"Before I proceed to use any severity, let me advise thee, reverend old man, to save thy own life, by submitting to eat of swine's flesh; for I pay great respect to thy age and grey hairs; and am surprized that the experience of so many years should not have made thee wiser than still to persevere in the Jewish superstition. It seems to me a most unreasonable thing for men to abridge themselves of any innocent pleasures, and great injustice to themselves, and ingratitude to nature, to refuse any of those enjoyments which her bounty hath provided for us. Why shouldst thou then express such abhorrence of that most delicious of all meats, which seems, in the flesh of swine, to have been designed as our best entertainment, and a singular favour? This may in others seem somewhat more excusable; but in you, who are a person of better judgment, it would be a most unaccountable folly, to be prejudiced by a false and empty notion of religion; and for an idle fancy to contemn my authority, and draw a needless punishment upon your own head: wilt not thou then suffer thine eyes to be opened, and be awakened out of this dream of thy peculiar persuasion, and set thyself free from the bondage of so morose and singular a notion? Will this friendly exhortation prevail for no deference to be paid my kindness? and the compassion I have for thy age, move thee to no compassion upon thyself? Methinks it should; for though what I have said does not convince thee of the vanity of thy opinion in this point, yet you must needs allow, that if there be a power above, which does, as you suppose, require the observance of this religion, that power hath so much goodness to pardon the transgression of his laws, when it is not the offender's own act and choice, but the effect of force and pure constraint."

Eleazar, having duly attended to these words, entreated of the king permission to speak for himself, which being granted, he stood forth, and, in the presence of the whole assembly, spoke to the following effect:

"Know, Sire, that we, who are fully convinced that it is our duty, in all things, to behave ourselves according to the law given us by God, are perfectly persuaded, that no necessity can more oblige us, no force be stronger upon us, than that by which we stand bound to obey his law; and for this reason we think our acting contrary to it, cannot be dispensed with on any terms whatsoever. Nay, though our law were not, as you are pleased to suggest, really divine, yet, Sire, I must for refusing to eat Swines & Flesh, and sacrifice to Idols.

"must crave leave to say, that, so long as we continue to believe it divine, that very persuasion ought to be an effectual restraint upon us from violating, or thinking meanly of, any religious ordinances established by it. Do not therefore imagine, if we should submit to defile ourselves by unclean meats, that this would be deemed a small and pardonable fault. For the presumption of the offender is the same, and the authority of the law equally insulted, be the instance in which a man transgresses greater or less. The fact itself makes no difference in point of guilt. You were pleased, Sire, to speak contemptuously of our religion, as an institution unbecoming men of reason and philosophy. But I must be bold to say, it is the best and most consummate philosophy; for it teaches us temperance, the conquest of our passions and desires, and sets us above all our pleasures. It trains us up in the exercise of fortitude, and commands us to undergo all manner of pain willingly and cheerfully. It teaches us the most exact justice; and orders us to confine our worship and absolute reverence to the one true God, where alone they are of right due. Upon this account we dare not eat things prohibited and unclean; for we are fully persuaded that God, who created our nature, had due regard to it; that the very institution of this law was so far from a hardship, as in itself to be an act of goodness and mercy; and that the things forbidden are hurtful to our souls; whereas those allowed for food are useful and convenient. It is therefore the very extremity of tyranny to force us not only to sin against our law, but to eat that which is therefore not allowed us because of a quality not fit to be eaten. But this is a sort of triumph which I shall never give you over me. Nor must I falsify the solemn oaths, and only engagements, whereby our ancestors have bound themselves, and their posterity, to the faithful observance of this law; not though you should command my eyes to be put out, and my bowels to be burnt. Old age hath not so impaired my mind, or enfeebled my body, but that, when religion and duty call me to it, my reason can yet approve itself youthful and vigorous. If this reply provoke you, prepare your instruments of torture, and heat your furnace hotter still: all that shall not move me to spare my old age, so as, for the saving my person, to violate the law of my country and my God. That holy law, to which I owe my instruction, I will never desert. Thou dearest of all virtues, temperance, by which we preserve our native sovereignty over our appetites, I will never abjure thee; thou best of all philosophy, I will never disgrace thee. Thou holy order of priesthood, and study of the law, I will neither forego, or be a blemish to you. My ancestors shall find me come to you pure and constant; a soul as free from such a stain as undaunted under all manner of torments, even unto death."

CHAP. VI.

ELEAZAR, having made this noble and spirited reply to the tyrant's exhortation, was dragged by the guards that stood round to the cruellest torments. They pulled off the old man's garment, the venerable habit of his religion, and having bound both his hands behind him, unmercifully scourged him; an officer calling out at every stroke, "Obey the king's commands." The brave Eleazar sustained his torment as if he had been in a dream, without deviating a tittle from his profession. The good old man stood with his eyes uplifted to heaven, while the blood streamed down from his body to the ground, till, no longer able to sustain the torments, he fell upon the pavement: but this was owing to bodily infirmity; for his mind was as constant and resolute as ever. Upon this one of the guards stamped upon him in order to raise him. Still he bore their barbarous insolence, and, with surprizing constancy, suffered their stripes, till his very torment-

No. 41.

tors stood in admiration of his extraordinary magnanimity, and wondered to find so noble a soul in a body so aged and infirm. At length some of them, touched with compassion at his decrepid age, and moved by remembrance of ancient friendship, thus addressed him:

"Why dost thou thus, for no manner of reason, expose thyself to all these sufferings? Permit us, Eleazar, to set before thee some lawful and clean meats; and do thou make as though thou didst eat swine's flesh, according to the king's command; so shalt thou save thy life, and yet commit no wickedness." But Eleazar resolutely answered, "Far be it from us, who are children of Abraham, to be guilty of such cowardice and wicked subtilty, by so much as seeming to do an act that does not become us. How absurd would it be for me, who have led a life of sincerity and truth hitherto, and preserved my reputation free from blemish, by a strict observation of the law, to change my course now in extreme old age, and set an ill example to others! to purchase a little remainder of life at the expence of foul dissimulation, and live that little with the scorn and derision of all the world, for my fear and base compliance?" When they perceived him thus resolute and inflexible, and that their pity could have no influence upon him, they changed their disposition, and brought him to the fire. There they applied new instruments of torture, threw him upon the fuel, and, as he burnt, poured scalding and nauseous liquors up his nostrils. Burnt to the very bone, and ready to expire, he lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, "Thou seest, my God, the miseries I endure; and that I chuse to die by fire and torment, for the sake of thy law, when it was in my power to preserve my life for transgressing it. Be thou, therefore, gracious, O Lord, to thy own people, and let the vengeance executed on me suffice for what they have deserved. Make thou my blood a purification for them, and accept my life instead of their lives." With these words this pious man gave up the ghost.

Hence it is evident that reason, improved by religion, has command over the passions; if it were otherwise, it is to them that the praise of this noble testimony to truth and constant virtue ought to be ascribed. But since, from this instance, it appears plain that the former was victorious, we cannot, with truth, deny that reason is the governing principle: and, indeed, it is most equitable to confess the same, after so full a demonstration not only of bodily pains, but likewise of pleasures too, resisted and vanquished: for the undeviating tendency of our passions is to indulge pleasure and decline pain.

CHAP. VII.

OUR reverend father Eleazar may be deemed a skilful pilot, holding the rudder of the ship of piety in the sea of the passions, tossed to and fro with the threatenings of the tyrant, and overwhelmed with the waves of torment. Nevertheless, he changes not the rudder till he reaches the haven of victory by a direct and prosperous course. A city besieged with various engines, never made such resistance against the furious assaults of an enemy, as the divine mind of this pious sage against the attacks of stripes, tortures, and death, till, at length, he vanquished through the aid of reason engaged in the cause of religion.

"O priest, most worthy of the sacerdotal dignity, who didst not pollute thy sacred body with impure viands! O guardian of the law, and professor of a philosophy all divine! O noblest assertor of the religion of thy country, in spite of passion, of torture, and of death! Thou hast gloriously confirmed the equity of our law by thy sufferings and perseverance; rendered our rites more conspicuous, but not abrogated them; and, by realities and deeds, established the precepts and doctrines of our holy profession. O, venerable sage, superior to torments, above the force of raging flames, most glorious of conquerors, who hast led thy passions in triumph! As heretofore our father Aaron, armed with a censor, ran into the midst of the temple, and vanquished the destroying angel, in like manner did Eleazar, descended from the same Aaron, steadily adhere to his profession, and conquer in the midst of devouring flames. And, what is most astonishing, when age and infirmities had enervated his body, he exerted an invincible resolution of mind. O happy age! integrity and sanctity unquestionable, that gave testimony of so illustrious a death!"

What more satisfactory evidence can be required of the power of reason over the passions, than that of an aged man enduring so much for the cause of piety and virtue, with such undaunted intrepidity? But as it may be alledged, by way of objection, that this in age is less to be wondered at, because, as strength and courage decrease, so the passions and love of life may then be supposed to be considerably abated, I shall proceed to shew, that even young men, whose reason has been fixed upon true principles, have undergone, and overcome, torments heavier than the former.

When the tyrant found himself foiled in this first attempt, and that he could not compel the venerable Eleazar to violate the laws of his country, he became so incensed, that he commanded others of the Hebrew captives to be brought before him, promising them immediate liberty, upon condition of their eating forbidden meats, and threatening them with greater torture than had been inflicted in case of refusal.

CHAP. VIII.

PURSUANT to the order aforesaid, there were brought before the tyrant seven sons, with their ancient mother. The men, from the symmetry of their form, and elegance of their deportment, attracted his notice; and therefore, after beholding them with a kind of approbation, he commanded them to approach, and thus accosted them:

"Young men, from an approbation of your personal appearance, I have kind intentions towards you: nor can I but pay a more than ordinary respect to your family, which hath the unusual blessing of so many such brethren. To advise, therefore, that you would not be guilty of the same mad and most absurd zeal, with that poor old bigot, whom you saw perish in the midst of agonies and tortures, is a kindness far below what I design for you. I invite you to comply with me, with an assurance of my particular friendship: for I have it in my power to oblige and advance them that obey me, in as eminent a manner as I have to punish those that stand out against my commands. Be assured then, you shall not fail of preferments, but have places of honour and profit, and great trust under me, provided you will renounce your country's customs, and be content to live after the Greek manner; laying aside the foolish distinction of meats, and indulging those appetites and pleasures freely, in which youth, never fond of restraint, must find a delight now denied you by the tyrant of your own superstition. Consider too, that if such advantageous offers be rejected, you must expect that your obstinacy will be the more provoking; and I shall be obliged to make every one of you examples, by a death as full of pain and horror as the anger of an incensed king can inflict. Be persuaded to pity yourselves, when a stranger and an enemy has set you an example of pity. Throw not lavishly away so much youth and beauty, which I am very loth should perish: but perish it must, unless you will save it by that one way. Therefore consider well. Methinks you should consider, and not resolve too rashly, when I assure you, that, in case of disobedience, you have nothing to expect but racks, fire, and death."

The tyrant had no sooner thus spoken, than he commanded the instruments of torture to be produced, in order to work more strongly upon their fears, than words and menaces he imagined could do. When the guards had set before them the wheels, racks, manacles, combustible matter, and other implements of horror and execution, Antiochus, taking the advantage of the impression he supposed this spectacle would make, once more applied to them in terms to this effect: "Young men, consider the consequences; your compliance is no longer a wilful offence: you may rest assured that the Deity you worship will consider your case, in being compelled to violate your law." But they were so far from being terrified at the consequence of a denial, that their resolutions became stronger, and through the power of reason, aided by religion, they triumphed over his barbarity. What is it reasonable to suppose would have been the measures pursued, had there been but an individual among them timorous, or inordinately fond of life? Would not such a one have addressed himself to the rest, in terms similar to the following?

"What stupid and fool-hardy wretches are we, thus to continue deaf to the invitations and kind advice of a king, who calls us to gain and promote motion upon our obedience! Why should we amuse ourselves with vain imaginations, and persist in a fatal obstinacy, which can end in nothing but death? Shall we be so insensible as to have no regard to these dreadful engines of cruelty? None to the menaces of an unrelenting tyrant, inexorable enough to put in execution all that he hath threatened? Shall we not rather abandon this empty point of honour, and that false pride of constancy, that is certain to prove our destruction? It can be no crime to have some respect to our youth, which promises many happy years; some pity to our poor aged mother, whose grey hairs must be brought down with unspeakable sorrow to the grave, to see so many sons cut off at once, and herself made childless in an instant by our disobedience. What the king says is very rational, that God is too just and good not to make allowance for the hard circumstances we lie under. Why should we then throw ourselves out of life, at a time when we are best fitted to taste the sweets of living? Why hurry ourselves headlong out of a world where every thing conspires to delight and entertain us most agreeably? Let us not strive any longer with our fate; nor buy applause so dear as at the expence of racks and death. The law itself is not so severe as to condemn for involuntary offences; and the more just our fears are, the less there is of will in the compliance. What pretence can we have then for this obduracy? Or why should we be so fond of a mistaken courage, which is indeed no better than despair and obstinacy, when nothing but death is before us if we stand out; and life and security, plenty and pleasure, are surely ours, if we do but submit?"

CHAP. IX.

BUT no language similar to this was uttered from the mouth of one of these brave youths; for the apprehension of the racking pains they were about to endure little affected their minds. They triumphed over their impending misfortunes; and when the tyrant commanded them to eat of the forbidden viands, they, with one voice, and, as it were, with one spirit, made him this reply:

"To what purpose, O king, is the delay? If with design to know our final resolution, be assured we are ready to encounter death in its most frightful forms, rather than transgress the laws of our fathers. For, besides the reverence due to the example of our ancestors upon other accounts, this is what our obedience to the law, and the precepts of Moses, requires from us. Do not then attempt any more to persuade us to apostacy; do no:

“not put on a counterfeit pity for those who know you hate them: even death itself is more supportable than such an insulting, dissembling compassion, as would save our lives with the loss of our innocence. Thou thinkest to terrify us by threatenings of death and torture, notwithstanding the same experiment made upon the old man hath so lately taught thee how ineffectual all such methods are upon the servants of the true God; and if the old men of our nation endure so courageously such exquisite pains for their religion, is it reasonable to suppose that the young ones will suffer the reproach of being behind them in constancy and patience? As we have been educated under his particular care and instructions, so we shall conquer after his example. Try us, therefore, and see if it be in thy power to destroy our souls, when we suffer in the cause of God and religion? This is impossible: your cruelty cannot hurt us; for all the effect our pains can have, will be to secure us the glorious rewards due to unshaken patience and injured virtue. Upon you the consequence will be very different and dreadful; for, by the murders of so many innocent men, you arm the Divine vengeance against yourself; and, for the temporal punishments which you inflict, will become so obnoxious, as to suffer the punishment of everlasting torments.”

The tyrant, enraged at their contumacy, gave the word of command; and the guards immediately brought forth the eldest of the seven brethren, and having torn off his garment, and tied his hands behind him, cruelly scourged him; and continued their lashes till they were tired, but could avail nothing. They then put him on the wheel, where his body being extended, he underwent the severest tortures of the rack; thus reproaching his tormentor: “Monster of cruelty! enemy to the Divine Justice! you torment me in this manner not for homicide or impiety, but as an assertor and defender of the sacred law.” The guards then exhorted him to comply, eat of the king’s meat, and thereby obtain a respite. But he answered, “Think not, base men, that your wheel can destroy my reason. Break my limbs in pieces, burn my flesh, distort my arteries; yet all the torments you can inflict on me shall serve but to convince you, that it is the peculiar glory of an Hebrew to be invariably firm in suffering for the cause of virtue.” They then put fire under him, and exposed his body, as much extended as possible, to the devouring flames, inasmuch that he exhibited a spectacle horrible beyond description, and thus continued till nothing was left of human form, but a skeleton of broken bones.

During the shocking scene, this brave youth, and worthy descendant of faithful Abraham, was not heard to utter a groan, but bore his torments with such invincible fortitude, as if he had been translated to immutability in the midst of the flames, exclaiming, “My brethren, follow my example: desert me not in this noble conflict, nor disclaim the relation of generous constancy, by which we are allied in soul more nearly than in blood. Engage, resolutely engage, in the sacred warfare; nor doubt but that the Almighty Creator of the universe will be propitious to our nation, and avenge himself on the cruel tyrant.” With these words the brave youth expired.

While the spectators stood fixed in astonishment and admiration, the guards advanced with the second brother, and fixed his hands in manacles of iron: but, before they put him to the rack, they demanded if he would accept the conditions. Finding, by his reply, he had adopted the same noble resolution with his brother, they tore off his flesh with pincers, and flayed off the skin of his beard, face, and head. He bore this torture with singular magnanimity, saying, “How welcome is death in any form, when we suffer for our religion and laws! Art thou insensible, inhuman tyrant, that thou art rather thine own tormentor than mine, in finding thy tyrannic aims defeated by our constancy? The comforts of conscious virtue alleviate my pains, while the dreadful load of your impiety shall fall on your own head, and the Divine vengeance make an example of such a monster to the whole world.”

CHAP. X.

THE second brother having made this glorious exit, the third was produced, and pressed with arguments and entreaties to taste and preserve his life. But he replied, with vehemence, “Are you ignorant that I am the son of the same father and the same mother with those that went before me? Shall I then, in this last scene of life, renounce the honour of that alliance? The same institutions were taught us all, and I will abide by them until death.” The freedom of this speech enraged the executioners, who, to express their malice and resentment, stretched his hands and feet on the engine, and broke them to pieces: but when they found this method did not deprive him of life, they drew off his skin at the ends of his fingers, and flayed him from the very crown of his head. Not content with mangling his body in this merciless manner, they dragged him to the wheel, where, being yet more distended, he saw his own flesh torn from him, and streams of blood gushing from his body. When at the point of death, he exclaimed, “Merciless tyrant! we suffer thus for the religion and law of that God who is able to reward us: but remember, thou shalt suffer pains much more insupportable for thy impiety and cruelty.”

Having died thus equally glorious with his preceding brothers, the fourth was produced by the guards, and persuaded to bethink himself, and be wiser than those who had gone before him. His answer was, “Your fire has not heat enough in it to make me despond or renounce my opinion. I solemnly swear by the happy exit of my brothers, by the eternal destruction of the tyrant, and the glorious life of the pious, I will not renounce their magnanimity. Invent and bring thy torments, tyrant, and make the experiment whether I am not a branch of the same stock, and animated with the same soul, as those whose blood thy impious hands have spilt.” Antiochus, on hearing these words, was so excessively enraged, that all the force of passion was visible in his countenance. He gave immediate orders to cut out his tongue; whereupon he thus proceeded: “You may deprive me of the instrument of utterance; but that God who seeth the heart, knows the inward sensations of the silent. Here is the member; you cannot, by this act, deprive me of reason. O that I could lose my life by inches, to support the cause of religion. Though you take away the tongue, which chaunts the praises of God, remember that his high hand will very soon let its vengeance fall down upon your head.”

CHAP. XI.

NO sooner had this brother, exhausted with pain, and miserably mangled, finished his course, than the fifth sprang forward of his own accord, exclaiming, “Prepare your torments: I am here ready to suffer the worst you inflict. I come voluntarily to die in the cause of virtue; and, by a cruel catastrophe, to procure an endless punishment on you for the barbarities you have committed on the bodies of my brothers. Mortal enemy to virtue, religion, and mankind, what have I done, wherein have I transgressed, to deserve this merciless treatment? Do we not worship the universal parent of nature according to his own decrees? Do we not act in conformity to the institution of his most holy laws? These are things that ought to meet with reward instead of punishment.”

While these words were in his mouth, the tormentors bound and dragged him to the wheel, to which fastening his knees with iron rings, they stretched him round the engine, and then broke his joints. Being miserably tortured in this manner, he thus spoke in unspeakable anguish: "Tyrant, thou dost us the greatest honour against thy inclination; for the glorious torments you inflict upon us, only serve to testify an extraordinary zeal for our laws and religion."

When he had borne testimony to the truth of his religion, after the example of his heroic brothers, the sixth youth was brought before Antiochus, and being demanded, by the tyrant, whether he would accept deliverance in the terms aforementioned, resolutely answered, "It is true, indeed, I am younger than my brothers, but my mind is the same with theirs. We had all of us the same parents, and the same instructions, and it is but necessary that we should all die alike for them; therefore if you are determined to put me to the torment on my refusal to eat, torment me." Hereupon they fastened him to the wheel, and having broken his bones, put fire under him. Then the guards heated their spears, and thrust them into his back and sides, till his very entrails were burnt up. In the midst of these torments he exclaimed, "O glorious conflict, in which so many brethren have engaged for the sake of their religion, and all came off victorious; for a mind rightly informed of the truth, and armed with steady principles of virtue, must for ever be impregnable. I will accompany my brothers, and relying on my own probity as my defence, now submit to death. But thou, tyrant, must not think to avoid a punishment which your cruelties deserve; for a death, attended with the most dreadful of torments, hangs over your head. Six of us have baffled thy rage and malice. As for your fire, it feels cold to us; your tormenting engines are far from giving us pain; and all the violence you can use is fruitless, and of no consequence. For so long as our law is so nobly asserted, we retain a reason that all the world and its punishments cannot subdue."

CHAP. XII.

THE sixth brother being dispatched at last, by being thrown into a boiling cauldron, the seventh, and youngest, appeared, whom, when the tyrant saw fettered and pinioned, and though so implacably outrageous against the rest of his brethren, his heart began to relent. Calling upon him, therefore, to approach the tribunal, he endeavoured to soothe him with these words:

"You see what kind of deaths your brothers have undergone; but their disobedience and contumacy have been the sole means of all their torments, and the cruelties they have sustained. Yet you, if you obey not my commands, shall be exposed to the same, nay, worse torments, and so suffer an immature death: but if you comply with my desires, I will take you into the number of my friends, you shall have a considerable post in my kingdom, and be a governor in the state." Not content with these persuasions to the son, he addressed himself to the mother, with seeming compassion for her loss, entreating her to prevail upon her child, in pity to her at least, to save this small remnant of the family, and not to bring on her the affliction of having all her offspring so sadly torn away at once. But his mother, addressing him in the Hebrew tongue, exhorted him to suffer, as we shall shew in the sequel. Upon this he suddenly exclaimed, "Take off my fetters, for I have something to communicate to the king, and all his friends." The king and his nobles hearing the promise the young man made, seemed greatly rejoiced; and his chains were immediately knocked off. Taking the advantage of this circumstance, he thus exclaimed:

"Impious and cursed tyrant, have you no fears nor apprehensions in your mind, after having received at the hands of the Almighty the kingdom and riches you enjoy, than to put to death his servants, and torment his worshippers? These cruelties shall be returned with an eternal punishment from the hands of the Divine vengeance. Is your conscience touched with no scruples, inhuman monster, thus to deprive of their tongues those who share alike the same nature and passions with you, and who are born of the same elements, and thus put innocent persons to cruel torments, and take away their lives in the most unmerciful and barbarous manner? They have undergone a glorious death, and shewn how much their piety and observance was for the maintenance of the true religion; whereas thou, impious man, shalt be exposed to ills you little dream of, for taking away unjustly the lives of those who were worshippers of the Supreme Being. For this reason I will suffer death, and, in my last pangs, discover how much my desire was to follow the brave example of my brothers. I beg and entreat the God of my fathers that he would be propitious and merciful to our nation; but that he may chastise you while you live; and after death, that your punishment may be augmented." Having finished this address, he threw himself into the boiling cauldron, and so gave up the ghost.

CHAP. XIII.

FROM these particulars we have enumerated, it must be confessed that reason, guided and supported by religion, has power over the passions, when we see seven brothers in perfect agreement, and upon the same principle, despising and vanquishing the most exquisite pains, and even death itself. Is it not manifest, that had these men been governed by their passions, they had submitted to pollute themselves with unlawful meats, refused no condition to procure ease and safety, and been totally subdued? But since they combated these passions by a judicious use of reason, we are bound to acknowledge, with abundant praise to the holy martyrs who suffered, that, as they despised the most dreadful torments, so reason never more discovered its dominion over the subject passions than in those instances. For as the moles and forts upon the shore break all the force of the waves and weather, and render the harbour commodious and safe to ride in, so did this sevenfold fortification of reason protect the harbour of piety from all the storms and boisterous inundations of passion.

How moving, how affecting a sight was such a company, encouraging and assisting each other in the exercises of their piety, like the voices which contribute, every one by his distinct part, to make up a perfect melody? With such an harmony of hearts did they exclaim: "Let us die like brethren in the defence of our laws; let us imitate the brave example of the three Assyrian youths, who defied the furnace of the king of Babylon, in fighting for the cause of virtue; let us never despair, nor once be cast down. When religion and a good conscience are at stake, let us abandon all ignoble fears, and act with becoming resolution." Another said, "Assume courage, my brother, and suffer all with an insurmountable bravery of mind." Others of them recognized ancient facts. "Remember whence you derive your origin, and what father Isaac could suffer in the cause of piety." Then in general looking on each other with countenances serene, and highly pleased, they exclaimed, "Let us cheerfully consecrate our bodies to God. Let us pay him back the lives he lent us for his service, and devote these bodies to the defence of his most holy law. Why should we stand in fear of one who only seems to kill the body? The only danger worthy of our dread is that of souls abandoned to torments everlasting, which can never be the fate of such as keep and honour the truth. Let us then arm ourselves with an holy fortitude, so shall Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob receive us when we die, and all our pious ancestors congratulate and applaud our constancy."

As they were dragged one by one to the place of execution, whose turn was not yet come, encouraged those that went before them, with words to this purport: "Brethren, do not dishonour us; nor elude the expectation of your brethren who have already suffered death."

These must have been very engaging exhortations; for none can be insensible what charms, what powerful influence so near a relation carries with it; what tender affections the All-wise Providence hath infused into their hearts, who have derived their being from the same father and mother, been maintained at one common table, conversed perpetually together under the same roof, instructed by the same teachers, and initiated in the same religion. Such was the affection, such the endearments, and, of course, such were the weight and efficacy the admonitions and mutual encouragements of these seven brothers to one another; for they were brought up in the same faith, trained up in the exercise of the same virtues, and the better men they were, the better they must love each other. Natural affection is never so happily improved as by perfect agreement in goodness, and united zeal in the love and service of God. And as each of these would love the rest more tenderly in proportion as he himself was more religious, so would he necessarily, in the same proportion, and upon the same account, become more worthy to be beloved by all the rest. And yet we may observe in this very case, a mighty conquest of reason over passion; for though the brethren had all the tender concern that nature and blood, birth and education, acquaintance and personal worth, could inspire them with, yet these manifold endearments were so vanquished and borne down when religion lay at stake, that, in a cause so noble, the very tortures and deaths of their dearest relations gave a sensible satisfaction to those of the number who yet survived, and were the undaunted, nay, even pleased, spectators of them.

CHAP. XIV.

THE pious and virtuous youths not only excited one another to suffer these terrible conflicts so as to make them surmount all the pains they might be put to, but also were the cause that their brothers, during their torments, bore every thing with astonishing resignation. Oh! minds more absolute than the most sovereign princes, and more free than liberty itself! Not one of them was observed to betray any fears, nor have any scruples on the approach of death; but all, as with one accord, running the race of immortality, embraced death amidst their torments. As the hands and feet obey the motions of the mind, and so direct themselves, even so did these youths, from a motive of piety, consent to die in its cause. As the number of days in which the world was created give us the idea of God, and shew the perfection of his majesty and goodness, so do these most renowned martyrs, by running the whole circle of pains and tortures, compose one finished piece of constancy and courage, and teach us that perfection of fortitude which banishes the slavish fear of death. But alas! how far short of this pattern do we stop! we, who cannot so much as hear or read without trembling and amazement, what they not only heard, not only saw, but felt and bore without the least disorder of mind.

Nor ought we to wonder that reason in man should have this dominion over his passions, when the mind of a woman contended more cruelties than these, and of a different nature. For the mother of these seven youths had such presence of mind as to be a spectator of the tortures her children endured. Reflect on the force of natural affection, how diffusive to one's offspring: nay, this we observe in the brute creation, who have a tincture of the same kind of affection and love for their young as mankind. But there is no necessity for producing examples of brute animals to confirm this love for their young, when the very bees, at the time they are employed about making their honey, revenge themselves on those that approach them, and cause their stings to do the office of swords, and other military weapons, upon those that would attack their little ones.

CHAP. XV.

BUT so true a daughter of Abraham was the mother of these gallant youths, that even compassion for her own children could not break in upon her duty. Such was her noble zeal, that, when two things were offered to her choice, religion and the present safety, and great preferment of seven sons, she wisely gave the preference to the former, which leads to eternal life and happiness. By what language shall I describe those tender passions of parents, that union of nature between them and their children, which, in a wonderful manner, draws upon their offspring the same lines and features of body, and impresses the same dispositions of soul? How can I represent the concern they feel for these images and parts of themselves, when in any manner of distress? How especially that of mothers, whose weaker minds, and natural excess of fondness, render them still more sensibly touched by whatever affects their children, than fathers are wont or expected to be? This mother was more under the influence of such affection than mothers in common. Seven painful births had made as many additions to this love; and every time her travail was repeated it was a fresh exercise of it, a fresh and strong endearment towards all for whom she had endured the same pangs.

But, notwithstanding all this, the fear and love of God overcame her concern for the present safety and advantage of her children. Never did she love them so tenderly as when their steady virtue, and constancy in the truth, charmed her affections, and endeared them to her; for they were just and wise, temperate and magnanimous, affectionate to each other, and dutiful to their mother to that degree, that they even died in the cause of their law in obedience to her. Though she had such extraordinary reasons to love her sons, yet not all the exquisite pains and cruelties they were exposed to could once divert the opinion and resolution she had formed within her breast, for she exhorted each of them singly, and all of them together, not to decline any sufferings, or death, for the sake of religion. Though she was an eye-witness to the torments inflicted on each of her sons, yet the cause of piety engrossed her soul, and she still maintained the sincerity of her intentions. Her piety was so firm, that it remained unchangeable by the horrid, the thrilling spectacle of her children being exposed to inconceivable tortures. Extraordinary mother! that felt greater pangs of sorrow now than she ever experienced at bringing them into the world. Perfect pattern of piety! Thou didst not utter a sigh at seeing thine eldest expire. The second giving up the ghost amidst his torments could not draw a tear from those eyes; nor could the third in his last terrible moments, or any one of them in the midst of their torments.

The songs of Syrens, and the dying notes of swans, with all their bewitching and enchanting melody, were not so persuasive to your ears as the last accents of your sons in their expiring moments. When nature and affection pleaded strongly with thee, and the pains and unparalleled sufferings of thy children added weight to their arguments, thou wouldest not accept a short deliverance with guilt, but gavest them up to death in prospect of a more lasting bliss. Thou didst thus approve thyself a true daughter of Abraham, an heiress of all his faith and fortitude.

Mother of our nation! protectress of our laws! bulwark of piety! more patient than man, and armed with more fortitude to undergo difficulties! the glory of thine own sex, and superior to ours! For as the ark of Noah, which then contained all the surviving world, rode triumphant upon the waters of the general flood, so thou, protectress of the law, tossed on every side with the deluge of the passions, and the torments of thy sons, as with the most violent storm, didst bravely bear up against the fierceness of a dreadful tempest.

CHAP.

C H A P. XVI.

TO return to the point at which I have been aiming; if a woman, aged, and the mother of seven sons, could not only sustain the sight of those children expiring in tortures, in consideration of the cause for which they suffered and died, it is evident, beyond dispute, that reason, supported by religion, hath a power superior to our passions. It has been abundantly proved, that not only men have overcome vast difficulties, but that a woman despised the most exquisite pains. The lions among whom Daniel was thrown were not so fierce, nor was the furnace of Mishael, though heated with the most raging fires, so hot as those violent passions which natural affection and pity had kindled in her breast, when she saw seven sons successively expire in agonies inexpressible. Yet reason and religion quenched these so furious and manifold affections.

It is reasonable to suppose, that had this woman the least degree of pusillanimity in her composition, she would have burst out into lamentations similar to the following. "Miserable woman that I am, who having brought seven sons into the world, am now parent of none! To what purpose, my sons, have I borne the many sorrows I have suffered for you, and the many solitudes in bringing you up? Beloved children, whose faces I shall no more behold, nor rejoice in their marriage and posterity, nor have the much desired blessing in being esteemed happy in any descendants of the second and third generation. I once was happy, happy above my neighbours, when surrounded with seven comely children; but now I am deprived of them, and left desolate; nor have I a son to pay me the last duty of interment."

The piety of this eminent woman disdained such complaints. She was so far from desiring any of her children to live, that it would have been matter of grief to her had they not died as they did. She therefore besought them to fulfil her joy, and encouraged them in dying for the cause of religion. Noble matron! the tyrant was subdued by thy perseverance; and, both in thy words and actions, thou hast approved thyself mighty; for when thou wert apprehended with thy sons, and saw Eleazar put to the torture; thou stoodst immovable, and thus addressed them in the Hebrew language.

"My sons, you have a glorious conflict before you, to which being called, that you may leave your nation a testimony of your faith and religion, contend cheerfully in defence of the laws of your country. It would derogate from your characters, to suffer an aged man to be exposed to the pains of the rack, while you shrink, in the prime and vigour of youth, under the same trials. Remember what life is, from whom you derived it, to whom you owe it, and that it is your indispensable duty to undergo every difficulty and danger in the course of the religion of its grand author. For him did our father Abraham hasten to sacrifice his son, the future parent of our nation. Nor did that son tremble, or once recede, when he saw a father's hand, armed with a weapon of death, uplifted to give the fatal stroke. For how was pious Daniel cast a prey to hungry lions, and the three children into the fiery furnace. You, who are partakers of the same faith, should not be disheartened, if you are made partakers of the same sufferings; for it is most dastardly, in those who have a true sense of religion, to betray a pusillanimity, when called upon to sustain difficulties."

Thus did this matron exhort her seven sons, whom she enjoined rather to suffer death than violate the divine law, especially when assuredly persuaded that those who die in the cause of God, shall live with God, with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and all the succeeding patriarchs, in mansions of immortal bliss.

C H A P. XVII.

IT is said of this dauntless woman, that, after being scourged, and otherwise severely tortured, by order of Antiochus, she finished her punishment by voluntarily throwing herself into the flames.

Courageous matron! thus defeating the tyrant's rage, disappointing his infernal schemes, and exerting a most noble faith, proof against all shocks that laboured to overturn it! Take comfort, therefore; thy patience is supported by a firm reliance on the divine goodness, and a well grounded hope of future reward. The moon, encircled with her attendant stars, shines not so bright in the firmament of heaven, as dost thou, reflecting light upon, and receiving it back again, from thy seven illustrious sons, fixed in the celestial mansions, and honourable in the Divine presence. Thy race descended from the stock of Abraham. Were we able to depict this act of piety in true and lively colours, our passion scarcely could sustain the mere representation. Were a monument to be erected as a memorial by the nation to which they are so great an honour, an inscription to the import of the following might become it.

"Here lies a venerable priest, an ancient mother, and seven gallant sons, cut off by the rage of a tyrant, attempting, but in vain, to overthrow the Jewish constitutions. These brave champions stood in the gap, asserted the religion and rites of their country, committed themselves and their cause to God, and persevered in despite of torments and death."

The encounter was truly divine: virtue was the judge of the combat, and disposer of the prize; and patience was the proof and exercise of it. To this the victory was to be adjudged, and immortal bliss was to be the reward of the conquerors.

Eleazar was the first champion; the mother of the seven sons made a glorious defence; the brothers stoutly fought; the tyrant was their adversary, and the world were the witnesses. Religion obtained the victory, and yielded the crown to her champions. Who but must admire these noble assertors of the divine law? Who but, on gazing on them, must stand in amaze? The tyrant himself, and the whole court, were struck with admiration at their fortitude: but now they stand at the throne of heaven, and enjoy a life of immortality. Moses writes, "All his saints are in thy hand:" for these men, being devoted to God, are celebrated with immortal renown. Nor was the benefit of their trials confined to their own persons, but the blood shed upon this occasion was accepted by divine justice as a propitiatory sacrifice, and delivered Israel from the oppression under which they groaned.

Antiochus, considering the extraordinary virtue and resolutions of these men, gave testimony to their magnanimity, and, by a public officer, propounded it as a pattern worthy the imitation of his own soldiers. He enlisted many of the Hebrews into his service, and, by their valour, having subdued his enemies, became an absolute conqueror; learning, by experience, that religion inspires men with the truest courage; and that none are capable of serving their prince in wars, comparably to those undaunted contemners of life, who dare to encounter tortures and death for the sake of God, and a good conscience.

O sons of Israel! race of faithful Abraham! pay obedience to this law; that reason, assisted by religion, has dominion over the passions, not only of those which are called internal, but also external pains and troubles.

C H A P. XVIII.

THUS did these heroes nobly fight and conquer: nor did they overcome death and torments only, but the enemies also that inflicted both, restoring storing peace to their nation, and the observance of that long neglected law, the contempt whereof provoked the Almighty to scourge the people with that worst of calamities, the tyrant Antiochus. But while he became an instrument of vengeance to others, he treasured more against himself; for, when he found he could by no means force the Jews to embrace foreign customs and rites, and abdicate their own, he departed from Jerusalem, and undertook an expedition against the Persians; nor was it long before the divine justice overtook him, and cut him off the face of the earth by a most miserable death.

For duty to the memory of the pious mother, I add another exhortation she gave to her seven brave and virtuous sons.

"I was long a chaste virgin, nor did I wander from my father's house. No seducer of youth corrupted me in the fields; nor did I fall a prey to the subtle craftiness of a betrayer. The prime of my life I past in the strictest conjugal fidelity to my husband. When you, my children, were grown up, your father died, happy in the esteem of all that knew him. He had the satisfaction of being the parent of dutiful sons; nor did he survive the loss of one of them. While he continued with you, he usually instructed you in the knowledge of the law and the prophets, and set before you the renowned examples of patience and suffering virtue: Abel murdered by his own brother Cain, Isaac designed for a burnt offering, Joseph imprisoned for his chastity, and Phineas zealous for the divine law. He displayed the virtues of Ananias, Azarias, and Misael, and of Daniel cast into the den of lions. He would frequently remind you of God's preserving providence by repeating from Isaiah, 'When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee, and when through the rivers they shall not overflow thee. When thou walkest through the fire thou shalt not be burned, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee.' He taught your infant tongues that song of David, 'Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth him out of them all;' and called upon you to observe that maxim of Solomon in his Proverbs, 'That wisdom is a tree of life to all that lay hold upon her.' Nor did he forget to teach that divine hymn of Moses, 'I kill and I make alive:' and again, what he pronounces of the law, and the diligent observers of it, 'It is your life, and through this thing ye shall prolong your days.'

O melancholy, or rather glorious day! when the merciless Grecian tyrant kindled his impious fires, prepared his cauldrons, and, with infernal fury, dragged and bound to the engines of torture, and exercised, with the most excruciating pains, the seven-fold offspring of this daughter of Abraham! when he deprived them of their eyes, of their tongues, and put them to death with all the cruelties that malice could invent! These horrid barbarities were retaliated on their perpetrators; while those sons of Abraham, with their victorious mother, are translated to bliss unspeakable, admitted to the triumphant society of their pious ancestors, and enjoy with them a glorious immortality in the vision of that beatific Being whom they had so faithfully served, and to whom be ascribed all glory and praise, both now and for evermore. PREFACE of the AUTHOR.

HOW long will men, though advanced in years, entertain notions, and exhibit a conduct in life, incompatible almost with the inexperienced youth? This can only be imputed to a reliance on fortune, and a deviation from the dictates of reason and nature; the former being ever fickle and wavering, the latter unchangeable and permanent. In this manner we invert the order of things, estimate uncertainties as certainties, and so on the contrary. The best reason which can be assigned for such error is, that weak and short-sighted men are incapable of forming a judgment of what is to come, led away by things present, and influenced by a fallacious sense, rather than the conviction of deliberate investigation. The eye, indeed, is a fit instrument to receive such objects as are near and conspicuous, but it is reason that penetrates future and invisible things. This eye of the mind is clearer than that of the body, which is too frequently rendered dim by luxurious excesses, or by ignorance, as the result of indolence, and greater mischief of the two.

These our times, however, and the many remarkable events that have fallen out in them, are sufficient to persuade us to a belief of a Divine Providence, a providence that takes particular care of the virtuous, and those especially who devote themselves to the worship and service of the Almighty. These are the people called, in Chaldee, Israel, which signifies "Seeing God;" a blessing, in my opinion, more estimable than the treasure of ten thousand worlds. For if the aspect of seniors, if magistrates, if parents, if precepts can excite in us an awe and reverence, and correct our manners and demeanour, how much more must we suppose it contributes towards the perfection of virtue, to soar above vulgar minds, beyond all created beings, to the contemplation of the great source of all things, even that Supreme Being, who is the chiefest good, and the chiefest happiness?

The human mind cannot comprehend, nor human language describe his excellencies: they cannot reach the perfections of the Deity, who is superior to every thing. If the whole creation were but one tongue, it would fall short in declaring his attributes, and displaying his omnipotence in the creation of the world, his sovereignty in the disposition of it, his wisdom in the order and government of it, and his justice, both towards good and bad, in the retribution of rewards and punishments.

Vengeance itself must be ranked amongst the Divine benefits; not only because it is a part of the Divine law, and naturally results from a principle of rectitude, in the distinction of the good from the bad, but as it frequently brings offenders to a due sense of themselves, and checks their progress in their enormities; for it is an obvious maxim, that the punishment of some is often the reformation of many.

CHAP. I.

The happy state of the first seven months reign of the emperor Caius Caligula, after the death of Tiberius.

THE commencement of the reign of the emperor Caius Caligula affords an ample display of the maxims advanced in the preface. Never did there prevail such profound peace and tranquillity throughout the whole empire. North, south, east and west, concentrated in perfect harmony; Greeks and Barbarians, soldiers and burghers, living together like brethren, in the mutual exchange of all neighbourly offices of friendship and commerce. It was a degree of felicity almost incredible, for a young prince to ascend the throne, not only with the universal acclamations of the people, but the accumulated possession of whatever his heart could desire; such as treasure, both in money and plate, wrought and unwrought, as well for ornament as convenience; a mighty armament, military and naval, val, and a revenue flowing, as it were, from a perpetual source; for he had the whole habitable earth under contribution. His empire was bounded by two rivers, the Euphrates and the Rhine; the latter separating Germany, and other barbarous nations; the former Parthia, and the people inhabiting Sarmatia and Scythia, no more civilized than the Germans.

From the east to the west, as well upon the continent as in the islands, prevailed an universal complacency and joy. The people of Rome performed a general festivity, and all Italy, with the provinces, both in Europe and Asia, partook of the diffusive blessing: for if compleat happiness was enjoyed under the reign of any emperor, it was certainly under the present at this time, when mankind did not fluctuate between hope and despair, but had sure possession both of their public and private rights, and were blessed with a plenary indulgence of propitious fortune. Throughout the city and towns, nothing was to be seen but altars, victims, sacrifices, garlands, blithe and jocund aspects, musical performances, crowded theatres, banquets, and every species of entertainment and pastime that could gratify the senses. There was no distinction between the rich and the poor, the lofty and humble, the creditor and debtor, the master and slave, but all promiscuously mixed together. Such, in fine, was the felicity of the times for plenty and pleasure, and the universal satisfaction of persons and families, that what we find described in the fabulous account of poets, concerning the Saturnian days of old, now appeared to be verified. This was the happy state of things during the first seven months of the reign of Caius.

CHAP. II.

The emperor falls into a desperate disease in the eighth month of his reign, to the general affliction of the provinces, which are afterwards as much rejoiced at his recovery.

CAIUS, in the eighth month of his reign, and in the career of his prosperity, fell into a very acute distemper; for having quitted the temperate, and consequently healthful, course of life, he led under Tiberius, he addicted himself to every species of luxury and dissipation, and pursued inordinate gratifications to a degree of bestiality. He followed, in a word, every corrupt and sensual practice, that could tend to enervate both the mind and body; and as health and strength were the attendants on temperance, so were weakness and disease the concomitants of debauchery and riot.

It was now about the beginning of autumn, at which serene season the returning ships from all quarters are upon their voyage homeward bound, that is to say such as do not winter in foreign parts. By this opportunity the news of the emperor's indisposition was immediately dispersed; so that a sudden sorrow and dejection succeeded the late universal content and joy; for all the cities, towns, and houses, were filled with mourning and sadness, and a gloomy aspect appeared in every place. The provinces were seized with an indisposition worse than that of the emperor, which was confined to the body alone, but the other reached the mind. They were anxiously apprehensive of losing not only the peace they enjoyed, but their lives, liberties, and estates. They seasonably recollected all the calamities that generally rose up in the empire when deprived of its prince, such as wars, depredations, devastations, banishments, plunder, imprisonments, fears, dangers, and even death itself. The only remedy against this train of calamities, they imagined, was placed in the preservation of the emperor.

Upon hearing, therefore, that his distemper was somewhat abated, (for nothing moves with such velocity as fame,) they seemed to enjoy an interval of happiness, which was soon diffused to the farther frontiers of the empire. All the cities were pleased with the tidings; though they retained their anxiety, till they received the welcome news of Caesar's perfect recovery, which gave them as much joy as if the case had been their own. The inhabitants, both on the continent and islands, immediately returned to their mirth and festivity. It never was known, in the memory of man, that any nation or country demonstrated such a general and public rejoicing, for the recovery of their prince, as was seen, upon this occasion, throughout the world, for the safety of Caius, when he was restored to his former health. It appeared like a momentary transition from savage to social life, from deserts to political communities, from confusion to order; and all this was owing, as they thought, to the government and protection of a generous and rightful prince. But mankind in general do not penetrate into the merits of causes, and therefore are pleased and rejoice without sufficient ground.

CHAP. III.

Caius gives proof of a depraved disposition in his treatment of young Tiberius.

IN a very short time the truth of the last remark evidently appeared in the instance of Caius, who, after having been celebrated for the profusion of his bounties and favours all over Europe and Asia, as the most illustrious benefactor to all glorious purposes, public and private, degenerated into a monster of cruelty, and discovered that he had been carrying on a scene of dissimulation.

The late emperor Tiberius had, by his son Drusus, a grandson, called Tiberius, and another by Germanicus, called Caius, who succeeded him on the Imperial throne. He was recommended by Tiberius in preference to the succession, provided he should shew the sense he had of the obligation, in his respectful behaviour to his relative, whose father had been the elder son. But it did not satisfy Caius to enjoy that by adoption, to which the other had a right by seniority; so that most barbarously, and ungratefully, he caused his near kinsman, co-heir of the empire, and next successor to Tiberius, to be put to death, under a pretext that he was engaged in a plot against his life, of which, from his tender age, there was not the least room for suspicion. Indeed, it was the opinion of many, that, if the youth had attained to a few years more, the emperor would have nominated him as his successor; for he had a very particular reason for being jealous of Caius. But he died before he put this design into execution; and Caius had recourse to artifice, in order to deprive his colleague of his common right, imagining by this means to avoid censure. The scheme was thus executed: he first sent for Tiberius, and then calling a council of his friends, addressed them in words to this effect:

“ My intentions are to tender my love to this my “ relation, in making him my colleague in the em“ pire. But youth, alas! without experience, stands “ in need of a governor itself, more than a commis“ sion to govern others. If it were not for this dif“ ficulty, I should be happy in easing myself of “ one part of the cares and troubles of my office “ over so many nations, by dividing the burthen, for “ fear of sinking myself under the weight. In the “ mean time let him depend upon me for protection
“ and advice, not only as a governor to his pupil,
“ but as a father to his son; which, for the future,
“ shall be our respective denominations.”

This address wrought so effectually upon the whole council, and the young prince himself, that the design of the plot was in a great measure accomplished; for, instead of confirming the adoption, and possessing Tiberius of that to which he had a title, it made void that which was granted him already; so that Caius was now left at liberty to treat his colleague in what manner he thought proper.

For the Roman law gives parents an absolute authority over their children, and the supreme magistrate an uncontrollable power over the people. Caius therefore, in order to gain his point, had only to declare Tiberius an enemy, and proceed against him according to pleasure. This, without scruple of conscience, he did, either to his years or consanguinity, or to his quality, as having been trained up by the emperor with a view of appointing him to the succession.

It is reported that he commanded him to put an end to his own life, strictly prohibiting many tribunes and centurions, who were present, to assist in so detestable an act, as if he made a point of conscience of not spilling royal blood by a common hand. He was desirous of appearing tenacious of the laws, and covering his hypocrisy with the mask of sanctity. The royal youth, upon this, who had never seen a murder committed, nor had been trained up to the exercise of martial arms, as the sons of kings generally are in times of peace, offered his throat to those who approached him; but every one declining the office, he took a poinard himself, and asked where he should strike, to put an end to a wretched life; and, after receiving information, became his own executioner. Thus died, at the instance of a cruel brother, the unfortunate and innocent Tiberius.

C H A P. IV.

Caius ungratefully puts Macro to death, to whom he owed his life and fortune.

WHEN Caius had thus removed the first and principal cause of his jealousy, and there remained no competitor for the disaffected party to set up against him, he prepared to make Macro the second sacrifice, in which he evinced a most cruel and ungrateful disposition. Macro had rendered him many signal services, not only after he had obtained the empire, (for it is the province of flatterers to fawn upon the great,) but also previous to his advancement; for he was deemed the chief instrument that induced Tiberius to appoint him to the succession.

The late emperor, through years and experience, was well acquainted with mankind, and had sagacity to discern the springs and motives of human actions; nor was he less powerful than prudent. He was sensibly touched with frequent suspicions of Caius, and had too much reason to think he was averse to the whole family of Claudius; or if he had any tenderness for his relations, it was for those only on the mother's side. He had therefore many apprehensions for his grandson, left, being left in his minority, his life should prove but of short date. Nor did he look upon Caius as competent to sustain the weight of empire, being a man frothy and inconsistent, without genius for political rule, or a mind adapted to sublime pursuits.

Macro, however, exerted his utmost efforts to dispossess the emperor of his prejudices, lest their prevalence should exclude Caius from the succession. He would frequently insinuate to him what a deference and veneration he had for his person and dignity; and that he retained so generous a friendship and respect for his kinsman, that he would most cordially yield the empire to him alone; adding, that his modesty and reserve were unfortunately taken for want of sense and resolution.

When he found that the specious arguments he offered were of none effect, he made no scruple of covenanting for him, and being his security, as he had sufficiently proved his loyalty to the Cæsars, and particularly to Tiberius, to whom he had been of singular service, in discovering and suppressing the conspiracy of Sejanus. In short, he extolled Caius to the skies, if defending him against causes of suspicion, and uncertain and dubious charges, may be deemed a commendation. Not to multiply words, he could not have done more for his nearest relative than he did for Caius. Many pretend to say that this extraordinary respect was founded on the several good offices which Caius rendered Macro, as he was at that time highly in credit with the emperor. Others alledge that the wife of Macro, from a certain attachment to Caius, was constantly importuning her husband to espouse his cause; and it is well known that female solicitation is very powerful, and rarely fails of success.

Macro, who had no suspicion of dishonour, imputed these blandishments of his wife to conjugal affection, and was thereby so far imposed on, that he took his most deadly enemies for his sincerest friends. In consequence of this, as he was conscious to himself that he had been the means of preserving Caius at several times, he took his usual liberty of counselling him openly, without harbouring the least suspicion; for his design was, like a great matter, to make his work perfect and lasting, that it might not perish through his own negligence, or be destroyed by others. For instance, if at any time he saw him sleeping at an entertainment, he would take the freedom to awaken him, secretly hinting, that it was neither decent or safe, since it exposed him to danger. So likewise when at any time he fondly gazed at dancers, or betrayed a childish smile at the ribaldry of buffoons, or vocally accompanied musical instruments, he would strive to check him, by admonitory suggestions to the following purport:

"It is not for you, Sire, to see, hear, and gratify your senses, like other men; but you are now to advance yourself as much above the rest of the world in the dignity of your mind, as in the elevation of your person. For what can be more incongruous than for the master of the world to entertain himself with the amusements of singing, dancing, insipid jesting, and other trifles of that kind? Whereas it is his part, in all cases, times, and places, to uphold the majesty of an imperial prince, as a shepherd set over the whole flock, and aggrandize his character daily.

"When you are at the circus, the theatre, or any other public spectacle, you are not so much to attend the thing in itself, as the pains taken to form the entertainment, and to reason the matter thus: if people take such care and pains to please spectators, without any benefit to mankind, purely for popular applause, and at last reckon it as ample reward to carry the cause with credit, what shall we expect from the profession of a much more excellent art? That is, the art of government, which provides for tillage, planting, navigation, and the security of commerce, in the establishment of a reciprocal exchange of commodities all over the provinces for the supply one of another. Some persons and places have, indeed, been tainted with a venomous envy for this salutary provision and agreement; but the malignity never went so far, however, as to poison the whole world, nor the greater part of it; here and there a man, or a family, or, perhaps, a city or two, might be concerned, but for whole countries, or nations, there has been nothing of it; especially since your illustrious family has had the administration of the government. The monsters that formerly had the confidence to domineer in the very hearts of the towns, are now glad to shift for themselves, like wild beasts, into caves, and hiding places, and have left us, in exchange, a beneficial intercourse of correspondence with all quarters of the earth; which is all subjected entirely to your good pleasure and conduct. This empire, in fine, looks like a mighty ship, and yourself, by Providence, set at the helm, where you are left answerable for the safety of the vessel, as you tender the good of mankind. Wherefore be sure to have care of it, and make it the business and pleasure of your life to promote the happiness of your people. Private persons may do many good offices among themselves, some one way, and some another, both public and private; but it is from the bounty and wisdom of the prince alone, that the people can ever pretend to be free and easy. He must have an open hand, and an expanded

"expanded soul, and no bar to his liberality, but what shall be found necessary for a reserve, to answer all the ends and chances of government."

Thus did this unfortunate counsellor endeavour to work upon the mind of Caius; but all in vain; for his admonitions were not only scornfully rejected, but he was frequently reproached with taunts to the following effect:

"Here comes my preceptor; but, I thank my stars for it, I am out of my wardship. He sets up for my master; but I am past my childhood; so likewise am a monitor that understands the world better than himself. The pedant takes upon him to instruct an emperor how to behave himself towards his subjects, and an emperor who understands all the arts of court politics much better than he can pretend to. This man has the vanity to act the part of my master; but I would willingly know where he learnt that skill himself that I want? Alas! I have been trained up, from my cradle, to the mysteries of state under a variety of tutors; as fathers, brothers, uncles, cousins, grand-fathers, and great grand-fathers, besides a continued succession of so many great princes in a right line, both by father and mother; to say nothing of the seeds of royal virtues, that shew themselves commonly in the forming of a governor. For as children often resemble their parents, not in face and manners only, but in their very motions, humours, habits, and gestures, so does nature infuse royal abilities into the very veins of a governor. And shall an idiot take upon him now to instruct me in the mysteries of an art that I brought into the world with me? Yet an obscure, mean wretch tutors me upon a subject of which he knows nothing himself."

In this manner did Caius alienate himself from Macro, devising falsehoods to lay to his charge, and cloaking them over with the semblance of the truth. While he was deliberating on this matter, he availed himself of certain expressions that Macro had uttered as the ground of an accusation. They were these.

"Caius is a man of my preferring, and more obliged to me for what he is, than to his very father. It was my interest that not only once, but thrice, rescued him from the rage of Tiberius, when he would have put him to death. After the death of Tiberius, when the prætorian bands were under my command, I gave up my guards into his hands, with this admonitory precaution, that the empire could never be safe and entire, but in the hands of a single person."

This was not only true beyond contradiction, but believed by many who heard it, as they were not acquainted with the mutable and inconstant temper of Caius, and of that dissimulation and hypocrisy of which he was master. However, not many days after this, the unfortunate Macro and his wife were removed out of the way, to gratify the ambition and barbarity of Caius. Sad recompence for loyalty and affection in the extreme! It is beyond dispute that Macro, who, with sedulous endeavours, strove first to serve Caius, and then caused the empire to be vested in him alone, received this reward for his pains. It was reported that the unhappy man and his wife were forced to lay violent hands on themselves, notwithstanding the former attachment of Caius to the latter; but the sallies of unlawful passions are irregular and unaccountable.

CHAP. V.

The cruelty of Caius towards Syllanus, his father-in-law, and several others.

WHEN this treacherous prince had rid himself of the danger of a competitor, and taken off Macro and all his domestics, he turned his mind to a third exploit, in the conduct of which he had recourse to deeper stratagem than that of the two former. He had a father-in-law, named Marcus Syllanus, a person brave in arms, and of illustrious descent, who, though his daughter was snatched away by an untimely death, paid Caius the same respect as before, not doubting of a reciprocal return; but he cherished hopes that proved vain and fallacious in the end.

Syllanus, being a man frank and open in his temper, would frequently introduce the topics of morals and politics, as the offices and functions of a prince, and the measures of government and good order. He often admonished him upon these points, with a freedom becoming his quality and station: besides, the death of his daughter being fresh in his memory, the sense of the affinity he thought could not be so soon forgotten. But the emperor interpreted this friendly counsel as reproach, and looked upon it as a dishonour done him, for any man to arrogate a degree of prudence, temperance, fortitude, or justice, superior to himself; so that he conceived an aversion to Syllanus, as he had done to other instructors, and considered him as his professed enemy. He supposed him a main obstacle to the pursuit of his inordinate desires; and therefore, in a fit of outrage, bid a final adieu to the memory of his deceased wife, and followed the barbarity with a treacherous practice upon the life of her father, tho' one of the most respectable of his time. The fame of this murder, and others little less considerable that followed upon it, struck the whole world with horror and indignation; but fear restrained open reprobation, while every one maintained their own private opinion.

The common people, however, whose minds are given to change both in point of words and actions, could scarcely be brought to believe it possible, that a prince, who was so humane, candid, and generous, one day, could prove so merciless, false, and bloody, the next, and therefore took upon them the justification of his conduct, and urged, in his defence, the equity of the cause. They stated, that, as to Tiberius his co-heir, the law of nature would not admit of a partner in sovereignty; that it was only an act of prevention to take away the life of a man who would have slain him, had it been in his power; that it could not have been so justly termed homicide, as a favour of Divine Providence, in removing Tiberius for the common good of mankind, to prevent them from being divided into parties, and to escape as well foreign as civil wars, that might follow thereupon; for nothing is more desirable than tranquillity and peace; that peace was the result of good government, that is, a government where no competitions are encouraged by any divisions of the prince.

Their opinion respecting Macro was, that he had become immoderately ambitious, having banished from his mind the Delphic oracle, which enjoins every one to know himself, and would have been the source of his happiness, had he not defeated it by his inattentions and non-compliance; that it was unbecoming a man to arrogate the part of the prince, or strive to reduce the emperor Caius to a level with himself; and that it was the sovereign's province to command, the subjects to obey. In this manner did some illiterate people decant upon wholesome counsels and admonitions, either owing to their resentment, or want of knowledge to distinguish things, and trace effects from their true cause.

Syllanus, in the mean time, was not free from the censure of the envious, who insinuated, that it was absurd in him to suppose or pretend, that a father-in-law was vested with as much authority over his son as a real father; that private citizens, on their sons being advanced to dignified stations, made no scruple of giving them the precedence; that Syllanus discovered gross simplicity and ignorance in intermeddling with affairs that by no means concerned him, not having sense to know that his affinity to the emperor expired with his daughter; for though marriage marriage connects families for a time, the alliance is dissolved by death.

These observations were handed about to save the emperor's credit as much as possible; for the public having a fixed opinion of his humanity and probity, could not be induced to believe that a total reverse of character could so suddenly be produced.

CHAP. VI.

The excessive ambition of Caius in arrogating Divine honours.

HAVING thus gained his point, in the disputes abovementioned, against three principal parties, and obtained victories over citizens of equestrian and senatorial dignity, and another over one of his own family, Caius supposed that the most powerful being removed out of the way, he should become formidable to all around him. Such, indeed, was his ambition and arrogance, that he could no longer contain himself within any bounds, or even the limits of human nature, but aspired to Divine honours, and was for translating the emperor into a demi-god. The ground of his whimsical pretence was, "that, as the master of other flocks, such as shepherds, herdsmen, and the like, are of a more excellent nature than the beasts, so the supreme governor of men in society ought to be esteemed far more elevated than the scale of human nature, and admitted to rank with the gods."

On his first embracing this opinion, like a man infatuated, he grasped at a romantic tale instead of a true one. At length, having ventured to publish his consecration, he proceeds farther, and ascended by certain gradations. At first he emulated the demi-gods, as Bacchus, Hercules, Castor, Trophonius, Amphiarus, Amphilocus, and the like. Upon this he was continually changing character and dress, like the mimic in the dramatic scene. At one time he would personate Hercules, with his club and lion's skin; at another he would assume a martial bonnet, and represent Castor. Sometimes he would appear in a fawn's skin, and a thyrsus wrapt in ivy, in imitation of Bacchus. But he reserved to himself this peculiar privilege, that, whereas his fellow demi-gods were content with the honours and ceremonies respectively appropriated to them severally considered, Caius engrossed them all to himself, in order that he might soar above those whom he envied.

But what excited the admiration of his followers was his extraordinary adroitness in metamorphosis; not that he had three bodies, like Geryon, but his transforming one body into so many shapes, like Proteus, whom Homer introduced as turning himself into a variety of appearances, such as elements, animals, and rivers.

But wherefore, O Caius, do you assume the figures and trophies of those images, without imitating the virtues that are respectively ascribed to them? The labours and hazards of Hercules were all employed for the good of mankind, in delivering the world, both at sea and land, from the monsters that infested it. Bacchus cultivated the vine, and extracted a cordial drink, in the juice of the grape, that cheers both the body and mind. It subdues our cares, and soothes our misfortunes. Wine recreates the health, and makes us more active and valiant. It is of singular advantage to private persons, families, and cities; and a cheerful cup is but a transition from labour to rest. The Greeks and barbarians introduced it to crown their festivals, which without it would have been languid, dull, and spiritless.

Of the twins of Jupiter, Castor and Pollux, it is reported that the one gave immortality to the other. For as the one was born subject to mortality, and the other immortal, he whose condition was the happier, chose rather to dispense with his privilege than not discover his love to his brother. Accordingly he devised an expedient to compound the difficulty, which was by dividing the immortality and mortality of the two brothers equally betwixt them, and fixing two different natures upon the same basis of equity and reason. And this is the very fountain and spring of all justice.

These worthies having distinguished themselves, by their good offices, as the friends of mankind, were upon that score held in profound admiration, and deemed worthy of divine honours. But with respect to Caius, it may be asked, what great or good act he ever performed to entitle him to the honours of a demi-god? To begin with Castor. Instead of emulating the heroic bravery of so generous a friend and brother, he put to death his brother and co-heir in the flower of his age, and condemned his sister to banishment to secure his usurpation. What has he done after the example of Bacchus? Has he produced any invention beneficial to the community? Has he diffused with Bacchus joy and gladness? Do Europe and Asia partake of his munificence? Inventions he has, indeed, discovered, but such as, like an epidemical pestilence, turn joy into mourning, and render mankind weary of their lives. He ransacked the east and west, and all the other regions extending north and south, for their choicest commodities, to satisfy his unbounded avarice, which he returned by taxes and imposts, to make the burden of the oppression intolerable. So much for the imitation of Bacchus.

In like manner did he exhibit a noble portrait of Hercules, by the valiant and indefatigable achievements of his arm, by his wholesome laws, upright determinations, by a plentiful increase of the fruits of the earth, wherewith he blessed the islands and the continent? Might we not rather exclaim, indolent, pusillanimous mortal! who expelled peace and tranquillity from his cities, and rendered the inhabitants mutinous and seditious!

Was Caius desirous of being stiled a god for the abominations and destructions which he brought upon his subjects in general, and that they might be perpetual? I must differ in opinion, persuaded that if he had been admitted to rank with the gods, his sinister and perverse views would have soon dejected him to a level with mortality. If divinity is the consequence of excelling in virtue, it follows that mortality results from being notorious in vice: he could not therefore pretend to the friendship that subsisted between the sons of Jove, who was both an homicide and fratricide. Nor could he partake of the excellent nature either of Hercules or Bacchus, who distinguished themselves by their good offices; whereas he acted in contradiction to every principle of honour and virtue.

CHAP. VII.

The vanity and arrogance of Caius increase, inasmuch that he aspires to a more exalted rank amongst the gods of antiquity.

CAIUS at length was actuated by such a degree of infatuation, that, not content with entering into a competition with demi-gods, he proceeded to rival those of an higher class, as Apollo, Mars, and Mercury. He imitated the latter, by assuming an elegant mantle, a caduceus in his hand, and binding winged buskins on his feet. Having laid aside these ornaments, he personated Apollo, encircling his temples with a radiant crown, holding a bow and quiver in his left hand, and the graces in his right, intimating that we should be forward in doing good offices.

Next to this he instituted dances for the singing of Pæans to him who just before was representing Bacchus: for whenever he assumed the habit of this god, they called him Lævius, Libes, and Lycæus. Several times he appeared with a breast-plate, an helmet, a shield, and advanced in a pompous manner, with a sabre drawn, in imitation of Mars. On each side he had a band of homicides, or bravoës, called called Salii, ready to execute any cruelty he enjoined them, and gratify his savage disposition, that delighted in blood. By these horrid spectacles he struck terror into the people, who were surprized that he should assume the honours of those whose virtues he despised, and content himself only with their ensigns; though these outward habiliments are annexed to the images as intimations of the bounty and goodness of the gods to those that truly love and fear them. For example, to what purpose is Mercury represented with winged buskins? because, being the messenger or ambassador of the gods, (whence he has a Greek appellation that denotes the same,) he is prodigiously swift, and borne along with expanded wings, and surprizing rapidity. He is also depicted with a caduceus, which is the badge of a conciliator or peace-maker: for it is the herald that determines war, either by striking peace, or making treaties: if these means were not admitted, there would be no end put to the hostilities of jarring princes, and injuries and insults would be continued to be committed without controul.

What could be the design of Caius in putting on the winged buskins? Was it to publish the depravity of his principles and conduct throughout all the provinces of the empire? A scandal that, on the contrary, should have been buried in silence. Nor was there a necessity for this rapid course; because, had he not remained upon one spot, he would have poured mischiefs upon mankind, as it were, in a deluge. Why assume the caduceus, that emblem of peace, when he was constantly raising feuds and animosities, and filled every city, Grecian and barbarian, with intestine sedition, and civil discord? Away then with every claim to the character of Mercury. Let us now consider in what instance he resembles Apollo.

He wears, it is true, a radiant crown, the rays of which, representing those of the sun, are beautifully imitated by the artist, as if either the sun, or a general light, pleased him much better than the night, and the thickest darkness, to perpetrate his horrid designs in. Honest and virtuous actions stand in need of the noon-day to render them conspicuous, but base and sinister practices, that will not stand the test, require the thickest darkness to cover them. Let them, therefore, be condemned to the regions of Tartarus, and never see the light. The ensigns he might transpose with the greatest propriety, putting the bow and quiver into his right hand, that he may strike with sure aim at men, women, children, cities, and families, according to custom, and the Graces into his left, unless he had rather scatter them entirely; for it is plainly evident he does but abuse them, in coveting the possessions of other people, and, after having stripped the owners, putting them to death; bringing this calamity upon them because they were rich. As to Apollo's medicinal quality, he manifestly inverts it; for that god was the inventor of salutary remedies, and so well disposed, that he was always ready to heal those disorders of which others had been the cause.

Caius, on the contrary, brought diseases on those that were well, mutilations on those that were sound; and inflicted death, with his own hand, on the living, before nature had determined their time. He made diligent search after several sorts of poisons, whereby, had not the divine justice prevented him, all the best and most virtuous men in every city, under his dominion, had certainly been destroyed. This damnable preparation was designed for the noble and wealthier sort, chiefly the Italians, and those within the metropolis; as there was more gold and silver hoarded up within that compass of ground, than in the whole world beside. Therefore he made his own country the point to aim at, and shewed himself the scourge, the plague, and the destruction of his subjects.

Apollo was likewise as famous for his prophetic mind as his medicinal knowledge, but all his endowments were applied to the benefit of mankind. By his oracles he directed the doubtful, who were in danger of taking good for evil, and kept them from wavering, or deviating into the paths of error. Nay, his foreknowledge of future events was so certain, that men placed an implicit reliance on the result of their consultations.

If we oppose to these the frivolous oracles of Caius, which prognosticated infamy, confiscations, exile, and death, to all men of rank and merit, what affinity will they appear to bear to those of the true Apollo? Away then with these false Pæans made to imitate those that are genuine; for if the adulteration of coin be deemed criminal, it is much more so to prostitute divine honours.

But nothing could be more ludicrous or contemptible, than for a body and mind, so enervate and effeminate, to rival the strength and fortitude of Mars, and endeavour to impose on the spectators by various and singular appearances, as the mimic does upon the stage. We are no strangers to the courage of Mars. I speak not of the fabulous deity, but of that by which we understand natural fortitude, exerted in behalf of the innocent and oppressed, as is evinced from the original Greek word, which signifies to help. Mars has two names: one of them imports a lover of peace, so far as it conduces to the good of the public; and the other a friend to war, that is sure to be attended with bloodshed and confusion.

C H A P. VIII.

Tyranny of Caius towards the Jews for refusing to pay him divine honours.

IT has been rendered sufficiently apparent that Caius had no pretence to rank amongst the gods, either superior or inferior, as there was no kind of affinity betwixt them, either in nature or essence, in inclination or manners. Our desires are often directed by a blind fatality, especially when ambition, and an unbounded liberty, are annexed to them; and this was formerly the ruin of our nation. The Jews were the only people that raised suspicions in the mind of Caius, as most resolute in obstructing his design, because they had been taught, from their infancy, by their parents and preceptors, and chiefly by their divine laws, that there was but one God, the Father and Creator of the Universe. The rest of the world, though under terrible apprehensions for the consequence of his proceedings, were obliged to join the general voice, in extolling that ambitious mortal to the very skies.

Some introduced the manners and customs of the barbarians into Italy, by which the Roman worship and rites were much corrupted. The nation of the Jews, in fact, was the only one that lay under suspicion of opposing the deity of this fantastical emperor. They were known to have resigned themselves voluntarily to death, as if it were but entering upon a state of immortality, rather than suffer an infringement upon the least article of the rites of their country. Because, as we observe in buildings, if one part be wanting, though the rest may seem to stand firm, yet time will moulder it by degrees, till it falls to pieces.

The point in question was no trifle, but of the highest importance: for a man, born mortal, to endeavour to metamorphose himself into the form of an immortal God, is an impiety than which nothing can be more execrable. It opens an inlet to the most enormous crimes, as infidelity and ingratitude to the universal benefactor, who amply distributes his bounties to the whole race of mankind. This was the cause that involved our nation in so destructive a war; for what greater misfortune can befall a servant, than to be subject to a master who is his avowed and professed enemy? Subjects are the servants of emperors; and a mild and lawful government is the happiness of mankind. But the government of Caius rendered the condition of his subjects insupportable. He was a prince without humanity, who knew no other law than his own will, and abrogated all other provisions as superfluous. Of all people under the sun, the state of the Jews was most desperate, under the arbitrary sway of a monster monster of tyranny, instead of the father of his people.

CHAP. IX.

The horrid outrage of the Alexandrians against the Jews, upon the occasion of the persecution of Caius.

WHEN the tumultuous and seditious people of Alexandria had notice of the rigorous proceedings of Caius towards the Jews, they immediately took advantage of the opportunity of executing a long meditated revenge. Had the emperor permitted, or given express orders for, their violent proceedings, we could not have been more exposed to their rage and fury, or, by the right of war, been more reduced to their power. They massacred us with relentless cruelty; broke into houses, turned men, women, and children out of doors, and plundered and carried off all effects of value. This they did not after the manner of thieves in the night, who act under the apprehension of being detected and brought to justice, but committed their depredations in the very face of the sun, boasting of what they had done, and exposing their plunder with as much confidence as if it had been their legal property. Nay, they formed themselves in bands and companies, who shared in the booty, and divided the spoil in the market-place, while the proprietors looked on, and were grossly reviled and insulted.

It was certainly a hardship in the extreme for men of rank and property, who lived in affluence, to be turned out of their habitations, and exposed to want, and that without a moment's warning, or the least default on their side. But no consideration had weight with those miscreants, who persisted in their outrages, and were more cruel and rapacious than the most savage of the brute creation.

These calamities, however, are more tolerable than those which will appear in the sequel; for they forced, out of every corner of the city, thousands of men, women, and children, like so many sheep, into a narrow place, resembling a cave, making no doubt of finding them, within a few days, a pile of carcases, for want of food or breath, the place being close and smothering, and the air tainted with the frequent respirations of so great a concourse of people. These miserable wretches, when they could no longer sustain the hardships to which they were exposed from hunger and suffocation, betook themselves some towards the sea-side, others to remote burying-places, all desirous of a little pure and wholesome air. Those who were found remaining behind in other parts of the city, or ignorant of the calamities that threatened them, appeared abroad, and were unmercifully treated, either wounded with stones, or beaten to death with clubs. A few out of the number, who were pent up in a narrow corner of the city, were beset with spies, who watched narrowly that none of them privately made their escape, which was naturally to be expected; not so much for their own sakes, as to save their families from perishing by hunger. The Alexandrians kept a strict guard upon that quarter, to prevent their getting away; and as many as they intercepted, they first put to the torture, and then to death, with all the rage and cruelty imaginable.

There was another party of them that lay in ambush about the ports of the river for the Jewish merchants, whose effects they took away in the sight of the owners, and then making piles of the planks of their vessels, burnt many to death. Others were burnt in the midst of the city after a most miserable manner. There being no dry wood to be found, they brought branches that were green and in sap, and having set these on a flame, the poor wretches were thrown in, and endured greater torments from the smoke than the fire, because, from the greenness of the matter, a thick smoky fire arose that burnt but weakly, and was soon extinguished, leaving few or no ashes at all. Several were dragged with cords through the middle of the market-place, amidst the insults of the mob, who spared not even the bodies of the dead, which, with more barbarity than savage beasts, they cut into pieces, inasmuch that no remains could be found for burial.

The governor of the province, who, by the interposition of his authority, could, in a very short time, have put a stop to the outrages of these miscreants, affected ignorance of the very things he saw and heard, so that having liberty to pursue their measures, they proceeded to acts of greater violence. Having collected themselves into numerous parties, they went to the oratories, or places of prayer, which were in several parts of the city, and either plundered them, cut down the trees about them, or entirely levelled them with the ground. Some they burnt, by throwing fire into them, with so much rage and fury, that the houses adjoining could not escape their destructive hands; as it is difficult to stop a conflagration where there is combustible matter to work upon.

I decline relating an account of the monumental and illustrious memorials of the Roman princes that were made a sacrifice in this conflagration by this frantic mob; shields, crowns, and golden statues, which they ought to have held in veneration. But their fury was beyond all restraint. To fix themselves in the good graces of the emperor as firmly as possible, and promote the execution of his destructive design on the Jews, to whom they knew he was mortally averse, they had recourse to new arts of flattery and insinuation, and thus proceeded.

As there were many of our oratories which they had not been able to set fire to, because of the great number of Jews that dwelt in them, they devised other means of destroying them, together with their rites and manner of worship. They set up the statue of Caius in all of them; but in the greatest and most famous, his statue was raised aloft, but with so much haste, and over-officious duty, that, having no new horses cast, they took out of the gymnasium, or place of exercise, four rusty ones, with their ears, tails, and feet very much worn, which, according to report, had been dedicated to Cleopatra, the last queen of that name. Now the insult committed in this action was palpable. Was it according to the rules of decorum to dedicate to a Roman emperor, who endeavoured to emulate a god, what had been erected to the honour of a woman; things that were foreign to the purpose, and had been the ensigns of another? Were not they fearful of incurring the displeasure of Caius, by honouring him with such a gift; an emperor passionate, and one who had arrogated to himself all honours, and those the most splendid and magnificent? However, for this famous action, they were in hopes of obtaining praise, and greater favour than they had hitherto done. They changed, however, their oratories into new temples, and increased the number of temples that were dedicated to Caius, not so much to honour him in the action, as to gratify their own passions, in wreaking their vengeance by any means upon the Jews, as can be rendered evident. It is observable, that, during the reign of ten kings, whom they count in succession for three hundred years, not one of them had a statue dedicated to him in the oratories, though they gave these very princes the title of gods in their inscriptions, and for what reason? because they certainly knew that they were men, since, among their deities, they have abundance of creatures, belonging to land and water, as well as birds of the air, with whose altars, temples, and groves, all Egypt is well stocked.

But as these people are the grossest of flatterers, and court princes for their fortunes rather than their persons, they might say, perhaps, that, as emperors are greater and more considerable than the Ptolemies, so it is but reasonable they should have more honour done them. A most ridiculous pretence! Why did they not decree the same honours to Augustus before Caius, who stood indebted to him for the empire? a prince who, for the whole space that he held the government, never occasioned one war, either in Greece or Barbary, but every place, to his death, enjoyed the sweets of peace, and the tranquillity of a quiet government. Was noble descent an obstacle to his preferment? Evidently otherwise; for he was much superior to Caius, both by father and mother. Was he inferior in point of erudition? It is denied; for none of his contemporaries could pretend to more learning or prudence. Could any valid objection be founded on his advanced age? Far from it; for he not only gave signal proofs of his understanding in early life, but was eminent for the continuance of his abilities in its decline. Yet such a character must be passed over in silence, while one, in every instance of merit deficient, arrogates a claim to being deified. Augustus was a virtuous man, and virtue, according to the maxim of the greatest philosophers in every age, is the only hability. He obtained the venerable name of Augustus, not as an hereditary honour transmitted from his ancestors, but as due to his personal merit, and thence descending to his posterity.

The whole world seemed to contend for sovereignty when he came to the empire. The maritime and Mediterranean provinces, under the conduct of each Roman general, distinguished for his dignity and honor, were parties in the famous struggle. The vast countries and regions of the world followed one another, and engaged in the grand decisive battle that was to award the globe to the conqueror. The remotest nations were roused to partake of the two interests, one side or the other; and the land and sea joined their forces; so that during this grand revolution, almost all mankind had been swallowed up in the destruction and mutual defeats that were given by either side, had not one man, a prince of an august family, come in time, and given his assistance when affairs were at the last gasp. This prince was Cæsar, who, after he had driven back the storm that raged on every side, restored a perfect calm to the afflicted race of mankind, who remedied the public calamities that visited both the Greeks and barbarians, that, beginning at east and south, diffused their baleful influence to the west and north, while the countries that lay betwixt them were exposed to all manner of evils. This was he that restored liberty to all the provinces, and freed them from their chains. This was he who removed not only the fear of wars, but also all manner of depredation and plunder. This was he who scoured the sea of pirates, and caused it to be navigated by vessels of merchandize; who brought order out of confusion, and reduced the most barbarous and inhospitable of nations to a social and benevolent disposition. He gave large immunities to the Grecian cities, and annexed to Greece the richest and best situated countries of the barbarians. He maintained peace, administered justice, and scattered his bounties amongst the people in so generous a profusion, that they wanted for nothing; and this was his course and practice to the end of his days. Yet, after all these obligations to so great and glorious a benefactor during his auspicious reign, there was never heard of any such things as statues or images to his honour in any of their oratories: though, if any mortal had a right to such extraordinary tokens of respect, it was certainly this prince; not only as the founder of the august Imperial family, and the best deserving of all mankind, but as taking the power out of many hands into one, and assuming the conduct of it himself: for it is a very just maxim, "that many voices are the cause of many mischiefs." Besides, the whole world had decreed him divine honours, such as temples, groves, porticos, more beautiful than which, none, either ancient or modern, were ever seen in any cities, particularly that temple dedicated to Cæsar in Alexandria, under the name of Sebaste, a piece incomparably transcending all others. It stands situate opposite a most commodious harbour, very high, and large in proportion. It is an eminent land-mark, full of choice paintings and statues, with donations in abundance. It is ornamented with gold and silver. The model is curious and regular in the disposition of the parts, as galleries, libraries, porches, courts, walks, and consecrated groves, magnificent and elegant as expense and art could render them. Can it then reasonably be supposed, that, amidst so universal a consent of nations, any thing was wanting that was justly due to the honour of Cæsar, without setting up statues in the Jewish oratories? Why therefore were they omitted? Without prevarication for this reason.

They were so well convinced of the generosity and justice of Cæsar, that they were persuaded he would be as tender of the rights and privileges of the several provinces as of the Roman ceremonies. He received these honours from blind flatterers, not from any principle of approbation, but because the dignity of the empire seemed to require it, as these acts procure a veneration for government. That he was never elated by these obsequious duties, is evident from his never suffering himself to be addressed in the style of the gods, so great was his aversion to so servile a way of adulation. Nay, he declared his satisfaction with the Jews' refusal to comply with that abominable practice. He would never else have suffered so considerable a part of the city beyond the Tiber to be inhabited by Jews, and the greater part of them freemen too, that is men, who, having been prisoners of war, were set at liberty by their masters, and permitted to live according to the laws and religion of their country. He was no stranger to the nature of their oratories, and their worship on the sabbath days, conformably to the practice of their forefathers. He knew likewise that they collected their first fruits, and sent them to Jerusalem, together with certain ministers, who obtained sacrifices for them; yet he neither expelled them the city, or punished them otherwise, as he might have done. In Palestine itself they were allowed the free exercise of their religion, without check or restraint. Nor did he prohibit them from holding the assemblies where they taught their laws; nor, by any edict or proclamation, annul their solemn custom of sending and offering their first fruits. On the contrary, he held our worship in such veneration, that many of his domestics presented gifts which are extant in our temple, wherein he commanded victims to be offered every day, at his own charge, to the Most High God. These solemnities are still performed, and will so continue as a lasting monument of the virtues of this excellent emperor. Upon all occasions of distributing money and corn amongst the people, he was pleased to order the Jews their proportion; and if the day for dispensing it happened on the sabbath, when we are not allowed to give nor receive, the officers were commanded to reserve their share till the next day. This generous care so enhanced the reputation of the Jews, that it kept their enemies in awe, and deterred them from violating their customs and rites.

The Jews were likewise favoured with the sanction of Tiberius, though Sejanus endeavoured to irritate him against them, and to involve Italy in new commotions. But Tiberius, on the death of the traitor, discovered that the crimes he had laid to the charge of the Jews were mere calumnies, and that his principal design was to remove them out of the way, as the men most likely of all others to oppose his wicked measure, and the scheme he had concerted to take away the life of the emperor. In consequence of this, orders were dispatched to all the governors of provinces, to treat such of the Jews, as appeared to retain their allegiance, with lenity; so that, upon the whole, no innovation was made within the tribes; but, on the other hand, they were commended as lovers of peace, while laws of morality tended to establish the public tranquillity.

CHAP. X.

Caius is exasperated against the Jews of Alexandria by the artful insinuations of an Egyptian, called Helico.

CAIUS was at length so puffed up with ambition and vanity, that he believed himself to be the god he pretended; and, amongst all his subjects, Greeks or barbarians, none were so inclined to countenance the phrenzy, as the people of Alexandria, who are certainly addicted, in the highest degree, gree, to dissimulation, flattery, and hypocrisy. They possess the arts of prevarication and insinuation; and are highly qualified for raising public commotions, and overturning a system or good government. Those who wish to form an idea of the veneration they have for the name of God, need only reflect that their asps, and several other creatures, are honoured with it: therefore, as they are so prodigal of this sacred name, they impose on the timorous, and such as are not acquainted with their horrid impiety; but to such as are duly informed, and rightly estimate things, it is as open as the day.

Caius, ignorant of this, was so infatuated as to believe that the Alexandrians held him to be a god; for such was their dissimulation, that there was no apparent difference betwixt the false worship and the true, the acclamations and external formalities being the very same. Thus misled, he imagined the innovations they brought into the oratories to be the pure result of their minds, and a strong desire to please him. He had frequent accounts sent him from Alexandria of these transactions; nor could any poem, written in celebration of him, afford him such pleasure; and, to add to his satisfaction, the intelligence was conveyed to him by one of his domestics, who well knew how to gratify the humour of his master. The greater part of the creatures about him were Egyptians, a vile, abject herd, trained up in the worship of serpents and crocodiles, and totally corrupted in mind and body. Of this Egyptian band one Helico was the principal, a sordid slave, who, by subtle arts, had crept into the palace. He had received his education under a former master, who presented him to Tiberius Cæsar. But the turn of that prince being rather grave and serious, and Helico's talent confined to ribaldry, instead of affording him entertainment, he excited his disgust; for that emperor, even in his guilt, had an aversion to things light and trivial. But, on the demise of Tiberius, and the succession of Caius to the imperial throne, Helico consoled himself, from the character of his new master, with a promising view of working him up to a subserviency of his utmost wishes.

This subtle miscreant now ruminated in his mind that the time was at hand in which he should exert himself. He was conscious that he possessed talents adapted to the disposition of his present master, and that his peculiar turn for joke, banter, whim, and repartee, would gain upon him. He knew that his ears were open both to adulation and calumny, that the laws and ceremonies of the Jews was a forcible subject to work upon, and therefore determined to avail himself of those objections to them, which he had begun to acquire from his earliest infancy.

Such was the design this sycophant and impostor intended to prosecute to alienate the mind of Caius from the Jews, in the prosecution of which he used every artifice that was practicable. He did not deem it expedient to behave openly in this affair, but acted under covert; and, through the disguise of hint and allusion, did the Jews more injury than he could have done in quality of a professed enemy.

This was no sooner known to the ambassadors from Alexandria, than they made it their business to bring Helico over to their interest, by present gifts, and large promises of treasure and honour, as soon as Caius should come to Alexandria. Helico was extremely pleased with the reflection of the respect he was to receive in the presence not only of his master, but of so many eminent persons as would be sure to appear from all quarters upon so solemn an occasion, and in veneration of so great a prince; so that he promised himself the accomplishment of his utmost wishes.

The attention of the Jews had been hitherto so taken up by known and open enemies, that they never suspected the danger of a secret one in the person of Helico. But when they came to be convinced of their mistake, they endeavoured to soothe him by fair words, as the man whom of all others they had most reason to dread. He was the emperor's constant companion at all his exercises and entertainments; indeed, in every scene of sensual pleasure. Being principal of all his attendants, he had the entire command of his ear; and as he was free from other avocations, he had constant opportunity of poisoning his mind with fables, interspersed with detraction and ribaldry, calculated at once to amuse and prejudice him against our nation. His apparently principal aim was the pleasure of the prince, but this in reality was transient; for the main scope of this pernicious slave's intention was to throw oblique accusations, in order to ruin us in his opinion. At length he seemed to have laid aside the mask, employed the whole force of his battery against us, and plied his artillery with such address, as could not fail to work a most powerful impression on the mind of the emperor.

CHAP. XI.

The Jews of Alexandria send deputies to the emperor Caius Cæsar to complain of their grievances. Philo is appointed chief of the embassy.

THE Jews exerted their utmost endeavours to soothe Helico, and dispose him in their favour; but finding him remain intolerably proud and inaccessible, they let that project fall, and bethought themselves of another expedient, which seemed no less necessary, and yet to promise a better effect, not knowing at this time, but that the malicious designs of Helico might arise from some personal and particular pique. They came to a determination of presenting Caius with a petition and remonstrance on their grievances, with a prayer for relief annexed. This petition was no more than an abstract of a longer address, that was delivered a little before to king Agrippa, who fortunately put into Alexandria in his way to Syria, to take possession of a kingdom conferred upon him by the emperor. We were thus far advanced in our way towards Rome, under a great mistake, as it appeared; for whereas we made no doubt of finding Caius a prince of honour and justice, he proved, on the contrary, our most implacable enemy; though, in words and countenance, he assumed the mask of a generous friend. Our first reception was in the Campus Martius, where he complimented us with his right hand, to indicate that he was propitious. He sent a person to us, whose office was to receive all ambassadors, to inform us he would take cognizance of our cause at leisure; from whence people in general, both Jews and strangers, concluded that the purport of our embassy was as good as accomplished. But wisdom and experience taught me better than to judge from appearances, so that I was inclined to suspect that with which others seemed so highly pleased. These reflections passed in my mind: "What can the emperor mean, when ambassadors from almost every nation in the world are here, by saying he will give audience to us only? He is not a stranger that we are Jews, and would be satisfied with being put upon an equality with the rest. It might be the height of phrenzy in us to hope for such a privilege from a youth who is a stranger to us, and a prince of absolute authority. He must be more favourably disposed towards the people of Alexandria, and for their sakes he presses the matter to our issue. I sincerely wish that the parties may find an impartial judge in him, and that he may not prove a patron to them, and an enemy to us."

CHAP. XII.

Caius orders Petronius, governor of Syria, to set up his statue in the temple of Jerusalem. Information is brought to Philo and his colleagues.

WHILE I harboured these reflections in my breast, I was surprized with a dismal accident, that boded destruction not only to the Jews, but all all mankind. As it was dangerous to address the emperor, we followed him out of town to Puteoli, whither he went to take the air at the sea-side, and divert himself from place to place, visiting divers towns and villas, which are there very numerous and splendid. During our abode there, in daily expectation of an audience, a person came to us trembling, out of breath, with his eyes swollen, and having beckoned us aside, as it were out of hearing, demanded, in slow accent, if we had heard any news? With this he endeavoured to discover something, but a flood of tears put a stop to his speech. He attempted it again and again, and was still prevented, till at length, alarmed at so horrid a spectacle, we entreated him to acquaint us with the reason of his coming, as we could not suppose it was merely for the sake of weeping; adding a request, that, if there was cause for mourning, we might bear our part in an exercise to which we had been long accustomed. At length, after many deep fetched sighs, he said, "Our temple is doomed to destruction: Caius has commanded his image to be set up in the sanctuary, with the inscription of the name of Jupiter." This affecting information struck us with amazement; we stood like persons mute and senseless; the truth of it was quickly confirmed by other messengers. At length we withdrew into our apartment, shut ourselves up, and consoled our misfortunes, public and private, with uncommon dejection of mind.
